quence of it. Thereupon Mr. Cresswell in 1841 moved an Address setting forth that if the Crown advanced to the claimants the amount of their respective claims, as ascertained by the Commissioners, the House would make good the same; and the answer to the Address expressed the readiness of the Crown to give effect to the wishes of the House whenever the means should be provided by Parliament. He asked the House whether that was not an acquiescence, as far as the Government were concerned, in the justice and propriety of fulfilling the prayer of the Address? The subject had since the date of that Address and answer been mooted in the House of Commons three or four times, but he was not responsible for the course which had been taken with respect to it on those occasions. Indeed, he very much doubted whether, the House having once addressed Her Majesty in the language which he had quoted, and having received a reply such as he had read, it was open to them to proceed to move another Address in the same form, and he, for one, should have expected that a Motion rather would have been made to the effect that, owing to the different measures which had been taken by the Crown on the one side, and the claimants in question on the other, the public faith had become effectually pledged to the liquidation of the claims of the latter, not as a mere matter of grace or favour on the part of the Crown, but by reason of the action of those responsible in the conduct of a suit on behalf of the State, as against those individuals by whom the claim on it was made. He did not know of any reason which had ever been urged for the non-fulfilment of these claims, except an argument that was used some years ago by the right hon. Gentleman the present Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. Cardwell). That right hon. Gentleman contended that as the seizure of the ships was not illegal, but was a fair act in war, therefore, the petitioners had no claim to compensation. But that was a total misapprehension of the case. The confusion arose in this way. There were two classes of seizures. There was first the ships afloat, and there was next the book debts and the goods ashore. In 1835 the Government agreed to give compensation for this latter class, because they said their seizure was illegal, and contrary to the law of nations; and as their predecessors had omitted to claim compensation from the Danish Government at the proper time they felt bound to make that compensation good. But he must observe that there was no written or public law which drew any distinction between the legality of seizing ships afloat and book debts and goods ashore; and the British Government in 1808, having their attention drawn to the matter, decided that no distinction could be drawn between the two cases. But whether that were the case or no with the goods ashore, the present petitioners did not rest their claim on the illegality of the seizure, but on its high legality—on the ground that the Danes were justified in the seizure by the extreme step our Government had taken—very possibly for its own salvation; but still, according to the known principles of law, that the Government which gave occasion to the wrong was answerable for the wrong, therefore, the British Government ought to make good their claims. This was the view taken twenty years ago, and less, at least by two Gentlemen who were now high in Her Majesty's Councils, by that severe economist, Joseph Hume, and by Sir Stratford Canning, who was connected with the diplomatic transactions of the period. He did not propose to make any Motion, but he had great hopes that the renewed consideration of this matter by the Government would lead to a solution favourable to that which he believed to be a thoroughly honest and a thoroughly just claim.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, his hon. and learned Friend had brought this subject before the House with great ability and in a very temperate spirit; but he had concluded without making any Motion. Having, therefore, no tangible issue with which to grapple, his observations in reply must necessarily be more general than they might have been had any precise Motion been submitted to the House. The circumstances of the case certainly suggested that it might be desirable to consider how long and to what extent questions of this kind could be seriously entertained. In courts of justice it was found necessary to impose some limitation of time by express enactment. And, although no mere lapse of time could be set up as a bar to any inquiry the House might think fit to enter upon, yet, when a matter so old as this, dating so far back as fifty-seven years ago, and which had slept profoundly for ten years past, was again brought before the House, it was incumbent on those who invited attention to it to show that a clear and decided case of injustice was made out. Now, he contended that the course adopted on this subject by successive Governments had been perfectly fair. Did his hon. and learned Friend venture to say, after the lapse of time that had taken place, and having regard to the facts and legal considerations attaching to them, that this case was so free from doubt and difficulty, and so clearly in favour of those whose claims he advocated, that it ought to be seriously entertained? His hon. and learned Friend had admitted fairly that there was a state of war, and that the Danes had belligerent rights. If so, the case of these claimants was untenable; for one of the most obvious of belligerent rights was the right to seize and confiscate the ships and property of the enemy afloat. His hon. and learned Friend was, therefore, driven to another argument—he would not call it another expedient. His hon. and learned Friend was driven to argue that there was something unjust and not to be defended in the conduct which the Government of that day pursued towards Denmark in commencing the war, and upon that absence of justice, and that alone, he had based his appeal to the House. The circumstances of the capture of the Danish fleet were well known. It was the intention of this country, suddenly and without notice, to seize the fleet of Denmark, so as to make it impossible that that fleet could be made use of by an enemy. It was on that seizure of the fleet that the present case arose, and the argument his hon. and learned Friend relied on was that the proceedings of the British Government were unjust, and, therefore, these British subjects were entitled to compensation out of the public funds. It would be most alarming if the House were to act upon such a view, because it came to this—that a war being undertaken by the competent and responsible authorities of the country, involving, as any war with a naval Power of any strength would do, great injury and ruin to many of the merchants of this country by the confiscation of their property afloat, that House might 50 or 100 years afterwards be called upon to vote money out of the taxes of the country by way of compensation, because the persons whose vessels had been captured and confiscated or those representing them, thought that the British Government had been wrong in commencing the war, or in not submitting to requirements by yielding to which it might have been avoided. That was an entirely novel proposition, and one for which there was no authority whatever. This, however, was the substance of his hon. and learned Friend's argument, and but for some incidental observations which he had made, he should hardly have thought it necessary to trouble the House further upon the subject. His hon. and learned Friend had endeavoured to make out what in courts of law was called an estoppel, and had argued that, as the Government had paid claims No. 1 and No. 2, they were bound to pay No. 3, and ought not to be heard in refusal. That argument implied that No. 3 stood upon precisely the same footing as No. 1 and No. 2, which was by no means the case. Claims No. 1 and No. 2 were made in respect of the confiscation by the Danish Government of book debts and goods on shore. This claim, No. 3, however, was made in respect of the confiscation of ships and cargoes afloat. It had not been laid down as a rigid and inflexible rule that book debts and goods on shore were not liable to confiscation; but that description of property, and ships and cargoes afloat, had been treated by writers on international law and belligerent rights in a very different manner. No writer of authority denied the right to confiscate the ships and cargoes of an enemy's subjects afloat; but great doubts had been expressed whether the seizure and confiscation of book debts and goods on shore were, under any circumstances, warranted by the law of nations. Vattel laid it down that a Sovereign declaring war could not retain in his dominions the subjects of the enemy, or their effects; and Mr. Wheaton said that it appeared to be the modern rule of international usage that the property of an enemy found within the territory of a belligerent State, and debts due to his subjects by the Government or by individuals at the commencement of hostilities, were not liable to be seized and confiscated as prize of war. In the two earlier cases, therefore, the Government was justified in contending that the Danish Government had violated the fundamental principles of international law, and a reasonable claim for compensation was made out in turn on the part of the British against the Danish Government, and by British subjects against their own Government. No such argument, however, could be advanced in favour of the third claim, which was now revived. It had been said that the claim might safely be acceded to, because the war in which the petitioners suffered broke out under very singular circumstances, and that a similar case never occurred before, and was never likely to occur again. But the establishment of a precedent involved the acknowledgment of a principle, which might be applied to other cases, even where the circumstances were somewhat different; and if the Government yielded in the present instance they could not, in any future war, consistently refuse to entertain the claims of sufferers who maintained that, as an unjust war was the cause of their losses, they were entitled to compensation. A most mischievous precedent would thus be created, quite at variance with the principles of international law. War, no doubt, was often the cause of heavy losses to individuals for which the State made no reparation, and the source of great gains which the State applied to its own purposes. It could not be maintained as suggested by the Petition before the House, that the State was bound to compensate the losses of its subjects out of the prizes of war. Such a proposition was as novel as it was untenable. Fifty-four years having elapsed since the occurrence of these events, and the parties interested having been engaged for at least forty-four years in agitating their claims, it was not surprising that the subject had been frequently before Parliament. Sometimes, no doubt, Parliament had been disposed to favour the claim; but it was to be observed that, on the admission of the petitioners themselves, the last three applications to the House had been unavailing. Having for ten years been allowed to slumber, the question was now again brought forward; but he believed that hon. Members would prefer to be guided by the more recent decisions of the House, rather than by any which might have been come to at a remote period, under circumstances which were now not very well understood.

MR. LOCKE said, that the arguments of the Attorney General amounted in fact to an attempt to set up the Statute of Limitations on behalf of the Government; but he did not think that that plea would hold good in such a case in any court of law; and he (Mr. Locke) was not aware of any precedent for saying that the House was prevented from remedying an injustice because it had been committed more than a certain number of years ago. The Attorney General said, there might be an equitable right on the part of persons who had goods on shore; but it seemed extraordinary that for twenty-seven years those claims which were now admitted to be just should have been resisted. It might be the law of nations to make compensation for goods landed on the quays, and not for goods afloat; but it was not common sense, and he did not believe that it was the law of nations, as he presumed that all laws were founded on common sense. The Attorney General wished the House to suppose that all seizures of cargoes in ships afloat were seizures of cargoes on board ships on the high seas; but against his bare assertion was the fact that the Commissioners adjudicated on these claims, and set down the sums of money to which the claimants were entitled opposite their respective names. He believed that the right principle to be recognized in this case was that as the nation had committed a trespass, the nation, like an individual, should be held answerable for all the results of its illegal act. The Attorney General had not said a word in vindication of what he would venture to call this marauding expedition. By the treaties which existed in 1807 between England and Denmark merchants were to have six months' notice of war. No notice was given. A secret expedition was despatched, and those who suffered from that illegal act were clearly entitled to compensation. The English merchants did not ask to be recouped their losses out of the taxes of the country. Independently of ships of war the English Government seized Danish vessels which realized £1,300,000. In 1809 they paid out of it in prize money £348,261. In 1835 claimants classed as A and B were compensated with £286,000, and the Government put into their pockets £665,739. In 1841 the Chancellor of the Exchequer stated that the adjudication ought to be carried out upon just and honourable principles. The House of Commons voted an Address to the Crown upon the subject, and the Queen returned a favourable answer; all that was wanting was a Vote of the House of Commons. A dissolution of Parliament occurred, and if he were told that with the honour of the country pledged to a certain course a new Parliament was free from responsibility, all he could say was that it was a blot upon the Constitution. He thought that the answer of the Attorney General to-night did not at all meet the statement of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Cambridge, and that no subsequent Government or subsequent House of Commons ought to repudiate the decision which a former Parlinement conceived to be honourable and just.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that there were one or two points with regard to this subject to which he wished briefly to call the attention of the House. If, as had been stated, his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had rested his case simply upon the Statute of Limitation, he did not think that argument would have been a very unsatisfactory ground for resisting the Motion; for it was a very serious matter that claims of this kind should be made without limitation of time and after a long course of years, when the interests had changed hands and it was impossible to trace the proprietary rights. But it was not the Statute of Limitations simply or mainly on which his hon. and learned Friend took his stand—it was the Statute of Limitations plus the important fact that upon three occasions consecutively the House had distinctly refused to entertain these claims for compensation. When these claims were first raised, the House, no doubt, received them with considerable favour; but it had taken a less and less favourable view of those claims as the matter had been prolonged, and in the year 1851, when a very formal application was made by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Keble), the number in favour of the claims was 49, and the number against them 116, or nearly three times those who voted in the minority. He thought that was a great fact in the consideration of the case. His hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Leake) said, he could not see the justice of making a distinction between the seizure of goods afloat and the seizure of goods on shore, and thought it better to fall back on common sense, whatever international law might say on the subject. It was true that nothing could be right which was at variance with common sense; but when they came to argue this controverted matter it was so difficult to observe where the common sense lay that every gentleman was firmly convinced that common sense was ranged entirely on the side which he himself espoused. In the difficulty, therefore, of discerning the whereabouts of common sense in these cases, the Attorney General thought it was not an unsafe course to fall back upon what was called the law of nations, which really meant the general practice of the civilized world and be guided by the concentrated wisdom of those orgaged in reducing the practice to rule. There could not be a higher authority than Sir James Macintosh, and what did he say about the distinction between goods afloat and goods on shore? Sir James wrote—

“I do not say there is a difference in abstract reasoning as applied to either, but that there is a difference according to the established practice of European nations. Maritime plunder is not in its nature as injurious as plunder on land; and in all European states there is a recognized difference between the seizure of property on the water and its seizure on the shore.”

The hon. and learned Member for Southwark, however, said the Government had invented this distinction twenty years after the fact. He denied the Government were entitled to the invention. It belonged to the friends of the Danish claims, who put forward first those portions of their case on which they felt themselves strong, and declined to encumber themselves with that portion on which they felt they were weak. Then he understood his hon. and learned Friend to fall back upon the doctrine that the war made by great Britain in this case was to be distinguished from other wars by its injustice. He protested entirely against their occupying that ground, because it seemed to him nothing could be more destructive than to introduce into the practice of the House retrospective discussions as to the propriety of wars long gone by, and to endeavour to classify them as having been more or less unjust, and then to found on these distinctions claims for compensation for individuals who had suffered by them. The allegation was that there was no regular war at the time. It appeared that on the 2nd of September the British Government had laid an embargo on Danish vessels, and the doctrine of Lord Stowell with respect to such an embargo was that if instead of an accommodation following the embargo the differences continued and were inflamed into hostilities, in that case the hostilities had a retrospect effect upon the embargo itself, and the war must be held to have commenced from the date of the embargo. All acts done subsequent to the embargo must be judged by the laws of war, and no claim, therefore, could arise for compensation in respect to any act of the Danish Government which was thus justified by the law of nations. With regard to the answer to the Address of June, 1846, to which reference had been made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was ready to make this amount of admission, namely, the terms of the answer had something of a peculiar character. He believed the true explanation of the terms used was to be found in the date of the answer. It seemed the answer to the Address was made by a Government which had been greatly distinguished by its energy in the work of legislation, but which was unhappily at the time in articulo mortis. In the same month a vote of want of confidence had been carried, and it only held office on the terms of despatching the necessary business in order that an appeal might be made to the country. Under those circumstances it was natural that the Government should decline to bind their successors, but should have left them free to advise the Crown to whatever course they might think fit. It did not lie with the House of Commons alone to award compensation to these parties. By the salutary rule and practice of the Constitution there must be the concurrence of two authorities, the Executive Government and the House of Commons. Governments of whatever politics had denied the justice of these claims. As long as there existed a disposition to entertain them, and authority was divided upon the subject, their agitation in Parliament was quite legitimate; but for the last fifteen years the House of Commons, though often solemnly challenged, equally with the Executive Government, had repudiated the demand. And, ably as the hon. and learned Gentleman had urged what could be said in favour of his case, he had laid no sufficient grounds to induce the Government to go in the teeth of such a course of precedents and combination of authority. Both on the grounds of prudence and justice he believed it would be wrong to give further encouragement to the discussion of these claims.

MR. MACAULAY said, his argument had been entirely misunderstood by the right hon. Gentleman. He had not founded his arguments upon any contention that the war between England and Denmark was an unjust war; but upon the fact that the English expedition to Copenhagen being undertaken at a time when both Powers were in friendly relations, the expedition was, therefore, an admitted trespass on the part of England. That being so, it legally provoked a reprisal on the part of Denmark; and he had contended that, according to the rules of public law, when a sovereign State did anything which legally invited reprisals by another State, the State to which the subjects upon whom those reprisals were made belonged was bound to indemnify those subjects.

OFFICERS OF THE INDIAN ARMY.

QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether Officers of the Indian Army who accept the invitation to volunteer for general service, or into the Staff Corps in India, in any way whatever compromise the rights guaranteed to them under the Act 21 & 22 Vict., c. 29, s. 56, of 1858, and the Act 23 & 24 Vict., c. 100, s. 1, of 1860, with respect to pay, pensions, allowances, privileges, promotions, and otherwise; and, whether the reported appointment of Colonel Heyland, C.B., of Her Majesty's 56th Regiment, to command the 1st Bombay Fusiliers, in supercession of the Field Officers of that Regiment, had the sanction of the Secretary of State? The hon. and gallant Member was understood to say that in the Act which transferred the Government of India from the Company to the Crown, certain rights respecting pay, promotion, and allowance were guaranteed to the local European army, and that the discontent and mutiny of the European regiments were owing to faith not having been kept with them. Subsequently, faith had been broken in the case of the degradation of the three distinguished regiments of Bombay Regular Native Cavalry by their conversion into Irregulars. Nothing could be more explicit than the guarantees in the clauses of the Acts of 1858-60, which insured to officers, all allowances they then held, also prospects of command; successors to regimental staff situations, troop, and company allowances, and other regimental allowances. Nevertheless, the conversion of these regular regiments, with twenty-three officers, into irregulars, with only four or five officers each, deprived the captains and senior subalterns of the command of their troops and troop allowances, and the officers generally of successors to office on the regimental staff, and to ultimate command of their regiments. The proposed conversion of the regular infantry into irregulars would have similarly injurious results. Moreover, the Military Commission, sitting in Calcutta have reported, that of the 5,000 European officers of the local army 1,445 officers chiefly of the senior ranks will be thrown out of employment by the amalgamation, abrogating the privileges and allowances guaranteed to them by the Acts of Parliament. Equally it would be a breach of faith to appoint officers from the Line to command the European regiments which have accepted bounty for general service, in supersession of the claims of the field officers of those troops to succeed to the command of their respective regiments. The above cases and others of a similar character have raised great distrust in the minds of the local officers, and with the exception of those officers who have volunteered with the European Artillery and Infantry, nine-tenths of the officers were deterred from volunteering either for general service or the Staff corps. He (Colonel Sykes), therefore, hoped his right hon. Friend would be able to state that, in case the officers volunteered, they would not compromise their guaranteed privileges.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that he should have no difficulty whatever in showing the House that the rights and privileges of Her Majesty's forces in India had been substantially maintained, it was proved by every communication which had been received from India. There was not the slightest reason for saying that the General Order had not given satisfaction; and so far as the returns had been received, the volunteering had exceeded all expectations, however sanguine they might have been. No returns had been received from Bombay and Madras; but those from the Bengal army showed that the troops had almost volunteered in a body. Of 8,000 men, upwards of 7,000 volunteered for general service; and about 300 declared for local service; and, of the remainder, most of those who claimed their discharge had afterwards applied to be enrolled. The whole of the officers who had volunteered certainly had not been called at once into general service, for the best of reasons — there was no possible mode of employing the whole of the officers of the Indian army in it; most of them would be employed in local duty. Of the Artillery of the Bengal army, 172 officers had volunteered for general service, 8 for local service, and 1 for the Staff Corps. Of the Cavalry, 62 officers had volunteered for general, and 17 for local service; of the Engineers, 1 officer had volunteered for local service; the others had not yet declared themselves. Of the infantry, 92 officers had volunteered for general, 102 for local service, and 47 for the Staff Corps. This showed the opinion of the officers of the Bengal army, and was the best possible proof that the question might be most satisfactorily answered. If these officers had thus volunteered for general service in the Staff Corps, it proved that they did not consider they compromised any rights, by so doing. It was a perfectly voluntary transaction on their parts. They had a free choice, and they declared either for general service or the Staff Corps, according as they thought it most to their advantage. In conclusion, he must say it would be a great injustice to His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief not to state that he had, on every occasion, shown the most anxious desire to promote the wishes of the Indian officers.

UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS BILL.

THIRD READING.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I feel it my duty, Sir, to state to the House my objections to the Bill in its present form. It was my intention, when my hon. Friend first introduced it, to take no part in the discussion on the Bill, because I felt that the seat which I hold, and which has often been the subject of contest, would naturally cause any part which I might take, no matter what it might be, to be open to misconstruction. I also felt that the Bill of my hon. Friend was one of which much might be said in its favour, while much might be said against it; it undoubtedly involved a very great novelty in principle—and on the whole, I think that the balance was against it. At the same time I admit that there was a strong prima facie presumption in favour of a Bill the object of which was stated to be to increase the facilities possessed by certain peculiar constituencies for exercising the franchises with which they had been intrusted. I did not approve the principle of the Bill which my hon. Friend introduced, but I think he is entitled to say that the House acceded to it on the second reading without the expression of any marked difference of opinion. It is not my intention to make any Motion on the present occasion. though I feel it is my duty to say "No" to the third reading, because I think the better course to take—if the House be so inclined—is to move the recommittal of the Bill. ["No, no!"] I have merely stated that, in my opinion, that would be the right course, and Gentlemen who say "No" simply assert that in my opinion that is not the right course. Being an authority on that point, I must say "Yes." I think the proper mode of proceeding would be to recommit the Bill, with a view of raising the question as between the principle of the Bill as now before us; and the principle of the Bill as introduced by my hon. Friend, and assented to by the House. I want hon. Gentlemen to understand what I really mean when I describe the principle of the Bill at the present moment as being different from what it was when the Bill was introduced by my hon. Friend. I may be wrong; but I do not believe that many hon. Gentlemen in this House are aware of the extent to which the Bill has been altered, and how deep these alterations have cut into its very essence. As I understand, the principle of the measure was this:—My hon. Friend said, "Parliament has chosen to create constituencies, of which a large number are non-resident; and, that being so, it is fit to give those non-residents facilities for tendering their votes without their personal presence, which facilities would not be necessary in the case of constituencies in which the bulk of the electors are resident. I will introduce a Bill to enable them to give their votes by voting papers." I must say that I think the Bill of my hon. Friend was prudently and well drawn for the purpose of effecting the object which he had in view. My hon. Friend did not leave it to chance in what way the votes were to be given or transmitted, he provided that the votes should be given in the form of a written declaration made before a justice of the peace, who was obliged to declare that the voter was personally known to him, and that the vote so given should be transmitted to the returning officer through the medium of a registered letter, the effect of which was to make the Postmaster General, a public officer, responsible for the delivery of the voting paper to the returning officer. Now, how did the Committee deal with this Bill? It is no longer a Bill to enable non-residents to vote by means of voting papers instead of by personal attendance. That is supposed to be its object; but it is certainly not the essence of the present Bill; and I must say that I have heard no attempt to justify the Bill as it now stands with reference to the peculiar constitution and needs of the University. The Bill is one to authorize all electors, resident or non-resident, to adopt proxies which are to give an authority to the holders either to vote or not, as they may think proper. That proposition certainly is of a most extraordinary character, and as strange and startling an innovation on our electoral law as has ever come before us. I am aware—and I admit it at once—that the change was made by a Select Committee entitled to great authority in this House, and I trust the House will not think their time wasted in the discussion of a measure of this kind, in respect to which, though it is primarily applicable only to a University constituency, the day may come when the precedent established by the Bill may be taken by those who wish to adopt it as applicable to other constituencies in the country. I believe the object of the Select Committee was to make a provision against errors in the form of the voting papers, and they, likewise, wished to make some further provision for the purpose of ascertaining the identity of the person, and the genuineness of the vote. Now, in my opinion, as regards the first of these objects, the Bill is totally ineffective; and as regards the second, it is entirely unnecessary. There is no reason why we should not have been satisfied as respects the identity of the voter with the proposal of my hon. Friend; and with respect to the prevention of errors, the mere fact of the transmission and re-transmission of the voting paper not only greatly increases the risks of error but of fraud. There is no security for the delivering of the voting papers, they may be lost or duplicated, and how could the voter who was called on to sign a new paper declare conscientiously that he was not called upon to sign it because it was cancelled? It appears to me that very great difficulties, indeed, will arise from the transmission and re-transmission of these voting papers between the proxies and principals, notwithstanding that the object of the Committee may have been to give increased security and correctness in the voting papers. The paper may be lost, and the voter will not know how the fact is. [Mr. HUNT: Oh!] I do not know why the hon. Member for Northampton should take this extraordinary course.

MR. HUNT rose, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer declined to give way. In resuming his seat, the hon. Gentleman said, I only rose to say that I meant no discourtesy.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I am much obliged to the hon. Gentleman. Now, just let us see how this extraordinary system—as I must call it—of voting by proxy is likely to work. And, first, I must consider the case of possible fraud, for the Bill takes in that view by providing penalties against it. However unlikely—I may say impossible—the case of fraud may be in a University election, yet we must include it. If we sanction these principles in University elections in consequence of what we may think of the high character and intelligence of the constituency, it will not be easy to deny to others what we give to Universities, even though we may think them of low character and intelligence. Now, let us consider the provisions of the Bill. In the first place, there is no limit to the number of proxies one person may hold. Any number of voters, without any limit whatever of a numerical description, may empower any voter to become their proxy. The only limit is that the proxy shall be able to say, on presenting the vote, that the voter is personally known to him—that he is personally acquainted with the voter. Now, take the case of the Master of Trinity College, Cambridge. The Master of Trinity is brought into acquaintance every year with, perhaps, 150 young men, a large proportion of whom become part of the constituency of that University; so that the gentleman holding that office would be able to say that he was acquainted with, perhaps, not less than 1,000 of the constituency. He would, therefore, in all probability, become the holder by proxy of many hundred votes. What is the next provision? It is that any number of voters may delegate their power of voting to any single proxy; that every voter may choose any number of proxies he pleases, and may indicate in the voting paper any number of names, by any one of which persons his vote may be tendered at the poll. I believe an unlimited number of proxies may be named by any one voter, just as any number of voting papers may be held by any one proxy. That is not all. Besides this provision, every voter who has thus given a proxy may run a race against his own proxy, and it may depend upon the accident of who gets first to the poll who shall give the vote. That appears to me to be an extraordinary provision, for which I have not heard the shadow of a reason assigned. But further than that—under the singular provisions of the Bill, the voter and the proxy may both come to the poll at once, and may both, at different polling places, tender the same vote without the possibility of any objection; and, to complete the ridiculous effect of the provision as it stands, this may happen:—A B, the voter, may go, and may in one polling place honestly tender his vote for C, while D E, the proxy, may, at another polling place, honestly tender the vote of A B for F. [“No, no!”] It must be remembered that, of late, power has been given to the Vice-Chancellor to increase the number of polling places. [Mr. DODSON: Not exceeding three.] Clause 2 says that the vote may be given by proxy at any one of these polling places, and the voter may also vote at any of the polling places. I think I have shown the climax of the errors and inconveniences which have been forced upon my hon. Friend. I have stated the effect of the provision, which would be to give occasion to an immense amount of error and inconvenience for no purpose whatever connected with the object of the Bill; and, if we are to suppose the existence of fraud, to open the door to the perpetration of frauds innumerable. Let the House remember that there is already one vicious element in a University constituency with which all those who have been connected with University elections cannot fail to be practically acquainted. It may not hitherto have told so much in Parliamentary as in other elections, but under this Bill I think it would be found more conspicuous in Parliamentary elections. I refer to the disposition towards College combinations, and the working out, through those combinations, of selfish wishes and limited views, instead of adopting the broader views connected with the whole University. College organization is in fatal conformity with the other injurious provisions of the Bill as it now stands, because, of course, the authorities of a College would be able to say that they were personally acquainted with all who had passed through the college, although their acquaintance may have diminished to the lowest degree, and a number of proxies may be accumulated in the hands of these authorities which may be intrigued with, or used as a means of obtaining an illegitimate influence over a candidate, to obtain pledges from him, and to destroy the pure and honest freedom of all parties at such elections. These are consequences for which I am determined to be in no degree responsible. I was not favourable to the original principle of the Bill, because, although the present mode of University elections has its inconveniences, still I think it has the effect of keeping up the academical constituencies in contact with academical influences; but under the system proposed by my hon. Friend, we should cease to see this academical influence operate as before. However, I do not now raise the point for contest. I challenge my hon. Friend to state why he has acceded to this extraordinary scheme, which is quite apart from the principle of his Bill—introducing between the voter and the recording of his vote a third and independent party, who may actually frustrate the intentions of the voter, subject to the almost ridiculous remedy that the voter may compete with his proxy who shall be soonest at the poll. I shall not detain the House longer, and thank it for its patient attention to a statement of details. As far as my own academical interests are concerned as a Member of this House, I do not know that it should at any time have any material interest in the provisions of this Bill. At all contested elections in which I have taken part in the University of Oxford, I have always been returned by a majority both of the resident and of the non-resident voters, conjointly and separately. I have no idea what the operation of these provisions would be as regards myself at future elections, but they are so extraordinary in their character, and so needless for the professed object my hon. Friend has in view, that I trust they will not receive the sanction of the House.

MR. DODSON said, he could not congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon the accuracy of his reading of either the original or the amended Bill. The right hon. Gentleman spoke in high-sounding words and grandiloquent phrases of the strange and startling innovation introduced by this Bill. But the provision he especially objected to was discussed in Committee for three hours last week, and the most strange and startling thing connected with that discussion was the absence of the right hon. Gentleman. If the right hon. Gentleman felt so strongly on the subject, how was it that he was not present to express his opinion and divide the Committee? Not only was there a discussion of three hours, but there was a division in which the right hon. Gentleman took no part; but within half an hour afterwards there was another division upon an Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Youghal, and upon that the Chancellor of the Exchequer voted. It would be an interesting fact to learn how far off was the right hon. Gentleman when the first division took place. When it was wanted to get rid of anything, people had only to give it a bad name, and so the right hon. Gentleman grounded his attack on this Bill by calling it the introduction of the proxy system. But he (Mr. Dodson) denied that the system of voting papers was the system of voting by proxy. The legal definition of a proxy was "one person appointed by another to represent him." That is not the description of a man who hands in a letter. The form of voting given in the schedule was as follows:—"I, A B, do hereby declare that I have signed no other voting paper at this election, and do hereby give my vote at this election for" so and so. The Cambridge University Reform Bill, on the other hand, allowed any member of the Senate to vote at the election for Chancellor or High Steward of the University by proxy. The schedule in that Act gave the form of a real proxy, which was as follows:—"I, A B, a Member of the Senate, do hereby appoint C D to vote in my name for Chancellor (or High Steward) in such manner as the said C D may think proper." The right hon. Gentleman declared that the bearer of the voting paper under this Act was a proxy, pointing out that the Act imposed no pecuniary penalty if he failed to deliver it. But if an elector had the privilege given him of voting without attending in person, it was not too much to require him to find a man on whom he could rely to deliver his voting paper. The right hon. Gentleman thought it strange and startling that the arrival of the vote at the poll should depend on the will of another. But this was very much the condition of things at present. If a voter, living ten or twenty miles from the polling place, depended upon a friend to call for him with his carriage, or to lend him a horse, or a pair of boots, and if that friend changed his mind and did not come, he must be, according to the right hon. Gentleman, the proxy; for it depended upon him whether the voter reached the poll or not. The right hon. Gentleman's next objection was the concentration of votes in a few hands at the University. He thought that this apprehension was exaggerated. The resident members of the University were continually changing. He took his M.A. degree ten years ago, and there was now only one single resident at Oxford who knew him sufficiently well to make the declaration that he was personally acquainted with him, and as this gentleman was opposed to him in politics he was not likely to send his voting paper to him. For himself, therefore, he should not send his voting paper to the head of a College, but should select some neighbour of his own who might be going to Oxford to take charge of his vote. The right hon. Gentleman had spoken of College combinations as likely to take place under this Bill. But were such things never heard of now? As to concentration of votes in a few hands, why, under the present system promises were asked for and obtained for particular persons even before they had declared themselves candidates. He held in his hand a circular issued yesterday from the University of Oxford. It was dated "Balliol College," and set forth that it was generally understood to be the intention of Mr. Gladstone to retire from the University of Oxford as soon as the Bill giving an additional seat to South Lancashire was passed. This vacancy would give members of Convocation (it continued) an opportunity of vindicating the character of the University. Sir Stafford Northcote and Mr. Roundell Palmer were likely, it was added, to be put into nomination, and, as it was desirable to secure Sir Stafford Northcote's return, voters were requested to announce their determination to vote for that Gentleman. Then followed the names of four leading gentlemen who were willing to receive promises for Sir Stafford Northcote. Now, a thousand written promises might be concentrated in the hands of one gentleman, who would thus exercise quite as much influence on an election as if he had received a few voting papers; but with this difference, that many of the promises for Sir Stafford Northcote would be coupled with the condition—"I will come and vote if you will pay my expenses." The voting papers would get rid of the travelling expenses, which, as they all knew, operated as an inducement for electors to give their votes for particular candidates. The right hon. Gentleman had also urged the number of transmissions and retransmissions of the voting paper which might take place between the elector and the bearer. The House were not bound, he thought, to inquire into this point. It was for the deliberation of the voter how his vote was to be conveyed to the poll, and if the voter complied with the provisions of the Bill he did not see that it was a matter of more concern which of the voter's friends was selected to convey the vote for him than which train he travelled by if he attended in person. Then, again, the time within which the papers were to be signed was strictly limited. The vote was not to be signed until after the returning officer had given the three clear days' notice of the day for proceeding to the election, and until that notice was given the voter could not go before the justice. Another objection urged by the right hon. Gentleman to the Bill was that the voting paper might go up to one polling place and the voter himself to another to deliver his oral vote. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: At the same time.] But Clause 2 provided that the voting paper was to be delivered at "one of the appointed polling places." Now, by the 16 & 17 Vict., the Vice Chancellor might appoint any number of polling places, not exceeding four in all, and declare what Colleges were to poll at those polling places. He apprehended that if the voting paper of a Christ Church man were presented at the polling place for Lincoln, the bearer would be told that was not the appointed polling place. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER: That is not stated in the Bill.] No, but the Bill provided that the votes were to be received by the Vice Chancellor or his deputy, "in the manner heretofore used, in all respects as if such votes had been given by the electors attending in person." Now, would it be recording a vote "in the manner heretofore used" if it were received at the polling place not appointed for receiving the votes of a particular College? The right hon. Gentleman's objection in regard to possible frauds went off altogether, for the right hon. Gentleman did not allege any danger of fraud under this Bill, but only apprehended it might be a precedent for the introduction of voting papers for other constituencies where they might lead to fraud. But the House were dealing in the present Bill solely with the University constituencies, and it would be quite sufficient if they took precautions against fraud in the case before them. The adoption of voting papers in University elections would form no precedent for their adoption in other cases, because the University electors, being chiefly non-resident, and voting in virtue of an educational franchise, presented no possible analogy with other constituencies. The right hon. Gentleman had also spoken of the measure destroying corporate or academical action; but how could he reconcile that objection with the approval he had given to the Bill as it originally stood? That supposed academical influence of University electors over each other was a pure figment of the right hon. Gentleman's own brain. Was it to be imagined that men would spend their time and money in going up to the University in order to deliberate with other people as to how they should vote? Men who were so politically undecided or indifferent as that would surely stay at home. The right hon. Gentleman talked of pledges being extorted by the heads of Houses. [The CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER made an observation.] He believed he had rightly understood the right hon. Gentleman's words, and the right hon. Gentleman's constituents would hardly feel flattered when they read his remarks in The Times to-morrow. For his own part, he had that confidence in the character of the University electors that he did not believe either that they would seek unfairly to extract pledges from their brother electors, or that their brother electors were in such a defenceless position as to submit to such a proceeding. He had now dealt with all the right hon. Gentleman's objections. That was a Bill simply intended to enable persons recognized as having a right to vote to exercise the privilege with that reasonable facility which they were at present denied. He believed it would have the effect not only of increasing the number of electors who polled at the University elections, but that before long it would very much enlarge and improve these constituencies, because when they found that they could easily exercise their franchise by means of voting papers many men who now took their names off the books would allow their names to remain there. It was rather ungracious that the right hon. Gentleman should object to a measure tending in fact to the enfranchisement of his own constituents. The vote of the right hon. Gentlemen's colleague, the Home Secretary, might at all events be claimed in favour of the Bill, on the ground of what he stated the other night in reference to the Scotch Universities. The Home Secretary had said that until lately it would have been a great objection to enfranchising the Scotch Universities, that their constituencies, unlike those of Oxford and Cambridge, would consist only of a small body of professors and a very limited number of graduates. By this measure that large body of non-resident graduates in whom the right hon. Baronet took such interest would be enabled to exercise the same influence as was now almost exclusively enjoyed by about 10 per cent of the entire constituency. He, therefore, trusted that the House would now read the Bill the third time.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had confounded the first with the second printed edition of the Bill. He had, in consequence, described the first version as containing good securities which he was now bound to confess he did not think it provided.

MR. HUNT rose to address the House; but the repeated cries for a division rendered his observations almost undistinguishable. He was understood to say that he had no wish to speak in opposition to the desire of the House, but having taken a great interest in the measure, and introduced some Amendments into it in Committee, he trusted the House would indulge him for a few moments whilst he replied to some of the objections urged by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. In the first place, he was anxious to set himself right with the right hon. Gentleman and the House in reference to the interruption which he had noticed. He (Mr. Hunt) stated at the time that he intended no discourtesy to the right hon. Gentleman. On the contrary, he could assure him that he valued too highly any criticisms he made to think of interrupting him, if he had not felt that the right hon. Gentleman was misrepresenting the provisions of the Bill. The Chancellor of the Exchequer said if the voting paper was lost, the voter might sign another paper. Now, according to the provisions of the Bill, whether the voting paper was lost or not, it was impossible for him to give a second paper. The only way left to him to correct the matter would be to come up and give his vote in person. There was an objection to the papers being sent direct to the returning officer, on which the right hon. Gentleman had not touched—and that was that votes so sent, and of which no public notice was taken at the hustings, was neither more nor less than the ballot. Besides, it did not provide any security against forgery, which, though not likely to happen, was still a contingency to be guarded against.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would not detain the House by any argument, as his right hon. Friend seemed to him to have exhausted all that could be said on the subject. But he was unwilling that the House should go to a vote on the third reading without his explaining that he concurred in the objections taken to the measure by his right hon. Friend. He thought its principle entirely new, and liable to great abuse; and if the House should agree to it, and it should be carried into practice, he believed they would soon see reason to repent of their decision.

MR. CONINGHAM expressed extreme objections to the principle of the Bill, but the cries of the House for a division were so loud and persistent that his observations were totally inaudible. The hon. Member concluded by moving, as an Amendment, that the Bill be re-committed.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "be" to the end of the Question, in order to add the word "re-committed,"—instead thereof.

The House divided :—Ayes 165 ; Noes 80 : Majority 85.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

PARLIAMENTARY ELECTORS (IRELAND).—LEAVE.

SIR WILLIAM SOMERVILLE moved for leave to introduce a Bill to prevent the disfranchisement of Parliamentary electors in Ireland by reason of their letting out portions of their holdings in the ordinary course of the occupation of the same.

MR. VANCE and COLONEL DICKSON opposed the introduction of the Bill at the present late period of the Session, when many Irish Members were absent.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That leave be given to bring in a Bill to prevent the Disfranchisement of Parliamentary Electors in Ireland by reason of their letting out portions of their holdings in the ordinary course of the occupation of the same."

The House divided :—Ayes 20 ; Noes 22 : Majority 2.

Motion negatived.

JUDICIAL ADMINISTRATION (INDIA). PETITION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH presented a Petition from members of the Anglo-India Protective Association, and others, resident in the North Western Provinces of India, the Punjab, Scinde, Rajpootana, and Central India, praying for Amendment of the East India (High Court of Judicature) Bill. The noble Earl said that the object the petitioners sought to secure was, in short, that in all criminal cases Europeans should be tried only by European Judges; and he begged to add his opinion that, in order to secure substantial justice, it would be better that their prayer should be acceded to. The late Duke of Wellington was in favour of such an arrangement, not that he apprehended that Europeans were more likely to be convicted before Native Judges; quite the contrary—he thought that they were more likely to be acquitted, for he thought that a Native would never have the courage to sentence an European to death. That might be the case formerly, but he was much inclined to think that since the mutiny, whether from a feeling of malice, or from some other reason operating upon the mind of a Native Judge, Europeans were not likely to receive a fair trial at his hands. But he was not equally favourable to their next demand—the Europeans should be tried before a single European Judge. He thought it highly desirable that in criminal cases there should be always two Judges, and that if legal gentlemen were to be sent out from this country to India as Judges, each of them should have sitting beside him an educated civil servant who understood the people, who was acquainted with their language, and who knew the law; for he was disposed to think that in most cases the English Judge would not know any one of the three. The petitioners further prayed that in all criminal cases, if the accused desired it, there should be a jury composed altogether of Europeans. He (the Earl of Ellenborough) thought there would be a practical difficulty in effecting this arrangement, for there were very few places indeed in India where it would be possible to obtain a jury composed altogether of Europeans. At any rate they should have the right to be tried by as many of their own countrymen as could be procured. It was, however, his opinion, that if there were good Judges appointed, the parties concerned would be more likely to secure evenhanded justice at their hands than by the intervention of a jury. Further, the petitioners prayed that in all cases those legal proceedings should be conducted in the English language. There was an axiom in this country which it would be desirable to have affirmed in India—namely, that both sides should be heard before a decision was pronounced. It was, therefore, desirable, before they determined that in all criminal cases of this kind the English language should be used, to ascertain how far the Natives, those for whom these establishments were principally created, were likely to assent to such an arrangement—how far they would be satisfied that the proceedings should be carried on in a language of which they did not understand one word. He could not see how the administration of justice could be respected if it were not made intelligible. The noble Earl then presented a second Petition from the Central Committee of the Anglo-Indian Protection Society. Those Gentlemen, in the first instance, objected to an arrangement made by the Secretary of State for India with the Mysore Princes, by which they had given to them a quantity of stock in lieu of annuities secured to them by treaties, alleging that by such an arrangement the Secretary of State overruled the decision come to by the Governor General and the late Mr. Wilson, and that they (the petitioners) had not been furnished with the necessary information on the subject. What had surprised him in this transaction was that the Princes should have been induced to enter into an arrangement that was so extremely prejudicial to themselves. He could only account for it from the supposition that the Mysore Princes were under the impression, as he himself was, that the transaction was not a valid one—that they had no power to bind their successors, that they themselves might take the stock, but that their successors would be entitled to the annuity. The petitioners also objected to the many charges thrown upon India without due investigation, or without any power on the part of the people of India to make representations on the subject, especially as regarded certain military charges, to which they might think India should not be made liable. He did not possess the knowledge requisite to enable him to enter into this question; but he must say it was the most solemn duty of the Secretary of State for India and his Council to see carried out in their strictest terms the provisions of the Act of Parliament, and that no charge should be placed on the Indian revenues which ought to be placed on those of England. The petitioners stated it was but absolute justice they desired when they asked that India should be placed in the position of a colony; that no charge should be thrown upon it without its consent; they also prayed that the Members of the Council of India should be permitted to sit in Parliament; that there should be a portion of the Indian Council consist of unofficial members. In short, as it appeared to him, it was insisted that in all financial matters the quasi independence of India should be established.

TREASURE TROVE.

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE rose, according to notice, to call their Lordships' attention to the present state of the law of Treasure Trove. The noble Lord said, that in Roman times there was a conflict between the right of the finder derived from the maxim of quod sit nullius fit occupantes and that of the owner of the land in which they are found, under what was designated the jus accessiones. A decree of the Emperor Hadrian divided the value between the finder and the owner of the land. In feudal times a new principle was introduced quod sit nullius fit domini Regis. This law was generally introduced into Scotland, and under it any moveable article, the original owner of which cannot be discovered, belongs to the Crown. In England, on the contrary, and Ireland, the Crown only claims gold and silver, coin, or bullion. In this country, indeed, the right of the Crown had been subjected to many restrictions. Nevertheless, such property did not belong to the finder, but was claimed by various persons to whom the right had been granted by the Crown; and the consequence was that any articles of value discovered were immediately concealed and destroyed for dicial functions—a class of functionaries now abolished in England—besides one Master occupied in accounts, and three Judges of the Landed Estates Court—in all nine Equity Judges. With regard to the last-mentioned court one instance would be sufficient to show the benefits which it conferred by facilitating the transfer of land. An estate having been bought in the Encumbered Estates Court passed into the hands of a person who wished to resell it. A gentleman was desirous to become the purchaser. Negotiations were entered into and the purchase was completed. The money was paid, the estate was transferred, and the conveyances were duly executed. The gross rental of the estate was £576 a year. The cost for stamps was £62, and the attorney's bill, including a search of the register to see that no incumbrance had been created since the Court gave a title, and the registering of the new purchase, was only £8 14s. 2d. It was obvious that the simplicity of title secured under the administration of the Court must prevent a great amount of litigation, and that there was a certainty of the business of the Court being gradually reduced. About six or seven years ago the number of cases in the court was 1,300, and in 1859 the number was reduced to 400. He held that the staff of even this Court might be easily reduced; while its affect upon the legal business of the country generally was obvious. But the point to which he wished to call particular attention was the existence of three Masters of Chancery, performing judicial duties, when those officers had been abolished in England. In the Court of Chancery in England the business was now disposed of with the utmost facility and with the greatest cheapness, while due attention was paid to legal points and legal questions. How extravagant was the staff of equity Judges in Ireland appeared by a comparison of the property administered by those courts with that managed by the Equity Courts in England. The total amount of money paid out of the English Court of Chancery in 1859 was £14,185,035. The amount paid out of the Irish Court of Chancery in the same year was £1,145,000, or about one-fourteenth. The cash, stocks, and securities held by the Court of Chancery in England amounted in October, 1858, to nearly £53,000,000. The cash, stocks, and securities held by the Court of Chancery in Ireland amounted on the 1st of January last to nearly £4,000,000. The amount of business in the Irish Court was infinitely inferior to that of the English Court, and yet the cost of administering property in the English Court of Chancery was little more than one-third that of the Irish Court. The Report of the Commission, to which were attached the names of the present Lord Chancellor of England, the present Lord Chancellor of Ireland, Mr. Blackburne, the Lord Justice of Appeal in Ireland, the Master of the Rolls in England, and several other eminent lawyers, recommended that the practice and procedure of the Irish Court should be assimilated to those of the Court of Chancery in England. The Report was presented five or six years ago, and ever since it had remained a dead letter. He felt that here he was rather over proving his case, and that it might be said there was no need for a Commission, as, after the Report to which he had referred, they might deal with the case at once. But it must be remembered that, whereas all the alterations in England had proceeded on well-considered Reports, either of Commissions or Select Committees, the alterations, such as they had been, in the Irish courts within the last thirty years had for the most part been made without previous investigation. The expenses of the Common Law Courts had, as he had shown on a former occasion, increased in proportion as the business had decreased. The staff was larger than necessary, for, while there were only fifteen Common Law Judges in England, there were twelve in Ireland. In his opinion, these twelve might safely be reduced to nine, and instead of six circuits, four circuits would be quite sufficient. As far as he could make out, two puisne Judges in England did as much work as nine puisne Judges in Ireland. When Lord Lyndhurst recommended the increase of the number of the puisne Judges in England, it was with the object that there might always be Judges to hear cases in chambers; but while in England the number of orders made in chambers in 1859 was 44,870, of which 41,325 were made without the attendance of counsel, the number of chamber orders made in Ireland in 1860 were 1,782, of which a few more than 100 only were made without the attendance of counsel. To show that the number of circuits might be safely diminished to four, he found by Returns before Parliament, that there were only five cases of homicide in 1859 in Ireland, while in England and Wales in 1860 there were 149 homicides. The commitments, too, for crimes in England and Wales were 16,674, and the convictions 12,470, in 1860; while for Ireland the commitments were only 5,865, and the convictions 3,109. In 1851 the number of judgment cases entered in the three Law Courts in Ireland was 7,229, at a cost to the public in salaries and emoluments of £17,759, while in 1859 the number of cases and judgments entered had dwindled to 3,421, and the expense had risen to £22,399. Much inconvenience arose from the practice in Ireland of the Judge framing the issues, which of course he did not on evidence of the real facts of the case, but on mere statements of parties. The consequence was that at the trial the evidence was not directed so much to the merits of the case and the rights of the real litigants as to the particular issue thus framed by the Judge. These were matters which were notorious, and he trusted the Government would not object to inquiry into admitted evils. The only objection which he could conceive to the Motion was that it would be unpopular with the legal profession in Ireland to diminish the number of places; for there could be no doubt that the effect of new regulations in the Law Courts would be to diminish the amount of public money expended on the staff of these Courts and the number of fees uselessly paid. He did not believe that any Irish lawyer worthy of his profession would take such an objection. His object was to raise the Irish Bar. He believed their Lordships' House was the only tribunal in this country at which Irish lawyers were allowed to plead, and that only in Irish cases. If the practice of the Law Courts in the two countries were assimilated, an Irish lawyer might then be brought over to plead here; and, on the other hand, he wished that facilities were given by which eminent counsel from this country might be taken occasionally over to Ireland to plead in the superior courts when knotty and difficult points of law were involved in a case. The noble Marquess concluded by moving,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the following matters with a view to reduce costs to suitors and the expenditure of the public money, and to assimilate, so far as may be practicable, the administration of justice in England and Ireland, in accordance with the recommendations of the Royal Commission of 1855:

"1. The Constitution, Establishment, Practice, Procedure, and Fees of the Superior Court of Common Law in Ireland:

"2. The Differences between the Constitution and the Forms of Practice, Procedure, and Fees of the Courts of Chancery of England and of Ireland."

LORD WENSLEYDALE thought that a clear case had been made out for inquiry. Down to 1828 the practice in the Law Courts of the two countries was very nearly the same; but since that time important changes had been made, both in the equity and the common law Courts in England, which had not been extended to Ireland. Under these circumstances it was certainly desirable to inquire which of the two systems at present existing was the better.

EARL GRANVILLE admitted that the noble Marquess had made out a clear case for inquiry in this matter, and he, therefore, on the part of the Government, would make no opposition to the Motion. He would, however, suggest the omission of the words "in accordance with the recommendation of the Royal Commissioners of 1855," which might, perhaps, have the effect of unnecessarily restricting the future Commissioners.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would, with their Lordships' permission, strike those words out.

LORD BROUGHAM entirely agreed with the Motion. Nothing could be more necessary than that such a Commission should be issued. There was one part of the subject, however, which required no Commission—he meant that of judicial statistics. It was evidently most important that there should exist judicial statistics in respect of Ireland, such as there were in the cases of England and Scotland. Whether the practice of the Courts could be in all respects assimilated, might be a fitting subject for inquiry, and might possibly demand legislation; but by a simple Order of the Treasury the system of judicial statistics might be extended to Ireland at no greater additional expense than the appointment of one extra clerk. Without these statistics it was impossible for Parliament to judge what was the effect of their legislation. One advantage of the assimilation of the practice and procedure would be that it would decrease the difficulties which surrounded appeals from Irish Courts to the Privy Council. That morning the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, with the assistance of some other noble and learned Lords and himself, had been engaged in hearing a case from an Irish Court in which the inconvenience of the different practices of the two Courts was very apparent. In this country the parties were allowed to go on pleading till they came to an issue; in Ireland a totally different course was pursued; the learned Judge there decided on the issue. He trusted that the Motion would be agreed to, and that a direction would be given that measures should be taken to secure for Ireland statistics of its judicial proceedings.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that he entirely approved of his noble and learned Friend's suggestion respecting Judicial Statutes.

Motion, as amended, agreed to.

MOZAMBIQUE—EASTERN AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

MOTION FOR A RESOLUTION.

LORD STRATHEDEN rose to move the Resolution of which he had given notice—

"That in the Opinion of this House it is desirable, without delay, to restore the Consular Authority of Great Britain at Mozambique, in order to assist the Government of Portugal in repressing the Slave Trade on the Eastern Coast of Africa."

The noble Lord said, last year, on the 25th of June, the House of Lords addressed the Crown to re-appoint the consul at Mozambique, in order to promote the execution of the treaties between Britain and Portugal upon the Slave Trade. The Address and vacancy continue. A paper has been issued to the House of Commons assigning Mozambique to a list of consulships abolished. Since then the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, in answer to a recent deputation, has again resolved to weigh the question. The Motion of last year, therefore, is not deprived of hope, and yet has hitherto been fruitless. It would be, indeed, an idle manifesto on the part of the House of Lords unless a further step was taken for its object; and I should have been guilty of idly and, therefore, unpardonably wasting the attention of the House were I to refrain now from further agitation of the subject. I shall, therefore, hope for the indulgence which your Lordships usually extend to those who, having seldom ventured to address you, do so not from choice, but from a necessity which binds them.

Much, however, as I feel the want of that indulgence, it is not because, as it appears to me, the Government are bound to view the Motion in a hostile spirit. If last year they were justified in the course they pursued, and if your Lordships, who declined to join them, were in error, since that time reasons of a commercial kind for the appointment of a consul have arisen, founded on the new demand for cotton in the world. Such reasons are immensely heightened by the very latest news we have on the slave trade. When, beyond these obvious arguments, a few years back the Government of the day, impelled by the House of Commons, resolved to send a consul to Mozambique; when every ground for sending him was justified by circumstances too well known to the world; when the very facts which led to his departure showed the peril of his absence; when the House of Lords has addressed the Crown in order to replace him; when the judgment of the House of Lords enjoyed the highest marks of public approbation—a Government which hesitates at first, which next declares the consular authority in question to be abrogated, and then, again, resolves upon deliberating, stands in a position which, if this debate should close, it would be a friendly act to them as well as to the country.

In spite of the veil which hangs over the eastern coast of Africa from Cape Delgado to Delagoa Bay, a seaboard of 1,500 miles without a British representative—a veil which in itself forms a conclusive reason for appointing one—in spite of the fact that from his absence none of our merchant men are found upon the coast, and that our cruisers seldom penetrate its darkness, it will not be difficult to prove, from the documents the Foreign Office has supplied to us, what ought first to be established—namely, the existence and intensity of the slave trade in those waters.

In December, 1859, Her Majesty's Commissioners at Havannah distinctly informed the Government that the slave trade had revived in their opinion from the channel of Mozambique. In January, 1860, Her Majesty's Commissioners at Cape Town, in their annual Report on the slave trade upon the eastern coast, explain that from Ibo four vessels have taken off full cargoes for the Cuban market; that from Quillimane negroes are exported at the rate of a cargo every month for the supply of the French settlements. And both these places are within the Portuguese dominion. In August, 1859, Sir Frederick Grey declared that the export of negroes to Bourbon, under the head of free labourers, has been carried on to an extent unprecedented, accompanied by all the evils of the slave trade. In February, 1860, Lord John Russell writes that upon the eastern coast of Africa a most profitable slave trade is carried on with little interruption. He might have said without any so far as Britain was concerned. Captain Rigby, the British agent at Zanzibar, to the north of Cape Delgado, is a witness in March, 1859, that within Zanzibar dominions a French brig of war had protected two French vessels embarking slaves against the wishes of the Sultan. In February, 1860, Lord John Russell tells Lord Cowley that up to the latest dates French vessels, long after the prohibition of the Emperor, had been shipping slaves at Zanzibar, in violation of the laws and in defiance of the Sultan. We learn from Dr. Livingstone in March, 1859, that at Quillimane the French slave trade had suppressed every other commerce. In September, 1860, Her Majesty's Commissioners at Cape Town quote Dr. Livingstone to the same effect down to the early part of April. In June, 1860, Lord John Russell tells Lord Cowley with what regret and disappointment he has learnt that the French Government no longer professes to restrain the purchase of slaves upon the eastern coast of Africa. Last of all, in his recent letter on the treaty for the supply of Indian labour, the Emperor implies that till July, 1862, the attitude of France upon this subject, which Lord John Russell had deplored so justly, will remain unaltered.

No doubt these references may be said to prove more than is necessary, or than at first it was intended to establish. Instead of merely showing the activity of the slave trade on the eastern coast of Africa, incidentally they show the vigour and tenacity of the French demand for negro labour. The illustrations of the French demand on eastern and western Africa are so frequent in these volumes that it is difficult to get out of their way, or make any fact clear without its being more or less entangled with them. And yet the illustrations were not wanting to explain it. It was long ago betrayed by the numerous attempts of the French Government to obtain from the Cabinet of Portugal the negro exportation which they aimed at; by the appeals of interested parties to the Colonial Minister at Lisbon; by the unwearied pressure of the French naval officers and delegates upon the Viceroy of Mozambique. Beyond this it outlived the firmest resolutions and strongest measures to extinguish it. In July, 1857, before the British Consul reached Mozambique, the French Government in theory renounced it, and declared, by the commander of their squadron, that no further embarkation would occur upon the eastern coast of Africa. How far this intention was fulfilled the history of the British Consul has revealed to us. In January, 1859, the Emperor himself, in a letter to Prince Napoleon, solemnly declared the termination of the system. But, as the last despatch from Lord John Russell has explained, the arbiter of Europe yielded in the struggle he was honourably eager to commence. As regards the French demand, therefore, the Government of Britain, the Government of Portugal, and at the head of France itself a mind which no adversity could shake, have all been overcome by it. The treaty which comes into force in 1862 may certainly assuage it. At the best, however, Indian labour, it is much to be feared, will cost more than African. At the best it is but an experiment which Her Majesty's Administration deserve no little credit for resorting to. A document, as well known to my noble Friend the Under Secretary as to myself, informs me that, in 1856, 40,000 Indian coolies were in Bourbon. We all know how little they sufficed to check and supersede the want of negro labour. All that time, as now, the French were able to draw coolies from their own Indian settlements of Pondicherry, Karikal, and Chandernagor. My own impression is, in spite of all these difficulties, the treaty will succeed if the Governor of Mozambique honestly abets it. While he shuts the door of eastern Africa the French demand may very likely take the channel you have opened to it. If he sits still, if he connives, if he partakes, if, like his predecessors, he becomes an interested agent and keen accomplice in the traffic, your remedy, however well conceived, will be inadequate. Slavers will not be watched, slavers will not be captured; the commanders of our squadron will not be supported, the natural resources and lawful commerce of eastern Africa will not be developed while he is opposing you. The effect of the treaty turns on his adherence to a path of independence, of integrity, of sacrifice, of danger. How far, as things stand, will he adhere to it?

A great deal is known now as to the position of this Viceroy. It is known that his salary is not only insufficient, but in the hands of men addicted to the slave trade. It is known that if he looks to ease and popularity, and the opinion which surrounds him, he must in some degree indulge the traffic. It is known that outrage may descend upon him if he sets his face against it. It is known that he is weakened by a climate fatal to his energy, at a distance from the counsels of his Government, the sentiments of Europe, and the influence of friends. It is known that no Viceroy of Mozambique, however Portugal might urge him, ever did resist the slave trade until a British representative was present to support him. What are we to look for in the want of one?

A single fact I lately ascertained from Lisbon will throw some light upon that question. The present Governor General is the same who went to Mozambique in 1857. He arrived soon after our consul. He was sent, in point of fact, by our influence. He went out with instructions, which were rather those of Britain than of Portugal, to eradicate the slave trade in whatever form it might disguise itself. He was not unfaithful to his mission. The coast of Mozambique, under his auspices, was guarded from French vessels. One of them, the Charles et Georges, whose name can never be pronounced without recalling bitter sentiments to Europe, by his authority was captured in those waters, 100 slaves having been found in her, the greater part of them obtained in his dominion. While the trial was going on France and Portugal were brought into collision on the subject. Public law was superseded. British interference was rejected. French ships of war entered the Tagus. The inhabitants of Lisbon saw their laws suspended, their capital insulted, and last of all their Treasury despoiled, because the Governor General had done his duty on this question. The Powers of the world looked on with useless indignation. Since then Britain has disappeared from Mozambique; but this deserving Viceroy still remains there. He is there, and is not likely to forget the evils he brought upon his country by his virtue. He is there, and is not likely to outlive the recollection of the wrongs his honesty occasioned her. He might well be pardoned if he fixed his eyes on the transaction in grief, in shame, and in resentment, when every mind in Europe had dismissed it; and while he does so, is it possible that without a British representative to guarantee the firmness of this country, to show she has recovered from the blow which fell on her and Portugal together, to urge him, to sustain him, and to act with him, to draw our cruisers to his aid and commerce to his harbours, he will once more expose the Government of Portugal to a distant hazard of the terrible calamity it went through? Until Great Britain rises once again over those waters can he have instructions so to do; or, if he has, can he obey them?

Another word upon this point would be superfluous. No one can contend that, as things now stand, the Governor General can be what you desire in seconding the treaty by which you hope to put an end to the French demand upon that seaboard. But many may inquire how far a reformation would ensue if Great Britain did her utmost. To resolve this question common sense at once induces us to turn to the Portuguese possession of Angola, on the western coast of Africa. What has there been our course, and what our experience? In 1843, when the mixed court was first established there, and British representatives were for the first time settled at the capital of Loanda, things were very much as they are now at Mozambique. The Portuguese authorities were all devoted to the slave trade. Mr. Gabriel, our Commissioner, saw at one time thirty slavers in the harbour of Loanda. In November, 1843, Captain Foote wrote to the hon. Sidney Herbert that the whole coast occupied by Portugal was interspersed by barracoons full of slaves prepared for embarkation under the control of Portuguese adventurers, and with the flag of Portugal above them. In another letter of November, 1843, Captain Foote denounced to the same Minister the conduct of the Portuguese Judge in the mixed court who had given a certificate to a vessel sailing from Loanda with well-known proofs of being adapted to the slave trade. The tribunal formed to check the evil was thus depraved into its instrument. In April, 1844, the Lisbon Foreign Office published a list of vessels captured by the naval force of Portugal in the two previous years; and that list includes eight vessels of their country. Such was the fatal evidence which Portugal pronounced against herself upon the western coast of Africa. The first British Arbitrator and Commissioner having both in a few months fallen victims—one by his own hand, one by the fever of the country—the outset of our policy was no less discouraging and melancholy than it has been at Mozambique. But perseverance had its consequences. Mr. Gabriel arrived at Loanda in April, 1845; and the last glaring case which he reported was that of the Veiga, in 1850. This case being one of a vessel convicted of the slave trade under aggravated circumstances, brought grave, well-founded, and not unavailing censure from our Government on Portugal. Since that time the traffic has been banished from the waters of Angola, although it flourishes beyond them to the north, from the Equator to the Congo. The modus operandi has been simple, and every volume on the slave trade would illustrate it. A British representative on shore, whether Consul, Arbitrator, or Commissioner, has obvious lines open to him for the suppression of the traffic. He may give information to the naval officers by which their labours are directed. He may keep the Governor General alive to every object of suspicion. He may see how far the laws of Portugal are executed. He may encourage lawful commerce, to which, indeed, he is essential. He may give the Government at home information and authority, without which he will in vain address the Cabinet of Lisbon. By such means the united efforts of Great Britain and Portugal, on the western coast of Africa, have reached a glorious result; and it is rational to hope that on the Eastern coast the same union would effect a similar achievement.

But granted there is no certainty in our success at Mozambique, it will appear upon reflection that we are no less bound to restore the consular authority without which success is unattainable. The authority was not set up without full consideration. A Committee of the House of Commons sat in 1853 to inquire into our treaties on the slave trade. Captain Bunt, a naval officer, commander of the Castor, who had cruized in the channel of Mozambique during 1850-1-2, gave evidence before it so full of interest and gravity that it well deserves the study of your Lordships. By him it was first alleged, representing as he did the views of naval men, that we ought to have a consul at Mozambique, as the first step to the repression of the slave trade in those waters. The Report of the Committee, who were evidently startled upon learning that from Cape Delgado to Delagoa Bay there was not an Englishman residing, although generally doubtful in its language, blazons that opinion. Soon after the office was created by Lord Palmerston and Lord Clarendon at the same time that our Government was holding a language towards Portugal which made the measure indispensable; for to be perpetually accusing Portugal about the slave trade at Mozambique, while we were parties to the evil we complained of, was something worse than inconsistent. In point of fact, for fifty years we had attempted to exert an influence on Portugal in this sense both on the East and on the West coast of Africa. In sending out the consul we took the course our previous language had dictated to us. It was not found to be superfluous or useless. The strongest illustration fell on its necessity and value. We still profess to seek the object of its agency. Without we do nothing. For it must never be forgotten that the efforts of the Portuguese authorities, the action of our cruizers, and the growth of lawful commerce are all three suspended or retarded in its absence. It was broken down by temporary difficulties which it becomes the honour of the country not to yield to but to vanquish. Acting on the policy of years and the professions of her statesmen we determined on a new attempt against the slave trade in Mozambique. And now, having incurred a check which all Europe saw, we slide into inaction. If such inaction is not on the face of it admissable, what makes it wholly inadmissable is that a degrading motive is quite sure to be ascribed to it. It must strike the world that we shrink from the necessity of defending Portugal should our consular authority engage her in that strenuous resistance to the slave trade which France may not entirely approve of. The world knows at least that since France had reason to dislike it our consular authority has vanished from Mozambique. Undue desire to escape collision with that Government will always be imputed to us, although perhaps unjustly, until we venture to restore it; and even those who do not make the imputation, will remark that we were driven back from an attempt on which we had conspicuously entered.

These views might have been urged last year. Since then a stronger ground has opened itself. The main disadvantage of suspending our consular authority has long ago been pointed to. It is the silence it imposes on our Government—if it has any modesty and recollects itself—towards the Cabinet of Lisbon as regards anything which happens on the eastern coast of Africa. But there is something worse than silence. It is language unsupported by the conduct of the Government which uses it, and open to a crushing answer from that to which it is addressed. On the 8th of December, 1860, the Foreign Secretary instructed Sir A. Magenis, our Minister at Portugal, to offer a strong remonstrance to the Cabinet of Lisbon as regards the vigour of the slave trade on the coast of Mozambique; and he has called upon that Cabinet to renew its efforts in repressing it. His intentions, no doubt, were good. At least his courage was remarkable. Few men would venture to assert that Portugal was bound to make pecuniary sacrifices—and it is only by pecuniary sacrifices she can repress the slave trade in those parts—while Great Britain shrinks from the minute and inconsiderable cost of sending out a representative to aid her. Few men would venture to assert that Portugal was bound to hazard the fearful weight of French displeasure while Great Britain keeps herself secure from a remote and possible collision with it; that we should arrogate the virtue of remonstrance and leave to them the loss and danger of attending to it; that we should bend to France by the abeyance of our consular authority, Portugal confront her by resisting negro importation, while the mentor skulks away from any part in the exertion which he preaches. If the Ministers of Portugal are unwilling to remind the Foreign Secretary of the anathema which eighteen centuries ago descended on the character who wished to clear the vision of another, his own being darker still, at least they might reply to him in terms which easily occur to us. It is too late now to cancel the remonstrance. It is not too late to support it. You cannot blot it out, but you can justify it by the measure I submit to you.

As things stand affected by the language of the Foreign Secretary, which forms a most essential feature of the case before us, but one consideration could justify a Government in pausing—that is the difficulty of finding anybody suited to the office. It requires aptitudes not always found together. If fancy was indulged in the sketch of a character adapted to it, it would light on some one who had long been accustomed to influence the Portuguese authorities, who would join urbanity with firmness in so doing, who was zealous in his opposition to the slave trade, who had succeeded in restraining it, and who could bring to bear upon the evils and disorders of Mozambique the talent and authority by which in a course of years he had reformed the situation of Angola. In Mr. Gabriel the Government would find, perhaps, that such a character exists, even if they are not able to enlist him in a service so full of danger and of honour, and for which his past career so eminently marks him. Mr. Gabriel has now been a British representative at Loanda fifteen years. He may be regarded, as in some degree, the founder of our system there. He has had to deal with no less than half a dozen Viceroys. The volumes on the slave trade abound with proofs of his tact, of his public spirit and intelligence. He is in England at this moment. But setting Mr. Gabriel aside, Colonel Rigby has just left Zanzibar, and no one can have watched the history of eastern Africa for the last few years without being struck by the many proofs which it reveals of his judgment, of his energy, and fortitude.

My Lords, whatever course my noble Friend the President of the Council may deem it right to take upon this Motion, he will have at least the justice to remember that half a century ago we entered on a certain line of conduct towards Portugal for the repression of the slave trade; that a few years back that line imposed upon us a fresh exertion at Mozambique; that the exertion broke down from causes it is possible to guard against and which increase the duty of reverting to it; that the motives which originally prompted it remain; that new ones loudly call for it; that this House, supported by the public, a year ago, advised Her Majesty's Administration to renew it; that the recent language of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, which is the language of the country, can only be invested with propriety and dignity by doing so; that the experience and power which the office wants may be obtained; that the Viceroy of Mozambique, whom our influence appointed, struggles at his post to carry out the policy we claimed while we are doubting whether to stand by him. My Lords, the object of the Motion ought to be not to gain a barren victory like that of last year over the Government, but to convince them that the proposition is one it better suits them to accept than use their power in resisting. Regard for the consistency of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary is a motive which may weigh perhaps in press the opinion of their Lordships on the Motion of his noble Friend (Lord Strathe-den). The noble Lord stated that the majority on that occasion was owing, not to the strength of the cause, not to the facts brought forward, not to the ability with which they were stated, not to the eloquence of his right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford), worthy of the cause he espoused and the name he bore—that it was not owing to any or all of these ordinary causes of an important majority in a debate, but to what his noble Friend (Lord Wodehouse) called “our letting our people go.” That was language that might have been formerly used in some of our colonies—“We had not a sufficient number of workmen on our occasion to get in the sugar, to get in the cotton, or to gather the coffee, because the weather was such that we let our people go.”

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he did not use the word “people.” He spoke of the “supporters” of the Government.

LORD BROUGHAM observed that, whether they were called “people,” or “supporters,” or “black negroes,” or “white slaves,” did not matter—the expression of his noble Friend implied that the Government exercised an authority over them by which they could be kept back or let go at pleasure. He believed that the Portuguese Government had been most zealous in their desire to abolish the slave trade on the east as well as the west coast. Great credit was due to them for their conduct on the west coast. Instead of the 60,000 negroes who used to be carried from the west coast to Brazil, the number had been reduced to 30,000, to 20,000, till at last the traffic had ceased entirely. The consequences had been most happy to the great continent of Africa. He had it on the authority of Mr. Gabriel, an extremely well-informed person, who had resided twenty-four years in the district of Lo-anda, that the improvement in that part of the country was so great that not only had the trade in human creatures ceased, but the legitimate exports amounted to £260,000 a year, and the imports to £230,000. These circumstances encouraged them to hope that no long period would elapse before that vast continent, which had suffered so much from the crimes and avarice of white men and Christians, would be freed from the slave trade. The complaint of the Portuguese was that they had not sufficient authority on the east coast, and that they were not supported as they expected to be by the appointment of a British Consul there. They believed that the support of such an officer would enable them to carry into effect their desire to extend to the east coast the blessings which had attended the suppression of the slave trade in some portion of the west. All were now agreed that the iniquitous traffic must be put down by immediate measures, and that this country had not only a right, but a duty to exercise in interposing their assistance and authority for that purpose in foreign countries and foreign colonies, as we had done in all our own dependencies. He hoped and trusted that, by God’s good providence, slavery itself would before very long be exterminated; but that could only be accomplished gradually and by peaceable means. Whoever was an enemy to the negro, whoever was a friend to slavery and to the slave trade itself, would advise hasty, rash, and violent measures, and would incite a negro insurrection, which would be the greatest curse that could happen, not only to the slaves themselves, but to the whole community of which they formed a part. The greatest of all mistakes had been committed in some parts of North America in imagining that those who were opposed to violence and in favour of lawful and prudent measures were, therefore, not hostile to slavery. His belief was that those who, like himself, held these principles and acted only by the force of public opinion were the most effectual enemies of that abominable institution.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble and learned Lord had rather misunderstood what had fallen from his noble Friend the under Secretary of State in reference to the division of last year. It was not that any moral or physical compulsion was used, because such compulsion could not be used to induce the supporters of the Government to withdraw; but, in point of fact, the Members of the House retired under the belief that no division would take place. Some of those were of opinion that it was a subject for the Executive Government and not for the House; while others, like the Earl of Clarendon and the Earl of Malmesbury, went away because they were opposed to the appointment of a Consul. He did not rise to re-open the question. The noble and learned Lord in bringing forward his Motion had stated all the points in its favour, and his noble Friend the Under Secretary had shown what objections there were to the proposal. He than that, for he had selected the person who was to be appointed. He had said that there was at Loanda a very able and excellent gentleman, Mr. Gabriel.

LORD STRATHEDEN was understood to explain that he had said he was afraid that Mr. Gabriel would not resign his appointment at Loanda for the sake of the less lucrative one of Consul at Mozambique.

LORD WODEHOUSE did not think that he had mistaken his noble Friend as to his selection. He had understood his reference to the improbability of Mr. Gabriel's accepting the appointment as a gentle hint to the Members of the other House that they should raise the salary of this Consul at Mozambique to the amount which Mr. Gabriel received as Commissioner at Loanda, in order to induce that gentleman—whom he was glad to have that opportunity of saying was a most able man—to accept the appointment. No doubt a great deal might be said on both sides of the question. He was not prepared to deny that many reasons might be given for the appointment of a Consul. Lord Clarendon, when he appointed a Consul at Mozambique, must have thought that there were such reasons; but his noble Friend, who was unable to be present that evening, had authorized him to say that he thought that this was a matter which might be left in the hands of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and that he did not think that the appointment of a Consul would be of much use unless a large squadron were placed upon the eastern coast of Africa. In point of fact that was the gist of the question. If you placed a large squadron on the coast you might, no doubt, at great expense, suppress the traffic; but if you had a squadron it would be of very little use to place one agent at some one particular point upon the coast—it would be necessary to have agents all along the shore to give information to your naval officers. On the western coast, though the Portuguese claimed the entire jurisdiction, they had establishments only at isolated points, and the coast for many hundred miles was held by a number of petty slave-trading chiefs, and we appointed Consuls, who resided in their neighbourhood and exercised great influence over them. The case was very different in the Portuguese possessions on the western coast, where no Consul could think of declaring war against the King of Portugal for anything that might occur in his district. There a

Lord Wodehouse

Consul could only remonstrate with the local authorities in a series of notes. The authorities would deny some of his statements, and promise to inquire into the others. The Consul would transmit the Despatches home, and thence they would be sent to Lisbon. They would be brought under the notice of the Foreign Secretary there, who would also contest the statements, and send to Mozambique for explanations. These would arrive in time, and would pass backwards and forwards in a similar manner. What redress could be expected from such a course? The result would be only a great deal of exasperation on both sides, and a state of things would probably arise such as made the late Consul throw up his appointment in disgust. It was an undoubted fact that the slave trade existed on that coast; but it would be useless to place a Consul there unless he had a squadron to support him in his efforts to repress the illegal traffic. On the east the Portuguese had an enormous extent of coast to which they claimed possession, but upon which they had only two or three isolated posts, and the consequence was that they had very little authority there. On the west, however, they had really solid possession of the territory which they claimed, and their power was accordingly more substantial. The Portuguese Government, he believed, were as much in earnest in desiring the suppression of the slave trade on the one coast as on the other, but they had not on each equal power to carry it into effect. This question of the appointment of a British Consul was, he was ready to admit, worthy of consideration, but he thought there were reasons for pausing before such a step was taken—amongst them was the fact that Dr. Livingstone at present held the consular appointment in the district referred to by the noble Lord, and it was desirable to see what would be the result of his proceedings before any change was made. He hoped their Lordships would show their confidence in the Government by leaving the matter in the hands of the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office, whose zeal for the suppression of the slave trade was well known, and would leave it to the Executive to decide as to the time and manner of this appointment, if such an appointment should appear to them to be desirable.

LORD BROUGHAM remarked upon the statement of the noble Lord that the vote of last year had not been such as to express the opinion of their Lordships on the Motion of his noble Friend (Lord Strathe-den). The noble Lord stated that the majority on that occasion was owing, not to the strength of the cause, not to the facts brought forward, not to the ability with which they were stated, not to the eloquence of his right rev. He did not rise to re-open the question. The noble and learned Lord in bringing forward his Motion had stated all the points in its favour, and his noble Friend the Under Secretary had shown what objections there were to the proposal. He thought with his noble Friend the Under Secretary of State that this House should not set an example to the other House of considering questions peculiarly belonging to the Executive Government, and he, therefore, appealed to the noble Lord not to press his Motion to a division.

LORD BROUGHAM said, he feared the "supporters" of the Government belonged to a class of persons described by Mr. Fergusson, a Scotch gentleman, when he said, "I have often heard speeches which changed my opinion, but I never heard one which changed my vote."

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he ventured last year to counsel his noble Friend to persevere in his Motion, notwithstanding the syren voice of the noble Earl, and he was induced to give him the contrary advice to-night. They were in all respects very differently circumstanced this year from last, because if by chance they had a superiority in argument they would certainly not have a superiority in votes. That was not, however, the reason which induced him to advise his noble Friend to withdraw his Motion, as he should himself rejoice to have the opportunity of recording his opinion, no matter how small might be the minority: the ground upon which he advised his noble Friend not to divide was this—that he could not but think that the appointment of a Consul to the east coast was in some degree damaged by this House venturing to give an opinion to the Executive Government which the Executive Government did not wish to receive, and that the broad principle of teaching this House a lesson not to interfere, but to trust implicitly in the Executive, might have prevented the Executive Government doing for a whole year what the Executive Government might, perhaps, have done if they had received no such intimation. Many of the leading members of the present Government had shown distinctly for many years that they had at heart the suppression of the oppressive slave trade. He felt bound to do justice to the noble Lord at the head of the Government and to say that through a long career the noble Lord had uniformly maintained a noble and honest policy on this subject. He would, therefore, leave the Government, free to act on what he believed would be their nobler inspirations when they felt that the House had not interposed with a vote upon a matter which should be left to the Executive Government. As far as the arguments went, he did not think that the laborious and detailed speech of the noble Lord who moved the Resolution had been answered by the noble Lord the Under Secretary. The argument used by the Under Secretary was, that a great deal had been done to stop the accursed slave trade which had been carried on for some time on the eastern coast, and that their Lordships might conclude from what had been done that a far more important step than the appointment of a Consul would be taken, if necessary, to accomplish their object. But he would remind his noble Friend that the question was not what was most important to be done. He would say to him, "This you ought to have done, but you ought not, therefore, to have left the other undone." If the appointment of a consular power on the eastern coast would materially help the great work which by other means the Government had been labouring to accomplish, why, because they had used other means, should those means, though minor and less important, be neglected? It was said that the Consul would be of no great value unless he was supported by a large squadron. There was not a shadow of argument in support of that simple assertion, and, so far from believing in the truth of it, he believed that the smallest physical support to the Consul—sufficient only to preserve him from personal violence—was all that was needed to make his interference perfectly effective. He begged their Lordships to observe that there was a great contradiction in the argument used by his noble Friend. His noble Friend said that on the western coast the Consul's influence was of great importance, because there the trade was carried on by small independent slave-trading chieftains; but that on the eastern coast his efficacy would be very little, because there he would have to do with the Portuguese and French Governments, and not with slave-trading chiefs, whom he could coerce. But then, having shown the strength of the Portuguese on that side and the absence of slave-trading chiefs, his noble Friend went on to say that the Portuguese had no strength there, and that the trade was carried on by the Sultan, whose name appeared in the papers, as an independent Power. The argument appeared to be entirely self-destructive. If the Portuguese were so weak that independent Sultans carried on the trade, the earlier part of his noble Friend's speech, that the Consul would be of no efficacy, because his influence would have to be brought to bear on a great Power, and not on independent chiefs, was altogether destroyed. But there was another ground which he begged the Government to consider. There was a power greater than the power of squadrons, and that power they wanted to bring to bear upon the eastern coast. There was the public opinion of the whole civilized world. The main result which he and others believed would come from having a Consul on the eastern coast, was that light would be thrown on deeds of darkness, which would render the perpetual perpetration of them impossible. They had now no authorized channels through which to collect information. The slave trade flourished there for the self-same reason that deeds of violence flourished where those deeds were sheltered from the observation of man. But if they were able to throw the light of civilized Europe upon the actions, not of the Portuguese Government, but of the agents of the Portuguese Government on the eastern coast of Africa, he maintained that connivance at the traffic, not by the Government of Portugal, but by the Government agents of Portugal, would be for once and for all prevented, and they would, by a most trivial addition to the expenses of their consular establishments, be striking one of the most fatal blows against the continuance of the oppressive traffic which the power of England had ever struck. It was upon this ground that he most earnestly desired to see Her Majesty's Government issue the necessary directions for the establishment of a consular power on the eastern coast. He asked his noble Friend to leave it in the hands of the Government. Many of those difficulties which were seen last year would now pass away. The conclusion of the treaty with the French Government, and the determination of the French Government to put a stop to the export of the so-called free labourers to Réunion would tend greatly to facilitate the appointment of a Consul. The Consul would be able to check the Portuguese Governors and those who, it was said, forced those Governors to connive at the slave trade, and in that way, the moral sense of the civilized world being brought to bear on the district, the consular power there established, without physical force, would be more effectual than a whole squadron, without the consular power, in checking the slave trade. He held that it was impossible for Dr. Livingstone or any other men who were there maintaining the great principles of humanity, to effect that which they desired to see effected, so long as under the seeming shadow of a Christian Power the abomination of the slave trade was suffered to continue. They must by some means make the opportunity in which to sow the good seeds of legitimate commerce. They could not supplant the slave trade where once it had established itself, by merely endeavouring to introduce legitimate commerce, because the returns of the slave trade to the chieftains were more certain and more immediate, and, although destructive in the long run to their own prosperity, it gave on the instant that for which the chieftain craved, and they could not expect the chiefs, in their present state of civilization, to forego the more immediate for the more distant returns of honest trade. They must enforce a cessation of the slave trade. The labours of Dr. Livingstone and others would plant the seeds of lawful commerce, and when those seeds had once sprung up they need not fear a rise of the slave trade again. But they must take steps to secure the opportunity; and he maintained that no measure could be more effectual for that purpose than a measure which would bring to bear on the underlings of the Portuguese Government the influence of our Government, and which, by enabling our Government to speak to facts, would enable them to bring the moral power of this country directly to bear on the whole of that seaboard. While urging his noble Friend not to press his Motion to a division, he hoped that the result of the Motion would not be lost upon the Government, and that this step would be taken, when it could be taken, not as recommended by a hostile majority in that House, but by reason, argument, and by the convictions of the great mass of the educated and intelligent people of this great country.

LORD STRATHEDEN rose to answer the appeal of the noble Lord the President of the Council. But, first, he must remark in reference to the statement of the noble Lord the Under Secretary, that as to the activity of the slave trade on the eastern coast of Africa he preferred the evidence of Colonel Rigby, Dr. Livingstone, and our naval officers, indorsed as it was and published by the Foreign Office, to any which the noble Lord the Under Secretary could advance. If the noble Lord the Under Secretary admitted the existence of the slave trade on the eastern coast, he was at least incredulous as to the French demand being the foundation of it. Not so Lord John Russell, who, in February, 1860, stated that up to the latest dates French vessels had been shipping slaves at Zanzibar. If anything could show that the Government had no confidence in their own position on the question, it was the attempt to narrow it to a question of detail which Parliament had no right to interfere with. Was it a question of detail whether Great Britain should be true to her policy of fifty years and to her language at this moment? Did not every fact and argument employed show that the question related not to detail but to principle and honour? At the same time the noble Lord who had before had the goodness to attend to him would see that it was not his object to push the House to a division. Since the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary was deliberating, since the Prime Minister had made up his mind, and since the noble Lord the President of the Council, with his wonted prudence, refrained from an opinion on the question, the prospect was as good, perhaps, as their Lordships by a repetition of their vote of last year could make it. He would only venture to express a hope that the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would go on weighing the question without a prejudice or bias, and that the other House of Parliament might hasten its decision.

Motion (by leave) withdrawn.

MR. TURNER, R.A., VERNON GALLERY.

GENERAL WINDHAM.—QUESTION.

Mr. CONINGHAM said, he rose to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Upon what principle has General Windham been appointed to the Colonelcy of a Regiment, and what military exploits has he performed to justify such an appointment?

Mr. T. G. BARING said, that when a Motion was brought forward some days ago by the hon. Member for Brighton he endeavoured to explain to the House the principle on which these appointments were made. Major General Windham stood first on the list of major generals on the ground of seniority and service for appointment to a regiment, and he was, therefore, recommended by his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief to the Secretary for War, and received the appointment to which the hon. Member (Mr. Coningham) had referred. With respect to the latter part of the question, he would ask why Major General Windham now found himself in the list of major generals of the army? and the answer to that question would be a sufficient answer to the question of the hon. Gentleman. He found that Major General Windham was promoted to the rank of major general for his distinguished conduct in heading a column which attacked the enemy's defences on the 8th of September, 1855. The Gazette of that day specified the services then performed by Major General Windham in terms most flattering to that officer. The Commander-in-Chief said—

"He felt himself unable in adequate terms to express the sense he entertained of the conduct and gallantry displayed by the troops, though this devotion was not rewarded by the success which they so well merited, and to not one were his thanks more justly due than to Colonel Windham."

This despatch was dated the 8th of September, 1855, and it was in consequence of it that Colonel Windham got his promotion as major general. In another despatch, written by his more immediate commanding officer, and of the same date, Brigadier General Windham was specially commended for his gallant conduct during the whole struggle at the Redan. There was no officer in the army who more than Major General Windham would demur to the expression used by the hon. Member for Brighton, that it required what is termed "military exploits," in order to entitle a general officer to the rewards to which his rank on the list and general service would entitle him. But this he would say, that in all circumstances, during the whole of his career in India, from the time he landed in that country till the present day, Major General Windham had done his duty to the satisfaction of the commanders under whom he had served, and in all situations in which he had been placed. So much for the question of the hon. Gentleman. But he would not be doing his duty if he did not appeal to the House against the practice of continually bringing forward in that House, not the principle on which appointments were made, but the personal claims and individual characters of officers selected for these appointments. It was not in behalf of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, or the Secretary of State for War, that he said this, but hon. Gentlemen could hardly be aware of the pain that was felt by gallant officers when, if not attacks, at least insinuations were put down on the notice paper, and discussions took place regarding them in Parliament where they had no opportunity of defending themselves.

THE BUILDERS' STRIKE. QUESTION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether a body of men belonging to the Royal Engineers have been employed by the War Department on the Barracks at Chelsea in consequence of the strike among the Masons; and, if so, whether such a proceeding be consistent with the principle of non-interference between the Masters and Men?

MR. T. G. BARING: Sir, in respect to this question relative to the progress of the barracks at Chelsea, I have to state that it was most important that the works should be completed, in order that the money voted by Parliament should be expended within the year. The works would have been stopped for the want of a few masons. In consequence it was thought that for a short time some sappers should be employed to prevent the works being brought to a stand-still; and, also, that the labourers not on the strike should continue to be employed, but who must have been discharged but for the temporary employment of a few sappers.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he wished to ask whether the sappers were furnished to the contractor?

MR. T. G. BARING: The barracks at Chelsea are constructed by contractors: but the sappers were furnished not to benefit the contractor but in the service of the Government.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. QUESTION.

SIR FITZROY KELLY: Sir, not seeing the noble Lord at the head of the Government nor the Law Officers of the Crown in their places, I beg to ask any Member of the Government, What is the course which the Government proposes to take upon the discussion which is appointed to take place with respect to the Bankruptcy Bill and the Amendments made by the Lords in that Bill? It is of extreme importance that the precise course to be taken should be announced in sufficient time to enable those who wish to take part in the discussion to well consider the subject.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: The Amendments on the Bankruptcy Bill will be taken on Thursday, and the noble Lord at the head of the Government will state, either this evening or to-morrow, the course which the Government will take on the principal Amendments introduced into the Bill by the Lords.

SUPPLY.

Order for Committee (Supply) read; Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

THE SECESSION WAR IN AMERICA. QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether he had received any further complaints of the treatment of British subjects in the secession States, and to make a statement upon the subject? What he particularly wanted to do was to set himself right with the House with regard to a statement which he had made on a former occasion, when he thought he was rather hardly treated by the hon. Members for Liskeard and Galway (Mr. B. Osborne and Mr. Gregory). The question he then asked of the noble Lord—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is out of order in referring to a former debate.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he merely wished to set himself right on a personal matter. On the former occasion he was told by the hon. Member for Liskeard that his statement was "an old woman's tale;" and by the hon. Member for Galway, that the information which he had received was from persons who knew probably less than he knew himself. He (Mr. Duncombe) on that occasion stated that the Southern states of America, the Confederate States, had offered 20 dollars for any prisoner, whether man woman or children, taken dead or alive. This was contradicted; and he was told, and the House was told, that this statement was not accurate. Since that he had endeavoured to ascertain from the United States how far he could be borne out in the information which he then gave to the House; and he had received an answer which fully bore him out, in the shape of an Act of President Jefferson Davis and the Congress of the Southern states, passed at the end of May. From the 10th Section of that Act it appeared that the Confederate Congress offered a bounty of, not 20, but 25 dollars for every man, woman, and child captured on board a United States vessel and brought into port alive, while a bounty of 20 dollars was offered for every such person if dead. He also had to make a grave charge against one of our Consuls in the Southern States for having neglected his duty towards a British subject. He (Mr. T. Duncombe) wished to know from the noble Lord whether he had received information upon that point? The last post had brought him a letter from New York to the following effect:—

"New York, June 21.

"We have several Englishmen here, who have experienced the tender mercy of Southern hospitality and also the inutility of any appeal to our Consuls at Southern ports. Three or four complain most bitterly of their treatment, and state that they had to escape concealed in the cargo of a steamer, and had appealed in vain to the Consuls.

"One intelligent young man spent some time in Savannah, and was present at the period of the tarring and feathering an English captain, and he assures me he saw there the Consul wearing Secession colours; and that when a reward was offered for the discovery of those guilty of the outrage on the British captain, the ringleader delivered himself up, claimed the reward, and, after a few days of imprisonment, was liberated to pursue his career of lawlessness. I understand the British Consul at Savannah, in the right of his wife, is a slaveholder, and I cease to wonder no proceeding can be taken in defence of Englishmen."

He thought this was a matter that required looking into, as it was impossible that justice could be done to British subjects under such a state of things. He wished to know whether the noble Lord had received any complaint to that effect from any of those parties, and, if he had, what steps he had taken, or would take, with respect to it?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had not received any complaint of the conduct of our Consul at Savannah. There was a complaint with respect to the outrage in tarring and feathering the captain of a British vessel, and some correspondence took place with the British Consul on the subject. But he thought that occurrence happened before the Secession, and it had, therefore, nothing at all to do with that question. [MR. T. DUNCOMBE: It occurred in May last.] There was a rumour that a British captain had been ill-treated and beaten. A great mob assembled, and he was tarred and feathered. But the British Consul did all that it was possible to do under the circumstances. He had received no complaint that the British Consul had worn Secession colours. If that was true it was a very improper thing on the part of a British Consul to wear party colours.

PUBLIC BUSINESS.

QUESTIONS.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the Pensions (British Forces, India) Bill, which stood for a second reading that night, had only been delivered that morning, and he did not believe that ten Gentlemen in the House had read it. He, therefore, trusted he would receive an assurance from the Government that the Bill would not be brought on that night, and that fair notice would be given with regard to when it should be brought on.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, that the noble Viscount at the head of the Government had promised to announce on that day what measures would be proceeded with and what measures would be abandoned during the present Session.

SIR FITZROY KELLY hoped the noble Lord would state at the same time what course the Government intended to take with reference to the Bankruptcy Bill.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he had stated that on that day or the next he would make the announcement to which his hon. Friend had referred. The Bankruptcy Bill would come on on Thursday, and to-morrow he would be able to state more distinctly what course the Government intended to pursue upon it.

COLONEL WILSON PATTEN said, his question had reference to the business generally of the House, and what particular measures the Government intended to abandon.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, there were not many measures about which there was any doubt. The two most important were the Elections Bill and the Highways Bill. If possible, he would bring on the Highways Bill on Friday morning, but that would depend on the progress made with the Bill of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, which stood on the paper for that day. There would then remain only the Elections Bill, and he would state on a future day what course the Government intended to take upon that measure.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he hoped to receive from the Government a decided answer with respect to the course the Government intended to take with regard to the Greenwich Hospital Bill. The Bill was likely to excite a great deal of discussion, and unless he received satisfactory assurances he should give it his warm opposition. It was too late in the Session to discuss the Bill, and it would be for the Government to say whether it would not be better to give it up, to deliberate upon it during the recess, and to introduce another Bill at a certain period next Session.

MR. MALINS said, he thought it rather too early to take the Bankruptcy Bill on Thursday, if the noble Viscount only intended to give notice on the next day of the course which the Government intended to take. If he told the House that night what he intended to do, the country would know on Tuesday morning; but if he postponed his statement until the next day the country would not know until Wednesday, and there would not be time to communicate the views entertained as to the proposed Amendments before the Bill came on. He was surprised to find that the Government had not by that time made up their minds on the Bill. The Session, as they all hoped, was so nearly drawing to a close that there was no time to be lost.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is the intention of the Government to go on with the Greenwich Hospital Bill.

MR. PEEL said, the Pensions (British Forces, India) Bill was brought in jointly by the India Office, War Office, and the Treasury. It was simply to increase the contribution of the Indian Government to the non-effective charges for the army in consequence of the employment of British troops in India. There would be no objection to postpone the Bill till the next night.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he wished to ask whether it was intended to proceed that night with the Lace Factories Bill, and the Windsor Suspended Canonries Bill? He also wished to call attention to the circumstance that since it had been settled that public business should commence at a quarter past four o'clock, hardly any of the Ministers had been in their places at that time. He thought that if it was impossible for the Members of the Government to attend at a quarter past four o'clock, it would be better to fix the commencement of public business for half-past four o'clock.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS stated that all those Members of the Government to whom notice had been given that questions would be addressed to them were in their places at the proper time. In reply to the question of the noble Lord, he had to observe that the Committee of Supply would not probably sit that night until 12 o'clock, and he would bring on the Lace Factories Bill as early as he could.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, it would be convenient to the House to know when the Election Law Amendment Bill would come on.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it certainly would not come on that week.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked whether the Government intended to go on with the Municipal Corporations Act Amendment Bill? It was his intention to move the clause which stood in his name on the paper.

MR. LONGFIELD asked if it was the intention of the Secretary for Ireland to go on with the Registration of Births and Deaths (Ireland) Bill, and the Fairs and Markets (Ireland) Bill?

MR. CARDWELL said, that both these Bills had received attention from a Select Committee, but they had only recently been printed and circulated. If he found they were still likely to give rise to much discussion he would not attempt to make progress with them; but, if he found they were likely to pass without much discussion he should proceed with them.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he also wished to ask what was to be done with the Greenwich Hospital Bill? He did not think there was much chance of carrying it, and he should like to know whether it was intended to bring it on the next night.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to know what was to be done with the Trade Marks Bill?

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he must press for an answer with regard to the Greenwich Hospital Bill.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he understood that the noble Lord, the Secretary of the Admiralty, had put the Greenwich Hospital Bill on the paper for the next evening (Tuesday) by arrangement, to meet the convenience of the right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington). He believed it was the intention of the noble Lord to go on with the Bill the next evening, if it came on at a reasonable hour.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE was understood to say that since the tarring of the British captain, to which he had referred, and which occurred before May, other tarrings had taken place in May.

THE IRISH EDUCATIONAL SYSTEM.

RESOLUTION MOVED.

MR. BUTT said, he rose to move, as an Amendment to the Motion for going into Committee of Supply, the following Resolution:—

“That, in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient, in distributing the Grant for the purpose of Irish Education, to enforce the rule of refusing aid to all schools in which religious teaching is made a part of the general instruction of the School.”

His object was to raise the question, in which the people of Ireland felt a deep interest, namely, whether in the education in Ireland aided by grants from the State they should not enjoy the same freedom for religious instruction, whether Protestant or Roman Catholic, which existed in England. The sum they were now asked for on account of Irish education was no less than £285,000, and the more liberal the House was in voting money for that purpose, the more necessary it was that Irish Members should take care that it was applied in the way intended by Parliament.

MR. SPEAKER said, it was a rule of the House that a Vote could not be discussed when the House was not in Committee of Supply.

MR. BUTT said, he did not wish to discuss the amount of the Vote; but in discussing the general system of Irish national education he was entitled to say that a very large sum of money was asked for carrying out that system. The grant had grown up from £30,000 a year to nearly £300,000, and under the system a sort of educational corporation had arisen, which did many things not originally intended to be done. He did not mean to deny that much good had been accomplished in Ireland by the grant for popular education. It had, undoubtedly, given education to a number of the people who without it would not have received that education. But to understand the precise nature of the good which had been done it was necessary to recur to the past history of education in Ireland. Immediately after the Revolution the Roman Catholic people of Ireland were prohibited by law from education. It was not merely that no assistance was given to them, but it was made felony for a Roman Catholic priest to instruct his people, or for a Roman Catholic schoolmaster to teach the youth of his faith. Before the Union the Irish Parliament granted money liberally for education, but it was voted exclusively for Protestant education, and for the purpose of converting the Irish Roman Catholics to Protestantism. It failed entirely in that object, and Protestantism rather fell away than was increased by the course taken. The next step was the adoption of the Kildare Street system, under which grants were made to schools—Roman Catholics as well as Protestant—provided that the Scriptures were read in the schools. In Catholic schools the Douay version was used, and, at first, the Roman Catholics were supporters of the system; but they subsequently became very much opposed to it, and in 1831 the Earl of Derby, then Chief Secretary of Ireland, instituted the present system. For some time the Roman Catholics received the education given under it without objection; but almost all the rules originally laid down by the Earl of Derby had been departed from, and a new system had grown up, to which both the Protestant and Roman Catholic populations objected. The objections of the Roman Catholics had been stated by their bishops, and they were, in fact, that a system was required of which religion should be a part. The Protestant part of the population also objected to the plan, and in April last one of the most influential meetings ever held in Dublin took place of the Church Education Society, at which the present system was objected to, and a new one asked for which should command the confidence of all classes of Her Majesty's subjects. The system required was that which prevailed in England. It had been said, and, perhaps, would be said again, that the existing system had a hold on the hearts and affections of the Irish people. Well, he believed anything that gave the Irish people education would have a hold upon them. But he asked the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, if he could find a single Irish Member who would rise in his place and say that his constituents approved of the present system? Then, if that were so, to persevere in the system was to go on enforcing a rule against the wishes of the whole Irish population, and maintaining it in defiance of the whole people. What was the object of this? Was it that the Government wished to be the guardians of the faith of Roman Catholics? The bishops and clergy of that faith told them that they did not require it. Would the Government say they wished to guard the faith of Protestants? The Protestant clergy said they did not require it, and asked for another system. It might, indeed, be advanced by those who held the contrary opinion that the number of the schools in connection with the system had been increased, but he would remind hon. Members that the Kildare Street Society, when undoubtedly proceeding in opposition to the wishes of the great majority of the people of Ireland, made the same boast. Again, he would probably be told that the system promoted combined education. Of all the delusions that were ever attempted to be palmed off upon the public that was the greatest. In proof of that statement he might refer to the return which he had obtained, giving the proportion of Roman Catholics and Protestants in the schools supported by Government grants. It appeared that there were a large number of schools in which there was but one solitary Roman Catholic on the books, with from 100 to 300 Protestants; and, on the other hand, 300 to 400 Roman Catholics and only a solitary Protestant on the books. And yet it had been represented that in 3,000 schools, comprising 300,000 children, united education was being imparted. In the return 478 schools were put down as giving an united education simply on the ground that one solitary member of the minority appeared on the books; 283 because there were two; and 286 because there were three. He might also point out the fact, that although the principle of inducing the members of the different religious persuasions to act conjointly as patrons to the schools was sought at the outset to be fostered, the efforts made in that direction had not been attended with success. Now that these facts had been revealed no one would venture to say that there existed anything like united education in Ireland under the system; and he asked why, under the circumstances, it should be considered necessary to impose any restriction upon religious instruction? In England there was no rule imposing such a restriction. A Roman Catholic in England could send his children to a school where they would be brought up under the superintendence of his own clergy. It was not so in Ireland. The national peculiarity of the Irish people of all persuasions was that a feeling of piety mingled itself with all their transactions. A reverence for religion prevailed in their outward demeanour to an extent unknown in other countries. Yet it was to the Irish people that they applied a rule which excluded from Government aid all schools which made religion a part of their education. Experience showed that it was vain to set ourselves against the feelings of the nation. The Irish heart burnt for freedom of religious instruction, and by granting that boon they would increase the advantage of the national system, extend education to a class which now refused it, make it more beneficial to those who received it, and strengthen the ties which bound the Irish people to the British Parliament and the British Crown.

MR. MACEVOY seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'in the opinion of this House, it is inexpedient in distributing the Grant for the purposes of Irish Education to enforce the rule of refusing aid to all Schools in which religious teaching is made a part of the general instruction of the School,"—instead thereof.

MR. LEFROY said, he was induced to take a part in this discussion more in consequence of the tone of triumph in which his right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland had lately proposed the grant for the National Board, than from anything in the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Youghal. The hon. Member had stated many facts which could not be denied, whilst the observations with which he brought them before the House led to inferences in which he (Mr. Lefroy) could by no means concur. It would not now be necessary to discuss the several topics in that speech, as the hon. and learned Member said he did not propose to take a division, but only to express his views for future consideration. With respect to the success of the National System in Ireland, which he must say had been so extravagantly extolled in a late debate by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland, though it could not be denied that a certain degree of benefit had been conferred by the distribution of so large an annual grant, yet he maintained (on evidence that was produced on the Motion of the hon. Member for Youghal) that the advantages were small in proportion to the sum expended, whilst the Church Education Society, on a small voluntary grant, effected much more in proportion, and carried on united education to a much greater extent. He (Mr. Lefroy), therefore, maintained that this society was entitled to a share of a grant that was called a National one. He could not but feel how much the opinion, even in this House, respecting the usefulness of the National System must have changed, when he recollected that, on one occasion, when he expressed a doubt as to the benefit of that system he was violently attacked in succession by three right hon. Gentlemen, who had filled the office of Secretary of Ireland under different Governments, each contradicting his statement, and advocating the system. He would be curious to know how many independent Members of the House would this evening maintain the opinions of these right hon. Gentlemen? Since then the constitution of the Board which presided over its working had been greatly altered, and the religious books which had at that time been used in the schools had been discontinued. The result was that the members of the Board, who had enjoyed the confidence of the country—he would not say of the Protestants merely, but of the country generally—had felt it their duty to retire from their offices. Dr. Whately, the Archbishop of Dublin, had so retired because, as he himself declared, the principles on which the system was founded had been abandoned; because books, such as the Evidences of Christianity, and books of religious poetry which had received the approval of the Roman Catholic Archbishop Murray, had been withdrawn from the schools; and because, in a school in which there were ninety-nine Protestant boys and only one Roman Catholic, if that Roman Catholic boy objected to the reading of a particular book that book could no longer be used. Lord Justice Blackburn and Mr. Baron Greene had also retired from the Board for similar reasons. He should confess, however, that he did not wish to see the Educational Board wholly destroyed in Ireland. They should have the National Education in that country administered through a Board, or else they should imitate the system which was adopted in England. In Ireland, where money was granted for the promotion of education, without any local subscriptions, a Board was, he believed, the fittest body for presiding over the employment of the fund. The English system was denominational, and the sums given by the State were in proportion to the sums raised by private subscriptions; and under such a system books which taught particular creeds were used in the schools. He believed that such a practice would work most unfavourably for the Protestants in the south of Ireland, where a large majority of the population were Roman Catholics. Besides, he feared if the public grants were to bear any proportion to the amount of the local contributions the great work of popular education would be neglected in many of the poorer Irish districts. He could, however, assure the Government that the changes which had been recently introduced into the working of the system in Ireland had wholly deprived it of the confidence of the great mass of the Protestants of that country. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in presiding upon a recent occasion over a meeting of the British and Foreign School Society, expressed his belief that the best education for this country was a Scriptural education; and the late Dr. Chalmers, as also William Allen Gurney and Lord Brougham, had strenuously advocated the necessity of placing the Word of God in the front of all our teaching. He (Mr. Lefroy) honoured those opinions as worthy of a great and enlightened British statesman, and asked the noble Lord to extend them to Ireland, where the authority of the Scriptures was equally acknowledged. He should not think of stopping the grant, but he would never cease to press on the House and the Government the importance of the Bible being made the foundation of all teaching. He thanked the House for the patience with which they had listened to him.

MR. MACEVOY said, that the question under consideration was one of great importance, and he regretted that the hon. and learned Gentleman had not brought it forward at an earlier period of the Session when there would have been a better opportunity for discussion, and obtaining the real opinions of hon. Members upon it. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs had admitted that a Ministry which, as regarded England, inscribed "Education without religion" upon its banners would not have a long duration. It was a matter of regret that the Irish Members were not sufficiently powerful in that House to compel the adoption of that system of education in Ireland which the noble Lord knew was the only one that would be tolerated in England. It was clear from their Report that the Commissioners who had so ably conducted an inquiry into education in England, were opposed throughout to the mixed system as it existed in Ireland. It was impossible to read one page of their Report without finding it stated that nothing but the denominational system could secure a religious education. That was stated with regard to England, and why should a different system be forced on Ireland? Now, what was the actual case with regard to the national schools in Ireland? They professed to afford combined literary and separate religious instruction; but would the House believe that the way that was done in the case of 3,500 schools, or three-fourths of the whole that received aid from the State, was by making it optional with the patrons of the schools whether there should be any religious instruction whatever given in them. Then, with regard to the remaining 1,688 schools, which were vested in the Commissioners, one of the rules stated that in the event of any child objecting to religious instruction being given during school hours, the Commissioners retained the power of saying whether or not religious instruction should be given. So that, in point of fact, there was no religious instruction necessarily given in those schools at all. There were 91,742 Protestant and Dissenting children in the national schools, of whom 83,742 were in the province of Ulster alone. That left 8,000 Protestant and Dissenting children to represent the mixed system in the other three provinces. Those 8,000 children were divided among 3,541 schools, which would give two and a half of those children to each school, and, as the attendance was only one-third of the number nominally on the roll, there was in reality less than one child to represent the mixed system in those provinces. Was it not preposterous, therefore, to maintain that the system was a success? Why the system was tolerated at all in Ireland was owing to the fact that the majority of the Catholics were the poorest portion of the population; therefore, to expect to establish a national system on the voluntary principle would be to expect an impossibility. It was not true, however, to say that voluntary efforts were wholly wanting. He had moved for a return, which, for some reason, was not given, of the money which had been voluntarily subscribed for educational purposes, his object being to show that it was entirely unfair and untrue to state that, whereas in England popular education was mainly supported by voluntary subscriptions, in Ireland it was entirely a matter of State aid. Three-fourths of the schools, or, as he believed, a greater proportion, had been built by the people themselves, while the State had not contributed a farthing; but in England vast sums were given to aid in the building of schools. But if the mixed system could be objected to on the grounds which he had stated, how much greater objection must there be to the model schools? The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) said the other night that it was understood in 1834, when these model schools were first suggested, that there should be twenty-six of them—one in each of the twenty-six districts into which Ireland was divided for educational purposes. But the schools had not been built in accordance with that understanding, some of them having been built close together. But if it were objectionable that children should be brought up in schools where all religions were mixed, the principle was still more objectionable in the case of those training schools where the persons were to be instructed who were to educate the rising generation. The Commissioners stated that religious differences bore more on the education of the teachers than on that of the children. There was a feeling in Ireland that it was perfectly useless to bring forward such matters, that Parliament was not disposed to extend the same consideration to the feelings and prejudices—if they would have it so—of the people of Ireland as to those of the English people. It was very unfortunate that such a thing should be constantly told to the people; but it would be still more unfortunate if the course which Parliament took should be such as could lead to no other possible conclusion. He hoped the opinions of the Government on the subject would not be long sanctioned by Parliament. He thought they had been deceived, and he was certain the more the subject was discussed the more clearly it was shown that it was impossible to combine literary and religious education in Ireland. He would conclude by expressing a hope that at no distant date Parliament would give such a declaration on this subject as would be in accordance with the feelings, not only of the Roman Catholics of Ireland, but also of their Protestant fellow subjects.

MR. CARDWELL said, he would not enter upon a long argument with his hon. and learned Friend, who would, he trusted, not take the sense of the House on the Motion, but allow it to go into Committee of Supply. The hon. Member for the University (Mr. Lefroy) was an original member of the Church Education Society, and he desired to establish a claim on the part of that society to participate in the grants. But was the hon. Member prepared to concede the same claim to all other societies which could establish the same Parliamentary grounds, and which refused to recognize the infallibility of his opinion? If so, there was no alternative but a denominational system for Ireland. Did he, on the other hand, mean to say that the general principle of education in Ireland was to be analogous to that of the Irish Boards, but with one exception—namely, that the most wealthy religious body, with the smallest number of poor to educate, should benefit as against the poorest community, who had the largest proportion of children to educate? If the hon. Gentleman did not contend for the denominational system he had put himself out of court on the present occasion. The real truth was, that at the beginning of the century a Committee was appointed composed of dignitaries of the Establishment and men of the first consideration in Ireland, who recommended the application of this denominational principle. For a time that experiment was tried, but with so little success that in 1824 a very small proportion of children, and especially of Roman Catholic children, were under instruction, and a new Commission was appointed to inquire into the causes of that disappointment. That Commission made a Report, and in 1828, and again in 1830, seriously recommended to Parliament the adoption of their recommendations. In 1831 those recommendations were embodied in the memorable letter of the Earl of Derby, which was the foundation of the present system of education in Ireland. It had been stated that the education given in these schools was a secular education, and the Motion implied that religion was excluded from the common education of the school. That, however, was erroneous, for any one who would go into the schools, or read the popular works published by the Board, would know that that which was professed by the Earl of Derby at the beginning, and by Archbishop Murray and his colleagues in the earliest Report of the Board, was the principle of the system—namely, a common education in which all Christians could participate during school hours, and that during the other hours the patron of the school, whether Roman Catholic or Protestant, should have the fullest liberty to give his own instruction to the pupils, provided he did not insist on the attendance of those children whose parents objected. It was by adhering to that just and equitable principle that the complete failure of 1830 had been converted into a great and signal success. He should always insist that the increase in the number of schools, from a very few in 1830 to 5,600 schools in 1861, and those annually increasing, was a proof that Parliament had discovered the means so long desired of giving the greater portion of the poor of Ireland the benefits of a common Christian education and of separate religious instruction. He believed that the Earl of Derby had never at any period of his life departed from the principle he had laid down in 1831, and what at this day was the guiding principle of education in Ireland. It was said that the principle had been changed. The application of the principle might wisely be changed according to the exigency of the times, but no one could contend that these two principles had been infringed—the imparting an excellent education during school hours to every denomination, and at other hours a distinctive religious education, which no child was to participate in against the will of his parents or guardians. These principles were adopted originally by the Roman Catholics. In 1840 the Presbyterians became attached to the Board. The Wesleyans followed in 1859. In 1860 the Primate of Ireland gave his accession to the Board in that memorable letter, in which he recommended the clergy, when they had the means of supporting their own schools, to do so, but to avail themselves when it was necessary of the assistance of the State. The House of Commons had distinctly supported the present system by decisive majorities; and he trusted that it would long continue to receive the support of Parliament and to diffuse the benefit of a sound and extended education throughout Ireland.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he did not wish to prolong the discussion, or to prevent the House from going into Supply. But, as he had taken a course on the question not altogether the same as that adopted on his side of the House, he could not allow the observations of the right hon. Gentleman to pass wholly without notice. He had always confessed the great advantages conferred upon Ireland by the system of National education, with all its imperfections. He had, moreover, always felt the force of the argument constantly used by the Government against any change—namely, that the system was so nicely balanced that if disturbed in the slightest degree, for every scholar brought in, a dozen or two would be driven away—that he had always refrained from pressing any modification of the system. He had entertained no more earnest desire than to see whether, either by some alteration in the practice of the Board, or by the removal of the conscientious scruples entertained by those who were opposed to the Board, it would not be possible for the opponents of the present system to come in and acquiesce in the rules of the Board. In that state of things, after a number of the clergy, influenced by the advice of the Primate, had joined the Board, it occasioned no small surprise to find that the Government, who had declared again and again the utter impossibility of making any change in the system in favour of any party, effected some of the greatest changes ever made since the system was first established, almost without notice, and certainly without consultation with the persons interested. The changes he referred to were chiefly those in the constitution of the Board, in respect to the books used by the Board, and to the mode in which the system was to be applied to the nun's schools. Did the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland believe that, if the changes made since the letter of the Primate had been made before, that letter would ever have been written? After that letter a number of clergy gave in their adhesion to the system; but that process had since been checked, and it was perfectly vain now to hope that it would go on. So much, then, for the Established Church. He would next take the case of the Presbyterians, for the House had been misled by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary's statement that that body were firmly attached to the Board, approved the rules, and were satisfied with all that was done. Within the last ten days there had been a meeting of the General Assembly in Ireland, and a committee of that body reported that they had waited on the Chief Secretary in reference to these changes, urging that they entailed a departure from the original plan set forth in Lord Stanley's letter. Thereupon a motion was made for the appointment of a Committee of Vigilance, and the motion was unanimously assented to by the General Assembly. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had also referred to the Methodists, who, in 1859, taking things as they then stood, put their schools under the Board; but they were now entirely of the same opinion as the Presbyterians as to these changes, which they deemed to constitute a radical alteration of the system of education, and which they considered ought to be watched with jealousy and anxiety. He believed that if these changes had taken place two years ago not one congregation of Methodists would have joined the Board. With regard to other portions of the populations interested in Irish education, he thought that a strong proof had been given in the course of these discussions that Protestant and Roman Catholic Gentlemen on both sides of the House were of opinion that the state of affairs in connection with the Board was anything but satisfactory, and he conceived that it would have been better for the right hon. Chief Secretary to have abstained from that triumphant and jubilant tone which he assumed when he proposed the present Vote. He sincerely believed the changes in question made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had thrown back for a quarter of a century the course of education in Ireland, and the chance of procuring a system acceptable to all parties.

MR. MORE O'FERRALL said, that as one of the earliest supporters of the system, he wished to address a few words to the House. He would take up the history of education in Ireland where the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary had left it. He (Mr. O'Ferrall) was for a long time a staunch supporter of the Kildare Street system. But at length the proselytizing spirit grew so strong in it that he withdrew from it the schools that were under his care, and very generally the system was abandoned. In 1831 they had the letter of Lord Stanley, which proposed to establish a system of education in which there should not be a suspicion of proselytism. The first step, however, in the carrying out of the new plan was to appoint five Protestant Commissioners and two Roman Catholics, to superintend the education of 7,000,000 of Roman Catholics and 1,600,000 Protestants. Then as to the books which were issued by the Commission, it should be borne in mind that they were compiled exclusively by Protestants, and in progress of time there had been sent out some books most objectionable to Roman Catholics—among others, the Archbishop of Dublin's Evidences of Christianity. It was only after a number of other circumstances had come to his knowledge that he found he could no longer place confidence in the system. Something had been said about the adhesion of the Presbyterians. That adhesion was given because a particular rule on which the Roman Catholics relied as a security against proselytism was mitigated and changed to obtain the support of the Presbyterians. The rule had been that when religious instruction was given children of a different religion should be obliged to leave the school; but it was changed so that it stood that no child should be forced to remain while religious instruction was given. The effect of that was shown in the return, which showed that a large number of Catholic children were receiving Protestant instruction in Protestant schools. Again, the evidence given before a Committee of the House of Lords proved that it was no uncommon practice under the altered rules to give Protestant instruction to the children in school hours. Further, it had been shown that the system had become completely a Government system, and was more under the authority of the Government than any other department of the State. The House and the country ought to be jealous of placing the whole of the education of the people in the hands of the Government; and yet with regard to education in Ireland the Government could do in that what he would defy them even to attempt in any other public department. It was also a matter of fact that, while the religion of the Scotch people was carefully guarded, and the schoolmaster in that country was obliged to take an oath that he would inculcate no doctrines at variance with those of the Church of Scotland, no such safeguard was provided in the case of the Roman Catholic or Protestant children who received instruction under the National System in Ireland. So far was that from being the case, it was, he believed, an undoubted fact that there were 1,200 children in Ireland being taught doctrines different from the religion professed by their parents. He had further to state that strong objections were entertained to the model schools which had been established by the Commissioners—or rather by the Government, for the Commissioners counted for nothing—on the part of Roman Catholics, and, he believed, on the part of members of the Protestant persuasion, these schools being vested in the Board, who appointed the masters and monitors, and who could introduce into them precisely such books as they pleased. Wherever the Government had put one of these schools the Roman Catholic Bishops had put a Christian Brother school, so that in many parts of Ireland schools were established on the voluntary system, supported by subscription, in order to counteract the effects of the Government schools, over which the Roman Catholics had no control. It might be well to teach the theory of agriculture in the parochial schools, but the Government, not satisfied with that, had got a model farm near Dublin, which was a curiosity in its way, for established facts were there treated as matters of experiment. The model agricultural schools and the model agricultural farms were sources of great expense. He should not object to the cost if the schools and farms conferred benefit, but they did not do so, because the boys were so well treated, their living was so good, and they were so comfortable in every respect, that they would never go back to the country. If they became stewards they were hard to please; but the fact was, he believed, that hitherto the pupils had all emigrated, and they had proved most successful emigrants. In reality, therefore, we were spending enormous sums of money for the benefit of agriculture, not in Ireland, but in America and other countries. The agricultural schools and farms, in short, were perfectly useless, and the best proof of their inutility was that the balance-sheet was always against the public. He could not help thinking that if the salaries of the parochial schoolmasters were raised, and if they were required to teach the theory of agriculture, the model schools and farms might be dispensed with. He was glad to see an inclination on the other side to admit—even the hon. Member for Dublin University had admitted—that there were such persons in Ireland as Roman Catholics. No Roman Catholic could object to Protestants being allowed to teach Protestantism in their own schools, and he for one had not the least objection that in Roman Catholic schools the Bible should be read under Catholic superintendence; he thought that would be a great advantage. But what he protested against was that a person of a different religion should expound the Scriptures to Roman Catholic children as he pleased, and not in a Roman Catholic sense. Churchmen, Presbyterians, and Roman Catholics should be allowed to teach their own religion to their own children, and all that the State had to do was to see that within the schools receiving Government aid the secular education was a good education, that nothing was taught prejudicial to the laws and constitution, and that loyalty and all the duties belonging to a good subject were inculcated by the masters.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, as several hon. Gentlemen have alluded to me in the course of this debate, I may be permitted to say a few words. I certainly have maintained, with respect to England, that it is a great advantage to give a religious as well as a secular education to the poor, whether the schools are supported either wholly or partly by the State or not. That is a principle which I have always held; and, indeed, as a member of the British and Foreign School Society, I could have held no other. In England the National Church proposes reading the Scriptures in school daily. The British and Foreign School Society also proposes that the Scriptures should be read daily. The Wesleyans say that the whole of the Bible should be read. The Congregational and other societies say the same. The whole of these bodies, then, comprising the great majority of the people of this country, are in favour of religious education. The Established Church, it is true, think that the Catechism should be taught likewise; but all parties agree as to the general character of the religious education to be given in schools. I think it is a great blessing that it should be so in this country. The Scotch generally, whether belonging to the Established Church, to the Free Church, or to the United Presbyterian Church, teach the doctrines which are contained in the Shorter Catechism and the Westminster Confession of Faith. They, therefore, have the advantage of a religious education. Admitting, then, that a religious education is a great blessing, and maintaining, as I do, that education is not complete without it, the question occurs whether it is possible to adopt that system in Ireland. Towards the beginning of the century the Kildare Street Society, which taught the Scriptures, but not the formulas of the Church, was established in Ireland; but it was suspected to be a proselytizing society, and excited jealousy on that ground. My noble Friend Lord Monteagle then had a Committee of this House, in which he proposed means by which children of different religious persuasions should be brought together. The Report of that Committee was the foundation of the letter well known as Lord Stanley's letter, in 1831. I believe that letter contained the basis of the best system which could be applied to Ireland. It is said now, as in the Resolution before us—Why not allow religion to be taught in the schools? Meaning thereby that the religion to be so taught is to be taught to every child in the school. This raises the very great question whether you should have the denominational system in Ireland, as you have the denominational system in England. If you teach the Bible to every child that comes to a Protestant school, and if you assist that school by grants, you will violate every principle of equity if you do not give the same aid in the amount that would be required to Roman Catholic schools, where the religious education would be under the direction of the Church of Rome. Supposing that £280,000 were asked as a grant from this House you may safely reckon that about £200,000 of that would be given to Roman Catholic schools. Common fairness and equity would require that; but, on the other hand, when I have spoken to hon. Members of this House who were strong Protestants of the equity of such a division of the public money, they have pointed out that these Roman Catholic schools would be watched with extreme vigilance. I have no doubt that they would be watched with much vigilance. What would be the consequence? There would be no end of religious and sectarian controversy in this House with respect to the nature of the education given in these schools. Those who object to the grant to Maynooth—and I see an hon. Friend of mine opposite (Mr. Spooner) who has frequently brought that question before the House—would have much stronger objection if they saw so much as £200,000 more asked for Roman Catholic schools. I believe, therefore, the best way for peace—the best way for the instruction of the people of Ireland—is to persevere in the present system, according to the principles of Lord Stanley's Letter. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) says that the Presbyterian body in Ireland are dissatisfied with what my right hon. Friend has done, and he referred to a proposition that there should be three Commissioners appointed by the State, of whom one should belong to the Established Church, another to the Wesleyan body, and that a third should be a Roman Catholic. Now, considering the proportion that Roman Catholics bear to Protestants in the population of Ireland, where would be the fairness of the Commission, being two-thirds composed of Protestants and only one-third Roman Catholic? a Commission formed to superintend the education of the poorer classes in Ireland, a much greater proportion of the poor than of the rich being Roman Catholics. I own I think such a Commission would not be applicable to Ireland. Seeing, as I am sorry to see every year, proof of the extreme keenness of religious feeling and jealousy of one another among parties of opposite opinions in that country, I know of no better system than that which is at present adopted. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. O'Ferrall) who spoke last talked of 1,200 Roman Catholic children, being taught as Protestants. That, surely, could not be the case if ordinary vigilance were exercised by Roman Catholics. But I will state what my right hon. Friend has done. Formerly there were five Commissioners, of whom only two were Roman Catholics; what has been done is to appoint as Members of the Board ten Protestants and ten Roman Catholics. That number, I think, gives a security to both Protestants and Roman Catholics, and I own I should be very sorry to see any material change in the system. There are 800,000 children being educated under it. It is a system which has had to encounter rocks and shoals, but it has steered and navigated its course between them successfully; and I do not believe that a better system could well be adopted.

MR. MONSELL said, he could not help thinking that the argument of the noble Lord, in reply to his right hon. Friend (Mr. M. O'Ferrall), was rather humiliating to that House. He said it was desirable to maintain the present system, considering the feeling of the House. He did not use the word; but his meaning was that the bigotry of that House would not consent to deal with the large majority of the people of Ireland who were Roman Catholics as they did with the Roman Catholic minority in England or any other religious denomination. How did the noble Lord answer the statement of his right hon. Friend? The noble Lord doubted whether the statement was true that 1,200 Catholics were receiving Protestant education in Protestant schools. But the fact was true beyond all controversy. The original principle laid down by Lord Stanley's letter, to which every supporter of the system always appealed, and which had governed it during the first seventeen years of its existence, had been entirely diverged from. That principle was that every suspicion of proselytism should be got rid of. He warned the Government that, unless they recurred to that principle, it would be utterly impossible for them to maintain the system at all. The model schools, which cost £20,000, and in which the schoolmasters were trained who should educate the Irish people, were absolutely and entirely in the hands of the Commissioners. He protested against that as an encroachment on constitutional liberty. The Emperor Napoleon took similar measures, because he desired to control the minds by directing the whole education of the people. But it might be asked, had any harm occurred? He would quote the words of a gentleman who had given the most able evidence before the Royal Commission—he meant the Rev. Mr. Blakesley, better known by his signature to the letters he wrote in The Times, as the “Hertfordshire Incumbent.” Discussing the expediency of having a denominational system, or having a system from which particular religious doctrines were excluded, that gentleman said that while it was a pernicious thing that education should be separated from religious instruction, it was no less an error to suppose that if a school happened to be set up on that principle good could not proceed from such education as it furnished. The writer added—

“The true description of such a system would be that so far as it goes it forces the rising generation to live upon the existing moral and religious capital, and thus tends to bankruptcy in some future generation.”

If the natural tendency of the system was mischievous, they were justified in protesting against it, and in endeavouring to have it remedied. Three-fourths of the whole number of schools in Ireland were non-vested or separate schools, in which one religion was taught, but if one child of a different persuasion appeared, that child received the secular without the religious instruction. On the other hand, the training schools, where the masters were reared, were managed on a principle not in harmony with that on which the non-vested schools were conducted, but rather in harmony with the principle of the vested schools, which formed only one quarter of the entire number. He must thank the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland for the changes he had already made in the system. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns) had stated certain objections to those changes, but with all his acuteness he had not assigned any grounds for them. For himself, he desired to see those changes carried further, by putting the model schools in harmony with the majority of the other schools. The model schools were now entirely under the control of the State. The same was the case with the Queen's Colleges, where there was hardly a pupil who was not paid for being in those institutions. The length, in fact, to which State interference was carried in Ireland ought to arouse a wholesome constitutional jealousy against its further progress; and what he asked was that the Government should treat the people of Ireland in the matter as they treated the people of England.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, the complaints made by my right hon. Friend who has just sat down resolve themselves into this—namely, that we do not extend to Ireland, with regard to the educational grant, the same principle which is acted upon in England. Let us examine the justice of that complaint. I do not understand my right hon. Friend to say that he thinks the denominational system, as practised in the administration of the Privy Council grant in England, should be applied to Ireland. The substance of his complaint was that in certain particulars the rules laid down at the commencement of the Irish educational system have been deviated from. That is a question essentially of detail, and I can only say on the part of the Irish Government that it is not admitted that there has been any material deviation from the original character of the system. My right hon. Friend argues that the State unnecessarily interferes with the administration of the grant in Ireland, and that such interference is unconstitutional. Now, is there really the smallest ground for maintaining that there is any difference between England and Ireland in this respect? Is not the grant for education in England entirely under the control of the Privy Council? It may be true that the system on which that grant is administered differs from the system on which the Irish grant is administered. In England the system is denominational, in Ireland it is not; but the interference of the State is neither greater nor less in the one country than it is in the other. [Mr. MONSELL: No!] My right hon. Friend may say “No,” but I defy him to show that the expenditure of the English grant is not followed out into the most minute details by the Privy Council. If my right hon. Friend had been present when my right hon. Friend the Vice-President of the Educational Committee of Privy Council made his statement, he would have heard that as regards every payment the Privy Council sends the money, and sees that it reaches the individuals for whom it is intended. I say, then, that a more minute interference than that exercised by the Privy Council never existed. [Mr. MONSELL: It does not interfere with the teaching.] I maintain that not only does it interfere, but that it is bound to do so, and that where we vote public money we must see that it is administered by persons who are responsible to Government and to Parliament. As guardians of the public purse we should neglect our first duty if we made large grants and then gave them to irresponsible individuals to be administered at their discretion. What, therefore, my right hon. Friend calls unconstitutional I maintain to be strictly constitutional, and also to be the established and invariable practice in England no less than in Ireland.

MR. BUTT said, that with the permission of the House he would withdraw the Amendment.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wondered at the hon. and learned Member taking this course; his proposition was so simple, so easily understood, and so true. He must object to the Amendment being withdrawn.

The House divided:—Ayes 36; Noes 6: Majority 30.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee,

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that there were various items in the Vote, for which the public ought not to pay. He particularly referred to the sums asked for music-masters and agricultural schools. There were more than two agricultural schools in every county in Ireland, seventy-four in all. Now, he admitted that agricultural schools would be of great advantage in England, but it was unjust to apply the money of the English ratepayers for the maintenance of such schools in Ireland. He should, therefore, move the omission of the item (£13,000), not that he would grudge it to give education to the Irish people, but he should not assent to such a Vote to spare the pockets of the Irish landlords, who were the persons who would be advantaged by the improvement of agriculture, and ought to pay for it.

MR. MONSELL said, the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had stated that there was the same amount of Government control over the model schools in England that existed in Ireland. In opposition to that statement he would refer to the evidence of Dr. Lingen, who affirmed that a "central office which undertook to educate the people, appointing and dismissing the schoolmasters and managing the schools by its own officers, would be an intolerable system in England." Yet that was the system followed in Ireland.

MR. MAGUIRE: I rise in pursuance of a notice which I placed some months ago on the paper—namely, to call attention to the inadequacy of the payments to national teachers in Ireland, and to the necessity of making provision for teachers incapacitated through age or ill-health. I shall confine myself strictly to the scope of my notice, and not refer to the broader subject of the particular system of education which now exists, or the principles on which it is based or carried on. At the close of last Session I entered fully into the questions of the mixed and denominational systems of education. To what I said on that occasion I have nothing to add, and nothing has occurred since then to alter or modify the opinions which I then expressed. I cannot, however, avoid congratulating the friends of the denominational system upon the extraordinary advance which their course has made, as evidenced conclusively by the almost unanimous testimony borne to it this night by Irish Members at both sides of the House. The immediate subject to which I now solicit the attention of the Committee is one of the very greatest importance. It does not merely concern the interests of the national teachers of Ireland, although there are 5,636 in number, but it involves the well working of the entire institution. Whatever the nature of an educational system may be, all will admit that it cannot prosper unless the teachers, those who love to bear the heat and burden of the day, are comfortable and contented with their position. Unless the teachers are of a superior character, and able to devote all their energies to the prosecution of their work, it is impossible that any system can be effectually carried out. It is not to the able or wise management of a central department that a great educational institution owes its success—it is to those whose duty, whose exalted duty, it is to impart instruction to the youth of the country. If the National System does ever take root in Ireland, and lays hold of the affections of the people of that country, the result will not be owing to the Commissioners or to the inspectors, but to the village teachers. In Ireland the village teachers are divided into three classes, and each class is further divided into different grades. I now speak of the male teachers, who number 3,141 in all. The first class consists of 423, the second, of 972, and the third of 1,746. The first class, consisting of 423, are paid, on the average, from all sources, the sum of 18s. 9d. per week. The second class, consisting of 972, are paid, from all sources, an average of 14s. a week. But the third class, which consists of 1,746, are only paid an average of 10s. 3d. a week. That is the average; but of this 1,746, there are 812 who receive only £18 a year from the State, and about £5 a year from all other sources; and those two sums put together make but £23, or a fraction over 9s. a week. Now 9s. a week is the average rate of wages paid to an ordinary labouring man in the neighbourhood of any large town or city in Ireland; and yet this is the payment which is awarded to the teacher, to whom is entrusted the duty of instructing the youth of a country. I need scarcely add that the condition of the vast majority of the national teachers of Ireland is and must be one of constant humiliation, and that so far from being happy and contented, they suffer galling poverty and bitter privation. The remuneration of teachers in England is quite different. The average payment of the Irish male teacher, from all sources, is about £31 11s. 4d., and of the Irish female teacher £27 12s. But in England the average salary of a male teacher is £94 3s. 7d., and of an English female teacher £62 13s. 10d. More than 60 per cent of the English male teachers enjoy free residences, and the English female teachers have over 50 per cent of the same. By the Scotch Parochial and Burgh Schools Bill, now before the House, it is provided that the minimum salary given to schoolmasters is to be £35, and the maximum £70. This payment is not to include fees; and I have been informed that the average salary of the Scotch schoolmaster will be about £80. Not more than 6 per cent of the Irish teachers possess a dwelling rent-free, while, as I have said, the majority of English teachers enjoy that important privilege; and in Scotland the rule is that every teacher shall have a house with three rooms, besides a piece of land. Out of their miserable pittance the Irish teachers have to provide themselves with a house, in most instances a cabin, or hovel, while I could mention cases where they are compelled to repair to the school-house. I have shown the rate of payment in England and Scotland, and I shall now quote a passage from the admirable work of Mr. Arnold on Popular Education, which has been published by the Royal Commissioners in their Report, showing how teachers are dealt with in Holland—a country which can bear no comparison with this, whether in population, wealth, or importance. Mr. Arnold says—

The Royal Commissioners, in their valuable Report, thus describe their idea of a teacher's natural qualifications for his task—

If the Irish national schoolmaster were so fortunate as to possess “a quiet, even temper, patience, sympathy, and fondness for children,” is it possible that he could preserve “habitual cheerfulness” upon nine shillings a week? More than 50 per cent of the national teachers are married, and it is to be presumed that many have large families; and it need scarcely be said that the burden of a family adds much to the privations caused by an insufficient income and false position. For the teacher is compelled to keep up a certain appearance. He is generally about the third person in importance in the country village; and while, in many instances, his pay is little above that of the day labourer, he cannot dress as the labourer does—he cannot afford to wear a broken shoe, or a tattered coat, or to appear in the same coarse garb of which the working man is not ashamed. Indeed, it is a fact that were they to dress in what might be considered an unbecoming manner, they would be remonstrated with. I may give a case in illus-tion of what I state. A teacher—one of those, I may mention, whom I had the honour of introducing to the noble Lord at the head of the Government—informed me that he was engaged on one occasion, after school hours, in giving instruction to some of his pupils in elementary horticulture; and previously to going into his little garden he prepared himself for its mud and clay by putting on a pair of old shoes and an old coat. One of the head inspectors, Mr. Kavanagh, happened to be passing by, when his attention was called to the manner in which the teacher was employed. Mr. Kavanagh justly complimented him upon the manner in which he was thus engaged, but remonstrated with him in private upon his appearance. The head inspector told him that if he dressed in that way he would run the risk of losing the respect of the children, and thus impair his authority, and that he in his own person ought to set an example of neatness for his pupils to follow. Now this teacher happened to be placed in an exceptional position, for he was in the receipt of something like 16s. from all sources; but what an insulting, heartless mockery such a reproof, however kindly meant it was in the case of my informant, would have been had it been addressed to one of the 812 teachers who, from all sources, are only in receipt of 9s. a week. Before going further, I may say, in referring to Mr. Kavanagh, whose name has been referred to before this evening, that the Board never possessed an abler or a more zealous servant than this gentleman; and that in all that he has done since the hour when he surrendered his lucrative office, for motives that did him honour, nothing has ever occurred in any way unworthy of him as a man of upright and independent character, or inconsistent with the duty which he owed to himself, his religion, and his country. The same teacher informed me of a fact which helps to exhibit the rate of wages now given to labour, even of the rudest kind, especially in the neighbourhood of towns. Attached to his school, he had a piece of ground, given to him, I believe, by the patron. This ground he could not cultivate himself, and he employed a common labouring man to plant it with potatoes, and for that task he had to pay his labourer at the rate of 10s. a week. But suppose, instead of having 16s. a week, this teacher had only 10s. or 9s. a week, only imagine the educated, cultivated, and trained teacher of youth paying for this rude and unskilled labour more than he received for the discharge of the most important and responsible duty with which a man can well be entrusted. There is evidently something wrong in the whole system, as proved by the small percentage of attendances as compared with the number of children on the rolls. Why is this? Because the heart of the teacher is not, in many instances, in his work—because he cannot be contented with his position—and because in some instances he is not of the class to be able to acquire influence over the children, and secure their punctual attendance. I wish to add to the just authority and influence of the village teacher; and I cannot do that more effectually than by raising his condition, and making him contented with his lot, which he cannot be so long as he receives the wretched remuneration to which I have described. Now, the cost of management is proportionately greater in Ireland than in England; and instead of the sums granted by Parliament going to the teachers, whose condition ought to be improved, they are wasted and frittered away on most questionable objects. I have been assured that the estimate now before the Committee is not the estimate which was prepared by the Commissioners, and sent by them to the Treasury—which department, I am happy to say, does exercise a salutary control over this expenditure. The right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary can set me right if I state what is incorrect; but I have been given to understand that the Commissioners asked for a much larger sum. This increase was for the purpose of adding something like 30 or 40 per cent to the salary and other charges for the inspectors; but these 66 gentlemen are largely and liberally paid at present, and I certainly will not consent to add one farthing either to their salaries or travelling expenses until full justice is done to the teachers, who form a more important body than any other under the Board. I must admit that the cost of management is much greater relatively in Ireland than it is in England, as I shall proceed to show. In England the expense of inspection is £43,164, and of the central administration £16,776, making a total of £60,000, within a fraction. This on the whole sum just voted by Parliament for education in England—namely, £724,000—is 8½ per cent, or one-twelfth of the whole. Let us now turn to Ireland. The expense of inspection there is £22,840, and of central administration £14,319, or a total of £37,159. Thus, on a gross sum of £285,376, is 13 per cent, or one-eighth of the whole—showing that the expense of management in Ireland is not very far from double what it is in England, and I am sorry to say the result of this system of education, which is managed at such cost, is not by any means so flourishing as the right hon. Gentleman has represented it to be. Nearly half the children on the roll have not got beyond this book (the hon. Member here held up a little primer). This is the First Book of Lessons; and I shall read one or two exercises or questions from it—about the deepest problems it contains. One of these grave questions is, “Do pigs chew the cud?” Another is, “Can a foal pull a coach?” These, no doubt, are interesting enquiries, and calculated to develop youthful intelligence; but this is the maximum amount of intellectual acquirement that nearly 50 per cent of the children in daily attendance arrive at, and this certainly is no splendid result. Such a state of things is not to be found in the schools of the Christian Brothers, which schools, happily for the cause of education, are now scattered through the country. This grand result contrasts most unfavourably with the proficiency of the pupils in the schools I allude to, in which I venture to say scarcely one-tenth of their pupils would be found so backward. My remedy for this is to raise the condition of the teacher, to give more interest in his work, and to enable him to exercise more control over the attendance of his pupils. There is one fact in connection with this subject to which I desire to draw special attention, and that is the great proportion of teachers who, having been trained at the cost of the State, have left the profession, and either emigrated or sought more remunerative employments. The number of teachers who have been trained is about equal to the number now on the roll—that is, 5,636. These include 1,151 who are classed as “probationers.” The number of trained teachers now employed under the Board is 2,791, whereas the number of teachers not trained is 2,845. Where have the rest gone? A small percentage of them have died, and a few perhaps may have found their way to the workhouses; but the great majority have emigrated, or have found other avocations. The State has lost, or expended, something like £100

by the training of each of these teachers with no possible advantage to the public, though it was certainly of great advantage to the individual to have received such a training. The remedy for this is obvious. If they are better paid they will have the best inducement to remain in the service; but now they are ready to yield to every temptation to leave, and to carry their education and intelligence to other countries. I have referred to the payment which the Irish teacher receives from other sources as being an average of £5 a year in each case. I am quite aware that the State grants to the Irish teacher a larger sum in proportion to his gross income than it does in the case of the English teacher, and that the amount given from school fees and other sources in England is vastly greater than it is in Ireland. This I must frankly admit. But I must, in explanation, take the marked distinction between the circumstances of the two countries—the one a rich country, with abundant employment for its labouring population—the other a poor country, whose population are mostly dependent on agriculture for their means of existence. Now, though an average of £5 or £6 from all local sources, as supplementing the payment given by the State, may seem a small sum in English eyes, it is not so in Ireland. It may be asked, why should not the funds from local sources be increased? My answer is that any attempt to increase them in many instances might be attended with great inconvenience, and only defeat the object which all would have in view—that is, to increase the attendance of the children. Let hon. Gentlemen remember that the education thus offered by the State is not intended for the children of those who are able to pay, but for those who are but little raised above the rank of actual poverty. Thus, for instance, the larger number of the children who attend the village school are the children of the cottiers and day labourers—men whose ordinary pay is about a shilling a day. Now, it is not at all times that the labourer is employed. It is true his labour is in requisition when the sun shines, and when the weather is dry; but there are weeks and months when, from the severity of the season, there is no demand for his rude labour. I ask, supposing a poor man of this class have three children of an age to be sent to the National School, could he afford to pay 3*d.* a week for their schooling? It would be a cruel and wicked rule which would attempt to exact it. In the schools of the Christian Brothers, and in the schools of the Presentation Monks not a farthing is asked from the children; and yet while the daily attendance in the National Schools is not more than 45 per cent of the number on the roll, the difference between the number of children on the roll and in daily attendance in the schools of the Christian Brothers is a mere trifle—nothing like 10 per cent of the whole. I should myself like to see the teachers better supported by the locality; but I must be content to wait for a much greater improvement in the condition of the country before I can expect any marked increase to the local contribution towards the salary of the teacher. But what is the teacher to do in the mean time. Is he to starve on a miserable pittance?—is his mind to be distracted with the mean and sordid cares which want and misery bring in their train?—is he to be kept in his present position of galling humiliation and hourly privation? With the increasing cost of the necessaries of life, and the inexorable law of gentility which compels him to wear a better coat than his neighbour, how is it possible that the teacher can exist on 9s., 10s., or even 12s. a week. In most countries of Europe, a teacher is required to pass only one examination to qualify him for his position; but for every grade an Irish teacher rises he has to pass a fresh examination. I do not object to this if the teacher is well paid. But if he is compelled to undergo new examinations he must have time and leisure for self-improvement, or he can never rise above his first position; and how, after having spent his day in the hard drudgery of his school, can this poor man, whose mind is distracted by the constant presence and pressure of want, be expected to devote himself with energy to the task of self-improvement? or if his life is to be one continued exercise of his intellect, in his school and out of his school, surely he is entitled to something better than his present wretched remuneration? I have shown how numbers of teachers have quitted the profession after having been trained at the expense of the public. In France I find that the same course is producing the same result. But in France more honour is paid to the teacher than in Ireland. In France the Government gives the teachers crosses and decorations and braided coats; yet I mistake not if the French teacher would not prefer a little less honour and a little more pay. In Ireland the teacher has no honour whatever and a very miserable pay, so that his fate is far worse than that of his French brother. Mr. Arnold, in page 150 of his Report has this most important passage—

“ At present the lay teachers in France tend to quit the profession as soon as they can for some more profitable career; if it were not for the inducement offered by the exemption from military service, it would be difficult to recruit their ranks. It is in vain that the State offers to them the lure of honourable mentions, medals of bronze and of silver, and even the rank of academic officer, with the privilege of wearing an official coat, with a palm embroidered on the collar; these public distinctions to the teachers are excellent but they are of no avail so long as he is utterly underpaid.”

Poor Irish teachers get no decoration. They wear no crosses on the breast. In this case, such decorations would be a bitter mockery. The only cross bestowed upon them is the heavy cross of poverty—and that cross they have too long borne. The only other point to which I shall now refer is the necessity for some adequate provision for the teacher when incapacitated by old age or ill-health. There is provision made for the worn-out horse, but none for the worn-out teacher in Ireland. The gentleman sends his old horse to spend the rest of his days in a rich paddock, but the teacher has no resource save the charity of his friends or the workhouse. The only provision for the national teacher consists in this—that in some instances a sum is given equal to one or two years' salary; but when that is eaten out, as it must be in two years, there is no resource left but starvation or the workhouse. Now I have a case painfully in point. There is a teacher who, with his wife and six children, is now an inmate of the Manorhamilton Workhouse, in Ireland. This unhappy man was a teacher for thirty-seven years of his life, seventeen of which were spent in the service of the Board. In 1858 the Commissioners granted him a sum of £51. That was equal to about two years' salary; but when that was consumed, which it necessarily was in that time, he was compelled to betake himself to the last refuge of the destitute—the workhouse. Now, that is a sad conclusion to a life of labour in the public service. No class in the community is entitled to greater sympathy than the worn-out teachers. They cannot become mechanics in their old age, and their avocations have utterly unsuited them for rude labour; so that they positively have no other resource save that of the workhouse, if they are not to rot on the road side. I do not ask, in the name of the teachers of Ireland, that anything shall be done for them this year more than whatever is proposed in the present Estimates; they are quite willing to wait one year more, confident in the justice and compassion of Parliament, and in the belief that Commissioners will be emboldened to make such a fair demand in their behalf, in the Estimates of next Session, as will help to place them in a position in which they may be able to prosecute their onerous duties without the pressure of the same cares and anxieties which now harass their minds and depress their spirits. For my part, I have no apprehension whatever of increased Votes for education. £50,000 or £100,000 more, whether for England or Ireland, is a matter of no possible moment, and ought not to cause the slightest objection in the mind of any hon. Gentleman. We never hesitate to grant one million, or two millions, or three millions, for warlike purposes, to build new ships of war, or, as the phrase is, to remodel the navy; and yet we must admit that from such an outlay very little advantage results to the country. But every shilling expended in education brings its own fruit in the greater intelligence of the people. On the score of the strictest economy, as well as for the best interests of education, it is absolutely necessary that the teachers, upon whom success of any system rests, should be better paid than they are. I now only ask for an expression of sympathy in the object of my notice from the Committee; and I shall only say, in conclusion, that nothing would tend more to render an educational system useful to the Irish people than by enlisting the earnest energies of its teachers, and giving to them that legitimate influence and control which will always be exercised by men whose heart is in their work; and I do not believe that the Government will next year have any difficulty in obtaining from Parliament whatever additional sum may be necessary to enable them to do justice to so meritorious a class of public servants as the National Teachers of Ireland.

MR. DAWSON said, the whole vitality of the system of education was involved in the character and condition of the teachers. He had listened carefully to the observations of the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down, and from his local knowledge he was able to say that there was nothing in his able statement which was at all over-coloured or exaggerated. It had been shown that the average pay of a schoolmaster was only about 10s. a week, and there was no ground to expect any increase in the amount now supplemented by private liberality. Where the national system was accepted it was considered that public education was the duty of the State, and the duty of providing funds, therefore, devolved upon Parliament. He believed that if they could instil feelings of satisfaction into the minds of the teachers they would do more to establish public confidence in the system than by any reconstruction or expensive alterations that could be devised. He admitted that the right hon. Gentleman had done much to improve the condition of this deserving class, and if he went further in that direction he would be repaid tenfold by the additional proficiency which the teachers would exhibit.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he agreed that the system of promoting teachers by removing them to another school in a more important district was the bane of the national system. He maintained that the cleverest teacher was wanted in the most barbarous districts. In 1858 the Commissioners reported that in Donegal there were seven teachers in places where the whole amount of local contribution was 7s. to each teacher. One teacher on Tory Island was almost starving. The Commissioners reported that some teachers were wholly incompetent, and the people of the district, although anxious to learn English, could not obtain instruction. A schoolmistress who had given great satisfaction was removed from the place where she was useful to Belfast, where there was no want of experienced and able teachers. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would consider that point.

MR. LONGFIELD said, he felt considerable reluctance in pressing upon the Government the necessity of increasing the education grant, not because he did not think the teachers were well deserving of an increase of pay, but because it appeared to him that if the amount annually voted by Parliament were properly applied there would be no need for an increased demand. There was lavish extravagance in the application of the funds. A sum of £500 or £600 a year was voted for drainage and permanent improvements of a farm of 170 acres, and yet after seventeen years the only return was the "probable produce of £1,600," which had been held out for the last ten years. He could not help thinking that the system had been mal-administered, the proof being that while they had multiplied the number of schools the number of scholars had been diminished. The result was that they had only multiplied the number of pauper schoolmasters, and that the best men were leaving the Irish National Schools. They had been recommended to make a provision for their old age by the aid of deferred annuities; but how could schoolmasters in the receipt of these miserable pittance spare any money for the purpose? He thought the Commissioners had put into their book of extracts the sketch of an Irish clergyman who was "passing rich on £40 a year." So struck did they seem to be with the picture that they had strenuously resolved that the pittance of Irish schoolmasters should never exceed £40 a year, though a century had elapsed since Goldsmith wrote The Deserted Village.

MR. MORE O'FERRALL said, he agreed that there were items in which a saving might be effected. For instance, he found a Vote of £100 for a classical teacher to instruct the teachers. But what did they want with classics? They surely formed no part of the scheme. It appeared to him that there were many items in which they might make reductions, and thus obtain funds to increase the salaries of the teachers who needed it so much. If, after they had introduced all the economies they could, anything more was needed, he felt certain that Parliament would vote the balance with the greatest readiness.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, it was clear that the contentment and efficiency of the masters were the conditions of the success of the system. It appeared that there were on the Normal establishment two professors employed as training masters, who lectured on the "English language and literature, history, geography, mathematics, political economy, and natural philosophy." When the teachers were educated in these high branches of knowledge Parliament gave them on an average the sum of 11s. 9d. per week. It was clear that if the teachers learned all these things they were worth more than 11s. 9d. per week, and that if they did not the professors were not necessary in order to teach them. He agreed with hon. Members who thought that if the Vote were wisely administered the teachers might obtain an increase of salaries.

Mr. Longfield

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he sympathized with the hon. Member for Dungarvan in the appeal he had made in behalf of the schoolmasters; and he believed there were abundant means of bringing about reductions by which their salaries might be increased, without calling on the House to augment the gross amount of its grant for Irish education. He begged to move, therefore, that £13,000, the item for the agricultural schools, be omitted; and if he carried that Amendment, he would hereafter propose a Resolution affirming that the Vote for masters ought to be increased to that extent. He also had to complain that the amounts asked for building schools were put under the head of the Board of Works, when, in fact, they were an addition to the educational Vote.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he thought that the same was the case with regard to the grant for the reformatory and industrial schools. It appeared under another head. With regard to the payment to the Irish teachers, it should be remembered that all they received came out of the public purse; whereas in England a large proportion of the salary was raised by voluntary effort. He desired to call the attention of the Committee to the great increase which had taken place in that Vote. In 1848 it was just £120,000, while now it was over £285,000. That seemed to him to be an enormous increase. One feature of the increase was the great additional cost of management, which in a few years had more than doubled. With regard to the district model schools, he was afraid they were doing in Ireland what had been done to a considerable extent in England—namely, that they were giving education to classes for whom it was never intended, and who were fully able to pay for their own education. He understood that very few of the students in the model schools were of the poorer classes. Indeed, he had been informed that the children of magistrates were pupils in some of them.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the office in Dublin had been the subject of inquiry by a Commission from the Treasury four or five years ago, and the amount of salaries paid was the result of that inquiry. The Votes for reformatory schools in both England and Ireland were taken separately from the education Vote, because they were considered to come under the category of crime. The reason why the amount for building schools was not in that Vote was that that work was under the direction of the Board of Works, and, therefore, was considered to come properly into the Vote for the expenses of that Department. He would now pass on to the main subjects—namely, the expenditure on model schools, the expenditure upon district agricultural schools, the expenditure upon the school at Glasnevin, and the small remuneration afforded to the schoolmasters. It was contended that the expenditure on model schools should not be increased. If that were the proper opportunity, he should be most ready to add his humble tribute to the admiration which such schools as those in Marlborough Street and Belfast elicited from all visitors; but, as the expenditure on the model schools had grown very considerably, he thought it would be much more satisfactory that no further engagements should be made by the Commissioners with respect to the model schools in any district in Ireland without first obtaining the sanction of the Government, so that they might have the opportunity of submitting the matter to that House before any decision was come to. With respect to the agricultural schools, the Government acknowledged that the opinion of the House had been expressed to the effect that the expenditure of those schools had gone beyond a proper amount in Ireland, but the benefit they had conferred on the country ought not to be forgotten. Immediately after the famine there was a very great desire to extend agricultural improvement in Ireland, and every one was desirous of taking advantage of the favourable opportunity to establish agricultural schools to teach the people improved agriculture. He believed that great benefit had been the result. But, again, he had the satisfaction of saying that Government had anticipated the feeling expressed to-night in desiring to reduce the expenditure on agricultural schools, and there was a decrease of four model and four ordinary schools since last year. Then, with regard to Glasnevin, he drew the attention of the Commissioners of Education to the importance of giving rewards as an incentive to education through the whole 5,000 schools in Ireland, and accordingly a system of prizes had been adopted, by which the best pupils were brought up to Dublin for rewards, and a great stimulus was given to education through the whole country. He now came to the question of the salary of the schoolmasters. He cordially sympathized with every word which had fallen from the hon. Member for Dungarvan and others, and it would be seen that already something had been done to promote the comfort of the schoolmasters, for in the present Estimates there was a considerable increase for their benefit. Their position had been contrasted with that of the schoolmasters in England, but it must not be forgotten that when the system in Ireland was originally commenced, it was laid down in Lord Stanley's letter that the amount intended for the salaries should be locally secured. That principle, however, had been entirely departed from, and the House was now asked to vote no less than £180,000 for the salaries of schoolmasters. If it were attempted to contrast the salaries of teachers in Ireland with those in England, it must be borne in mind how large a part of the salaries of English teachers was derived from local sources. It could not be supposed that the whole of the £90 which they received was derived from the State; it was largely composed of the fees from scholars and contributions given by landed proprietors in aid of the schools. And if the hon. Gentleman called in aid of his argument the Scotch Parochial Schools Bill, under which each schoolmaster was to have a minimum of £35 and a maximum of £70 yearly, he must remember that those were payments mainly to be made from a charge upon land voluntarily imposed, and not from money obtained by a Vote of that House. He was sure the Board of Commissioners would be most anxious to ameliorate the condition of the teachers to any extent which they believed would receive the sanction of the Government and of the House of Commons. They had already shown their interest in the subject in a practical manner, but in preparing the Estimates they were obliged to bear in mind their growing magnitude, and not to extend them more rapidly than they believed the liberality of Parliament would warrant.

MR. BUTT said, one of the principal objections to the present system was that the Commissioners were doing all they could to get the whole management into their own hands. They were asked to Vote £280,000, and there was another vote of £60,000, making £340,000 in the hands of the Commissioners, which was nearly equal to the whole parochial income of the clergy of the Established Church. He felt that upon careful revision an abundance of items could be pruned away, which would in the aggregate yield an amount sufficient to meet the legitimate claims of the masters. He referred to various items, especially in connection with agricultural schools and the cost of inspection, which he regarded as excessive, and said that the lavish expenditure under these heads and the special gratuities given to particular pupils looked as if the object which the Government had in view was to bribe individuals into supporting a system which was alien to the feeling and spirit of the country. He asked for an explanation of the item of £10,000 introduced into the Estimates this year for the first time for "navigation schools;" as he believed that demand was a further step towards extending the control of the Commissioners to purposes of education with which it was not originally contemplated they should have anything to do.

MR. MONSELL said, he believed no Member on either side of the House had any intention of demanding an increase of the Vote for the purpose of augmenting the salaries of teachers; but many, no doubt, thought the salaries might be increased by a redistribution of the present Vote. The expenditure on model schools, for instance, was excessive. They had been established in towns where ample educational qualities already existed, or would have been provided without Parliamentary assistance. He could corroborate the statement, that persons by no means in the poorest classes availed themselves of the advantages afforded by these Government establishments, and he wished to express his belief that the real object of the system, which was to provide for the education of the humbler Irish, had in many cases been lost sight of. Local contributions, where they could be obtained, he regarded as of the utmost value, because they interested the donors in the school, and led to their exercising a watchfulness over it which other inducements would fail in inducing them to do. The Christian Brothers' and the nuns' schools were the best in Ireland, because religion was an important point with those bodies, and it would be well to see if the same principle could not be brought to bear upon the model schools.

MR. CARDWELL explained that the increase of £600 upon the item for navigation schools was caused by increased facilities being afforded for learning navigation.

Mr. Butt

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he must persist in his Motion to reduce the Vote by £13,000—the sum asked for agricultural schools.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if there were any species of instruction which more than another was useful to the people of Ireland it was training in the principles of agriculture. He hoped, therefore, his hon. Friend would not object to Vote the sum necessary for the purpose. Even if the whole of the £13,000 was distributed, as some were preferred to advocate, in increasing the salaries of the schoolmasters, very little would, after all, have been effected in that direction, inasmuch as according to the statement which the hon. Member for Dungarvan had made to him, when he waited on him at his own house, a sum of £50,000 would give those schoolmasters an average increase of salary of only 14s. a week.

MR. W. WILLIAMS contended that the £13,000 would not in the slightest degree benefit the people of this country, or, in fact, anybody else, except the landlords of Ireland.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must remind his hon. Friend that the promotion of the wealth and prosperity of the people of Ireland ought not to be a matter of indifference to the English people.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £172,377, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge for Public Education in Ireland, under the Commissioners of National Education in Ireland, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 9; Noes 98: Majority 89.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

MR. PEEL said, he had to propose a Vote of £155,000 for the redemption of the Stade Dues. A treaty had been entered into with Hanover under which that country extinguished these tolls, and was to receive the capitalized value, calculated according to a certain basis of the revenue which she derived from them, and the sum so to be paid to her was to be divided in certain proportions between this country, Hamburg, and other countries trading up the Elbe. It was not necessary to enter into a lengthened explanation as to those tolls, as the whole subject was carefully inquired into by a Select Committee of the House so lately as 1858. The toll was one of a very ancient character, having been levied by Hanover since 1720, and this country had recognized the right of Hanover to levy it by entering, in 1844, into a treaty with Hanover on the subject. Under that treaty it was agreed that the toll to be levied on all ships passing up the Elbe should be at the rate of 5s. for every £100 value of freight. In the year 1858 a Committee of the House of Commons which inquired into the subject reported that the toll was injurious to the trade and commerce of this country, and pointed out that certain articles produced in England were exposed to disadvantageous competition with similar articles the production of other countries, in consequence of the latter finding their way to Germany by other channels than the Elbe. The Committee further showed that our shipping was, by the operation of these tolls, subject to an unfair competition with the vessels of Hamburg, and they recommended that the Treaty of 1844 should be put an end to. That could be done by notice, but the legal authorities whom the Government consulted were of opinion that if they terminated the treaty they would not exempt themselves from liability to the toll. Under these circumstances the only course to arrive at a friendly solution of the question was to redeem the tax in the same way as the Sound dues, which was an analogous case, had been redeemed. If the Committee agreed to the principle of redemption there would be little question as to the details. Hanover proposed that a sum equal to 25 years' purchase should be given for the redemption of the revenue derived from the tolls. But that was objected to, and it was ultimately agreed to accept 15½ years' purchase. With regard to the contribution to be made by this country, the Hanoverian Government received £30,000 from the tolls, and this country paid between 50 and 60 per cent of that sum. The next largest contributor was Hamburg. If Hanover received £30,000 a year, that multiplied by 15½ years gave a sum of £465,000. If England were to pay in the proportion of her contribution to the annual revenue derived from the tolls she would pay £250,000. But the interest which Hamburg had in the abolition of the tolls was more than measured by the amount of her contribution, for the tolls prevented ships from going to Hamburg, and diverted trade to other quarters. This country was, therefore, to pay only one-third of the entire amount, Hamburg was to pay another third, and the remaining third was to be divided proportionally amongst the other countries that traded to the Elbe. The treaty which had been concluded provided that no pecuniary obligation was to be fixed on this country except with the concurrence of Parliament. There had been an Act of Parliament in the case of the purchase of the Sound dues, but in the present instance it was thought that a Vote in Committee of Supply would be sufficient for all practical purposes. He hoped the Committee would agree to the Vote, as interest would have to be paid upon any instalments that remained due after the 1st of October, and as by the treaty the compensation was to be paid in thalers, the sooner the operation of purchasing them began the better as they might, otherwise, be losers by a rise in the rate of exchange. He trusted that the grounds he had given for the Vote would be satisfactory to the Committee.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he was not at all satisfied with the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman. He thought the proportion fixed for England was high. On whom did the duty fall? On the owner of the ship? On the owner of the merchandize? Did it not rather, according to the principles of political economy, fall on the consumers of the goods? It had been considered that such duties fell on the consumers. Then the Stade dues had been regarded in the light of passing tolls. If so, Hanover took the dues, and did nothing for them. In this country when relieving foreign countries from our passing tolls we did not call on them to buy up their liabilities. Again, the duties were really abolished by the Treaty of Vienna. But whenever that treaty operated in favour of the general European public it had been set aside. Another reason why he thought the share of this country too large was because cargoes from foreign ports which came to the Isle of Wight, or some point on the English coast, and were there purchased to go to Hamburg, were reckoned improperly as a portion of our trade. Moreover, these dues being levied by the pound, this country had been subjected to overcharge on account of the English pound being less than the foreign one. Under all the circumstances he thought the hon. Gentleman had not given a good reason for fixing England with so large a proportion of the commutation money for the Stade dues; and he should say "no" to the Vote.

Vote agreed to, as were also

(3.) £1,257, Commissioners of Education, Ireland.

(4.) £4,995, University of London.

(5.) £16,285, Grant to Scottish Universities.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the Vote was upwards of £8,000 more than the Vote of last year. He wished to know what was the cause?

MR. PEEL said, the reason of the increase was the recent legislation on the subject of the Scotch Universities.

Vote agreed to, as was also

(6.) £2,336, Queen's University, Ireland.

(7.) £3,300, Queen's Colleges, Ireland.

MR. DAWSON said, he thought the claims of the inspectors of these colleges ought not to be further postponed.

MR. CARDWELL said, it was proposed to redistribute the £7,000 appropriated to the professors, so as to meet the claims referred to.

Vote agreed to, as was also

(8.) £500, Royal Irish Academy.

(9.) £1,500, Theological Professors, Belfast.

MR. HADFIELD said, there was a growing feeling in Ireland as to the impolicy of the allowance. That class of rich Dissenters had no right to come upon the public funds. It was the only class of Protestant Dissenters in the kingdom that received such a grant. He should, therefore, move the reduction of the grant by £2,050, which would leave only the amount of retired allowances.

MR. CARDWELL said, that considering the great importance of the Presbyterian body in the north of Ireland, the nature of the institution, and the long period that the grant had been in existence, he trusted the hon. Gentleman would not persist in his Motion.

MR. DAWSON said, the institution had done a vast amount of good in the north of Ireland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS expressed his disapproval of the Vote.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £1,500, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to pay the Salaries of the Theological Professors and the Incidental Expenses of the General Assembly's College at Belfast, and Retired Allowances to Professors of the Belfast Academical Institution, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

OFFENCES AGAINST THE PERSON BILL. CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. HENLEY said, he rose to move, as an Amendment on Clause 4, that the word "misdemeanour" be substituted for "felony." He held that in assimilating the laws of England and Ireland, where the law was more severe in one than in the other, the milder form ought to be preferred, unless there were peculiar circumstances which rendered severity necessary. The common law in England and Ireland made the offence of conspiracy to murder a misdemeanour. About 1795 or 1796 the Irish Parliament passed an Act making it a felony punishable with death. When the Irish criminal law was consolidated in 1829 the offence was re-enacted as a felony punishable with death. By the Bill it was proposed to make it a felony both in England and Ireland, and, instead of the punishment of death, to attach to it the punishment of penal servitude for life or a less period, at the discretion of the Court. It was necessary to consider whether there was anything in the state of Ireland to render it necessary to treat the offence in a way different from that in which it had hitherto been treated in England. Looking to the great diminution of crime in Ireland, they could not come to any other conclusion than that Ireland might very well be left with the same law which had always been found sufficient in England. In 1839, than which year the criminal returns of Ireland did not go further back, the number of persons accused of the offence of murder in Ireland was 286. With the exception of the years 1848 and 1849, when, owing to the terrible pressure of the famine, crime in Ireland did not diminish, there had been a gradual diminution. The number of persons accused of murder in Ireland fell to 92 in 1845. It rose to 179 in 1849. In 1853 it fell to 73; and in 1859 to 45. A more remarkable change in the criminal statistics of any country could scarcely be found. The crime with which the clause immediately dealt was conspiracy to murder, and solicitation to murder. In 1859

the number of persons accused of the crime of solicitation to murder in Ireland was nine, and in 1859 none. The number of persons accused of conspiracy to murder in Ireland was, in 1839, 25; and in 1859, 3. Taking the whole of the offences against the person, including manslaughter, the number of persons accused in Ireland was, in 1839, 898; and in 1859, 235. With this alteration for good, it could hardly be said that there was any special ground for the severity of the law. What was almost as satisfactory, the number of convictions was in most years more in proportion to the number of persons accused. Of the 286 persons accused of murder in Ireland in 1839, 32 only were convicted, and of the 45 accused of the same crime in 1859, 3 only were convicted. The proportion of convictions in England did not vary so much as many persons might think. In the English criminal returns the offence of conspiracy to murder was included under the term "misdemeanours," and, therefore, whether there were many or few persons accused of it could not be ascertained; but it might fairly be assumed that if there had been many some special notice would have been taken of the fact. In cases of felony the police had always exercised much larger and more arbitrary powers than in cases of misdemeanour. A policeman or constable, having a reasonable ground to believe that a felony had been committed, was justified in apprehending a person without a warrant, and would be held to be justified unless it was shown that he acted from some improper or malicious motive. There was a vast number of foreigners resident in this Metropolis. Nothing would be more easy than for a Foreign Minister who wanted to get hold of the correspondence of a foreign refugee to put it into the mind of a constable that such a man was mixed up in a conspiracy to murder. The constable, acting in good faith, would go into the unfortunate foreigner's house, apprehend him, and seize all his papers. The conspiracy might never have existed, but the papers having been seized the names of all the refugee's correspondents would be known, and persons in other countries would be implicated in political matters which otherwise would never have been found out. That was a great reason for not making the offence a felony unless there was an absolute necessity for it. He felt it so strongly that three years ago, when the question arose, under special circumstances, of making the change in the law of England, and after the Bill was read a first time, but before the episode occurred which led to its untimely end, he went to the Secretary of State and told him that unless he provided some guard against the action of the police he should vote against it in a further stage. The question was always cropping up. Somehow or another foreigners got hold of our constables. They had an example of it in the recent Kossuth business, and if a foreign Minister obtained the names of a refugee's correspondents that would perhaps be all he wanted. The refugee himself might not suffer, but his friends abroad might be subjected to all the inconvenience of being in correspondence with a man who had been obliged to flee his country. There might be inconvenience in making the change in the law of England, and he could see no necessity for continuing to make the offence a felony in Ireland. When the law was more severe in one country and less severe in the other, it was wise, in assimilating the law, to adopt the less severe form. He was glad to be able to acknowledge the courtesy of the hon. and learned Attorney General in bringing the subject on at a convenient hour. He was quite ready to take the opinion of the hon. and learned Gentleman as to the period of penal servitude. It was not the quantum of punishment to which he objected, but the inconvenience which might arise, and which he had endeavoured to point out. He hoped the Government would accede to the proposal which he begged to make—namely, to strike out the word "felony" in the fourth clause, and to insert the word "misdemeanour."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he hoped the House would not be induced to adopt the Amendment. It would have been observed that to a clause which defined an offence, and attached upon conviction a punishment of considerable severity, the only objection of the right hon. Gentleman related to the character of the crime which, he contended, ought to be misdemeanour only and not felony. This objection was based on the assumption that if the offence were felony, the police would arrogate, or might be invested with certain arbitrary and summary powers of interference with persons and papers, which might lead to injurious consequences, not so much to the individual accused, but, supposing him to be a foreigner, to persons with whom he might be in correspondence in other countries. For the purpose of enforcing that objection, the right hon. Gentleman had supposed a conspiracy between the Minister of the country to which the refugee belonged and the Government of Her Majesty; because the interference of the police in the way suggested, whatever effect it might have on the individual proceeded against, could be attended by no injurious consequences to his correspondents abroad, unless there existed an understanding between the foreign Minister and the Government of this country, which might lead the latter to abuse the information obtained through the agency of the police. He did not believe that any Government which could exist in England would lend itself to such conduct. It was important to bear in mind that the object of the present and of four other Bills which had already been before the House, was to consolidate the criminal law, bringing within the four corners of one enactment all the statute law bearing upon a particular class of offences, and now scattered through a great many volumes. Another object was to combine the assimilation and amendment of the statute law of England and of Ireland with its consolidation. But the law could not be assimilated without considering, in the first place, whether the law of the two countries was the same or different. If it was different, then the question arose whether the law of one country should be adopted in the other, or whether some alteration or change should be made, so as to bring about a new state of the law applicable to both countries. A considerable time ago conspiracy to murder was made by statute a felony in Ireland, punishable, on conviction, with death; and so it remained at the present moment. In England, on the contrary, it was a mere misdemeanour. It was obvious that the severe statute law of Ireland could not be applied to England; and hence it followed, if we were to have the same law for the two countries, that there must be applied to both countries some modification of the severity of the Irish statute. That modification was effected by the present clause, which, making the offence a felony, attached to it, not a capital punishment, but a punishment next in severity—that of penal servitude. There was a considerable body of authority for the clause. In the Bill relating to offences against the person brought forward during the

The Attorney General

Administration of the Earl of Derby, conspiracy to murder was dealt with as a felony; and in the Bill on the same subject subsequently laid on the table by the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University, the late Attorney General for Ireland (Mr. Whiteside), the same course was pursued. In the Bill introduced into the House of Lords last Session, the same clause was inserted, and it remained after the Bill had undergone a very searching investigation by a Select Committee of that House. He could not see that there was any force in the objection of the right hon. Gentleman opposite. If they were to proceed upon the supposition that the Government of Her Majesty would lend themselves to the designs of a foreign Minister, he did not think the police, acting upon the instigation of the Government, would be particularly nice in their conduct whether conspiracy to murder were called a felony or a misdemeanour. Conspiracy to murder, as recent and unhappy experience had shown us, was an offence which might, not improbably, be committed in this country, either by foreigners acting alone or by foreigners in concert with Englishmen; and considering the conclusions—at times not very charitable to our feelings and sense of justice—drawn by Continental Government from the large and wide hospitality we afforded to refugees of every kind, it was worthy of consideration whether, when there could be no great or serious objection, we should not put our law in such a form as might relieve us from discreditable accusations. In 1858 the House seemed to adopt that view, because it approved a Bill which both changed the character of the offence and altered its punishment. The first reading of that Bill was carried by a large majority, but it ultimately failed, from circumstances which did not in any way affect the opinion expressed by the House, that such a change in the law was desirable. He hoped, therefore, that the House would not agree to the right hon. Gentleman's Amendment.

MR. WALPOLE: Sir, I wavered at first very much in my opinion as to this matter, but the more I have considered it the firmer has become my conviction that the view of my right hon. Friend is the correct one. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General seems to have forgotten the exact object of the Bill to which he referred. Its object was not to turn a misdemeanour into felony, but to make that an offence which the law did not reach before—namely, a conspiracy in this country to commit a murder abroad. It had nothing whatever to do with the question whether the offence of conspiracy to murder should be a misdemeanour or a felony. As to the authority to which my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has referred, I cannot see that that has much weight. The House has never yet given any opinion on the precise question which my right hon. Friend has now submitted to it. No doubt one object of these Consolidation Bills is to make the law of the two countries uniform, but in this particular matter this Bill neither consolidates nor assimilates—it alters the law of both England and Ireland. If you were consolidating the law, and took the law of Ireland, you would make the offence of conspiracy or soliciting to commit murder a capital offence, punishable by death; if you took the law of England you would make it a misdemeanour, omitting the offence where the murder is committed abroad. But you are altering the law of both countries, and the question you have to consider is what Amendment would be best. As regards Ireland, you have introduced this Amendment—that instead of the offence being a capital one, it becomes a felony, punishable by penal servitude; and in England, instead of being a misdemeanour, it becomes a felony, punishable by penal servitude. The question raised by my right hon. Friend is not whether the offence shall be the same in both countries or whether it shall be punishable by penal servitude; he and the Attorney General are both agreed as to that; but it is whether it shall be a misdemeanour or a felony. The difficulty arises from the mode in which under this Bill you enable the police to deal with this particular offence, for, in point of fact, you will—or, I will say, you might—by an abuse of authority enable a constable, without a warrant, to obtain information which, except for the allegation of that offence, he could not obtain. That arises entirely from the technical description of the offence as a felony. If it were a misdemeanour the police would have no power to ransack a man's papers without a warrant. I think that my hon. and learned Friend has missed the exact point submitted for consideration by my right hon. Friend, and keeping in view the extreme jealousy with which this House has always guarded against information being obtained from any person which might be turned against him on a charge which does not relate to the particular offence for which he is put on his trial, and seeing that there is nothing in this Amendment which will diminish the punishment or the means of proving the offence, I shall strenuously support the Amendment.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he thought the House was under a very great obligation to the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire for having brought the matter before the House. When it was understood in the country what was proposed in this Bill there would, no doubt, be a very clear expression of opinion on it. The history of the Session had been so strange that scarcely any proceeding of the Government inconsistent with the principles professed by their followers would have surprised him, but he certainly was not prepared for such a proposal as that. He should give the right hon. Gentleman his hearty support, and he trusted that the Amendment would be carried by a large majority.

MR. AYRTON said, he had given notice of his intention to move the omission of the clause altogether, but on grounds somewhat differing from those stated by the right hon. Gentleman opposite. The House was scarcely aware, he thought, of the nature of the offence indicated by the clause. It was limited simply to the offence of conspiracy, without any overt act whatever to carry the conspiracy into effect. That offence was purely one of intention; it was nothing more than the agreement of two persons to commit murder, though it might not be followed by any attempt to commit it, and though one of the parties might recede from, or even frustrate the agreement. In another Bill it was provided that any person inciting another to commit a felony should be punished as the principal felon. But was it right that a mere intention, followed by no overt act, should be put in the same category as an attempt to commit murder? That would be at variance with established principles of law, which recognized a great distinction between the two offences, and prescribed for the less offence only a less punishment. Not one of the Commissions which had been appointed for the consolidation of the criminal law had recommended the change, and it had never been heard of until the Emperor of the French required us to make it. Then came the proposal of the noble

Lord at the head of the Government. It was true that the House allowed the Government to bring in the Bill on the subject, but it was negatived on the second reading, and the House preferred to risk a change in the Government rather than pass such a measure. Was that decision to be treated as nothing? Had any circumstances occurred in the country which rendered such a change necessary? He had heard of no such necessity; and it was not a sufficient reason to say that, with a different state of society in Ireland, a different law existed than that now in force here. It was due to the character and the honour of the House that if the decision of 1858 were reversed the step should not be taken hastily or inconsiderately, but that the House should declare that it had committed a great error in then refusing to assent to the proposal of the noble Lord

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir I cannot recognize the reality of the fears expressed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) as to the arrangement which he supposes would be made between a foreign Minister and a police constable. My belief is that if any foreign Minister wished to employ a police constable for the purpose of discovery he would apply to the Home Office, and they would not be likely to lend themselves to any improper act of that sort. If the object simply was to search a man's house without a warrant, there are many felonies besides the conspiracy to commit a murder abroad which would afford an opportunity for the purpose. Therefore, assuming the sinister purpose which the right hon. Gentleman described, and that means were desired to carry it into effect, he would not be baffled even under the existing law. I understand the right hon. Gentleman does not object to diminish the punishment, and he does not propose to alter the clause except by substituting misdemeanour for felony, leaving all the rest of the clause as it stands. The difference would be that the prisoner would retain the advantages which he possesses in trials for misdemeanour, and there would be the difference in respect of searching his house. In that respect the alteration would be favourable to the prisoner; but I do not think the matter is worthy of any very lengthened contention, and I shall be quite prepared to concede the point.

MR. HENLEY said, he never imagined that any Government would ever lend themselves to such a thing. Of course it would be done by the police.

Mr. Ayrton

Amendment agreed to.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the alteration having been made by the House, it would not be right to allow so severe a punishment to stand. He proposed that the words "for life" be struck out, in order to substitute a term of "not more than ten years, or less than three."

MR. AYRTON said, the Amendment was satisfactory; it reduced the punishment, and made the offence a misdemeanour, which was the common law.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, that in Clause 43, he would move that the word "twelve" be substituted for "six." The effect of the Amendment was to give magistrates the power of committing to prison for twelve months in cases of wife beating.

Amendment proposed, in page 12, line 10, to leave out the word "six" and insert the word "twelve."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the Amendment was one of a series which would, if agreed to, indicate that a considerable change had come over the temper of the House since the Amendment which it had just carried; for it would greatly augment the severity of the present law against aggravated assaults. The noble Lord, though proposing the increased severity, was, strange to say, actuated by a spirit of benevolence.

Amendment negatived.

VISCOUNT RAYNHAM said, he would then move to omit the provision of fine and imprisonment in order to insert the following:—

"And whosoever having been twice convicted of any such offence as aforesaid shall afterwards commit any such offence shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable to be imprisoned in a common gaol or house of correction, with or without hard labour, for any period not exceeding three years, and if the said last mentioned justices shall so think fit, the person, if a male, so convicted, shall be once privately whipped with not more than forty-eight lashes."

Question, "That the word 'six' stand part of the Clause," put, and agreed to.

Another Amendment proposed,

"In page 12, line 11, to leave out the words 'or to pay a fine not exceeding (together with costs) the sum of twenty pounds, and in default of payment to be imprisoned in the common gaol or house of correction for any period not exceeding six months, unless such fine or costs be sooner paid.'"

Question "That the words proposed to

Bill to be read 3^o this day.

MUNICIPAL CORPORATIONS ACT
AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I think, Sir, it is very evident that, if the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary had been acquainted either with the Corporation Reform Act or with the speech of the noble Lord at present at the head of the Foreign Department, on introducing that measure in 1835, he would not have made the assertion that this Bill would make no alteration in the state of things existing under the Corporation Reform Act. I shall not now attempt to go over again all the arguments on this subject which I used on a former occasion; but the case is this:—It has been decided in the Court of Queen's Bench that the mayor has precedence everywhere within the limits of the borough; but that he has not of right the chairmanship of the justices when they sit in petty sessions. That was explicitly declared to be the intention of the Act, when the Bill for that Act was introduced in 1835; and it has since been authoritatively decided by the Court of Queen's Bench that such is the purport of that Act. The object of this Bill is to enact that whoever is elected mayor, having become by that Act a justice of the peace for the year of his office and for one year afterwards, shall of right take the chair at all meetings of petty sessions and in all committees of justices. Now, I think that this provision is extremely stringent upon the borough justices, and I am not aware that they have done anything to deprive them of the right which belongs to all other responsible bodies—the right to elect their own chairman. There is an exception to this right in the case of Recorders at borough quarter sessions. The Recorder there of right supersedes mayor and the other magistrates, and sits as chairman and as Judge at the quarter sessions; but in other cases the mayor cannot take precedence of right over the other justices. I think the proposal of this Bill bears very hardly upon the borough magistrates, against whom no offence has been alleged; for these magistrates would not be allowed to exercise a power which belongs to the county magistrates, who are entitled to exercise the privilege of choosing their own chairman. There is no reason for this, especially when it is remembered that in petty sessions every magistrate is individually responsible for the judgment that may be pronounced. That, I believe, is the law: so I have been advised by competent authority. Each magistrate is personally and individually responsible for every decision that may be given at petty sessions; and all I now propose is some valid security against incompetence on the part of the mayor—for the House has decided that the mayor, though he may have become a justice for the first time by virtue of his election to the office of mayor, shall at once step into the chair at every meeting of the justices, and shall thus have authority over men who have been appointed to the office of justice for life, who may have acted for years in the administration of the law and the preservation of the peace, and may have exercised their functions most honourably and blamelessly. As the Bill stands the mayor will thus preside, though he may be without the slightest knowledge or experience of the business of a justice of the peace. That is a severe decision; and I ask the House to modify it. I ask the House to place the mayors of our provincial towns in the same position that the Lord Mayor of London occupies. No one can be elected to the office of Lord Mayor till he has served some time as alderman; and as alderman he exercises the functions of a justice. Therefore, before he is elected to the chair of the City of London the electors have had some experience of his conduct and capacity as a justice of the peace, because as an alderman he sits as a justice of the peace. My proposal is that this security be extended to the boroughs. In the course of a former debate reference was made to the borough of Birmingham, where unhappily the collision took place which led to the introduction of this Bill; and I believe that an impression has gone abroad from that debate that I am dealing with this question in a spirit of hostility to the Corporation of Birmingham. Perhaps the House may not be aware that I, along with my hon. Colleague, in opposition to the views of many of our own political friends, joined with the late Mr. Muntz and the present senior Member for Birmingham (Mr. Scholefield) in carrying through this House the Birmingham Improvements Bill, by which the Corporation of Birmingham became vested with powers as large, if not larger than the powers of any Corporation in England. The hon. Member opposite will bear me testimony that, in this respect, I acted in what cannot be otherwise considered than as a liberal spirit towards the Corporation of Birmingham—more so than many of those who agree with me in general politics were inclined to sanction. The House will see, therefore, that I entertain no hostile feeling whatever against the Corporation of Birmingham. Nevertheless, I am one of those who think that they are now urging us upon a course which is not likely to produce results that are either creditable to themselves or to this House. I ask the House this question—what good will they do, though they may by this Bill thrust a man upon the justices against their will, and make him their chairman of right, though he may have had no experience, and though he may be seriously objectionable in other respects? for the Bill contemplates only those cases where the justices, if left to themselves, would decline to elect the mayor as their chairman. In almost all cases the justices are only too glad to elect the mayor as their chairman, if he is competent; because he, in that case, brings the whole weight and influence of the corporation to support the authority of the justices. The 2nd Clause of the Bill, therefore, contemplates only cases of the character which I have before described, where the mayors are unfit persons, to whom the justices have an objection. This is all I ask: is it unreasonable that I should ask the House to adopt the same safeguard for other corporate towns which for many hundreds of years have assured the peace and prosperity of the City of London? Surely it is only reasonable that, if the mayor is to assume the chair as of right, contrary to the opinion of the rest of the justices he shall, at all events, be a man of some experience as a magistrate? I think that this is only reasonable; and I ask the House for one moment to look at what may be the consequence of refusing this proposal. I think the example of the United States of America is not calculated to commend to us the system of electing magistrates and Judges for short periods of office. The House has decided not only in favour of the election of a justice in the person of the mayor—that has been settled by the Corporation Reform Act—but that he shall be in the position of a Judge—to take precedence of all other justices; and yet this person, who will be entitled to rank as their chief, and expound and declare the law which the justices have to administer, may be himself utterly destitute of any qualification for the office, of any recommendation or security for its due performance, except that he has been elected by the ratepayers of Birmingham or any other town that may have elected such a man mayor of the borough for the year, under the influence of considerations totally apart from his competency as a magistrate, and in total ignorance of his qualifications as a justice; and this at a time perhaps—for the circumstance has happened and may happen again—when a collision may have taken place between the corporation and the bench of justices, and when there may be circumstances calculated to render the administration of justice, however pure and faithful, unpopular in the borough. And I ask the House, if this Bill is carried as it now stands, will it tend to raise the character of the Corporations? The House will, I hope, excuse me for a few moments, while I ask them to consider what may probably be recommended as a cure for this impending evil. What will that cure be? Why, the cure will be simply this: that hereafter there will be a total supersession of the justices by a stipendiary magistracy. If any such cases should arise, and they may arise as they have arisen; if the mayor should prove himself to be totally incompetent, the bench will be brought into disrepute, and we shall have the remedy of those who advocate what they call “progress;” we shall not be allowed to revert to the old custom of permitting the justices to choose their own chairman, but we shall have all the justices superseded, together with the mayors, by the appointment of stipendiary magistrates, with increased powers. I am sure that the mayors who originally urged on this Bill, and they are but a minority of all the mayors in the kingdom—40 out of 130—have not looked to the probable consequences of what they ask. It is to be presumed that under existing circumstances every individual who is elected mayor is competent to the position to which he is called? But those who urge this Bill overlook that, in insisting upon every mayor being of right the chairman of the justices, however incompetent he may be, they will bring the whole system into disrepute, and lead the Legislature to supersede both the justices and the mayors by stipendiary magistrates. I know some hon. Members will say, "Oh! leave it to the boroughs; we shall have a better class of mayors elected, when the inhabitants are made to feel and understand the position in which they place the mayor, and that their electing incompetent men is fraught with danger to themselves." But, I ask, is this right? Is it prudent; is it wise in hon. Members to yield to the pressure which I know is put upon them, without any security that the mayors shall be persons competent to fill the situation in which you propose to place them? The fact is that many hon. Members are, as I understand, voting under pressure upon this Bill. All I ask of them is that they shall take the same security that the ratepayers shall elect an officer who is competent to discharge the duties this Bill imposes; the same security which for years has contributed to the sound administration of justice in the City of London. I have consulted with several persons who are well acquainted with the working of the Corporation Reform Act, and there is not one of them but has assured me that the proposition I make is not only reasonable in itself, but is necessary to secure the dignity, the honour, and the efficient working of our corporate system. I shall, therefore, take the sense of House upon the addition of the following clause:—

"That the right to take the chair at such meetings of justices shall not attach to the office of mayor, unless the person filling that office shall have been commissioned and have been qualified to act as justice of the peace within the borough, at least three years before his election to be mayor."

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he objected to the clause, as it would nullify the whole operations of the Bill, which at present carried out the intentions of its framers.

LORD LOVAINE said, he should support the proposed clause, which he thought was a reasonable one.

MR. DEEDES observed that the clause did not state that the mayor "may" take precedence over all the justices, but that he "shall" do so.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the words were "shall be entitled."

MR. DEEDES said, he put it to the right hon. Gentleman whether in practice those words would not have the effect of "shall." But supposing they only gave rise to a question on the subject, such an effect would not be desirable.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he had a great respect for the Birmingham justices, but he hoped that what might be said to be the universal practice would be carried out in that town, and that the mayor would there have that precedence which was accorded to him in other places.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, the question was simply, would they give the mayor precedence in judicial matters? He thought they should not do so; and he would, therefore, suggest an Amendment which would, perhaps, be acceptable, to the effect that the mayor should not have precedence over the county magistrates, over the stipendiary, or any other body of magistrates engaged in judicial proceedings.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, it might be supposed from the argument of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) that no one was fit to be a justice who was not a lawyer. This, however, was a view which was not borne out by experience.

MR. SPOONER said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman, as he had not heard a word uttered that at all showed the necessity for the Bill.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time."

The House divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 137: Majority 105.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, at present words could only be altered by Act of Parliament, but the 6th Clause gave the power to the Home Secretary. He would suggest a limitation of the power, considering it too extensive.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS remarked that the clause as it stood contained sufficient provision against any abuse of the power given.

Clause and the remaining Clauses were then agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^o To-morrow.

SALMON FISHERIES BILL (CHANGED FROM SALMON AND TROUT FISHERIES BILL).—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as amended, read.

MR. HENLEY said, he would move that Clauses 28 and 29, giving power to the Home Office to appoint inspectors, and to pay them such salaries as might be settled by the Treasury, be omitted, on the ground that it was inconvenient to expend public money in the preservation of salmon. The next thing would be to appoint inspectors for the preservation of foxes and pheasants, or any other game. Those who wanted either the fish or the game, or the foxes, might pay for their preservation.

MR. CLIVE said, he must oppose the Amendment.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, he should support the Amendment. The main objection to the clause was that it placed unlimited power in the hands of the proposed inspectors, for there was no definition of their powers.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the Home Secretary could not create any new powers; he could only invest the inspectors with such as the law permitted.

Question put, "That Clause 28 stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 85; Noes 47: Majority 38.

Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Bill to be read 3^d To-morrow.

House adjourned at a quarter before Three o'clock.

EAST INDIA COUNCIL, &c., BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE rose to ask Her Majesty's Ministers to lay upon the Table of the House Copies of all Reports, Minutes, or other Record of opinions of Members of the Indian Council, or of Committees of that Council, relating to the Bills concerning India now before this House? He made this request, not from any feeling of hostility towards the Bill, but because he desired to know what were the opinions of the able and eminent men who formed the Council of the Secretary of State for India with respect to the measures for the government of India which were, or were about to come, before their

Mr. Henley

Lordships. The Council was constituted that it might advise, not only the Secretary of State, but Parliament, and it would be a waste of means of information which were within their reach if they did not ascertain what were the opinions entertained by the Members of that Council with regard to these measures. The noble Earl who had charge of the Bill (Earl de Grey) had said that it was sanctioned by the Indian Council; but all these measures had been a good deal altered since they were first in contemplation, and he was anxious to know what opinion the Members of the Council entertained of them as they now stood. It was the rule that if a Minister referred in the course of a debate to any despatch he was bound to produce it, and, in the same way, the opinions of Members of the Council ought to be laid before the House if any allusion was made to them by any Member of the Government. It had been said, he believed, that if these opinions were produced the Secretary of State would be debarred from asking his Council for advice in future. He saw no reason why that should be; but, of course, if his noble Friend assured him that the publication of the papers he asked for would be attended with any inconvenience to the public service, he would not press for them. As he had already stated, he was generally in favour of the present Bills. He believed that the leading principles of the measures were in the right direction. He approved the formation of the local Legislatures, and the admission into them of Natives and persons unconnected with the Government; but he doubted the wisdom of the clause as to the formation of the Legislative Council of the Governor General. When the Council of India was established it was not contemplated that their opinions should be kept secret, even when they differed from the Secretary of State—still less was there any occasion for secrecy when they agreed with him. He hoped the Government would not object to the production of these papers.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he could not help thinking his noble Friend (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was under some misapprehension, first, as to the existence of the documents for which he had moved; and further, as to the functions of the Indian Council and the mode in which business was carried on in the Indian Department. His noble Friend proposed that there should be laid before Parliament copies of any Reports, Minutes, or other records of Members of the Indian Council, or of Committees of the Council, on the subject of these Bills. Now he (Earl de Grey and Ripon) wished to point out that a distinction must be drawn between Reports of Committees of the India Council and any documents emanating from that body in their collective capacity as constituted by Parliament. The Indian Council, for the purpose of carrying on its daily business, was divided into committees, each of which considered the questions and papers that might be referred to them, and made reports, which corresponded precisely to the Minutes of Departments drawn up by subordinate officers in other branches of the service. He must point out to his noble Friend that it would not be for the convenience of the public service if reports of committees of this description were laid before Parliament. They had none of the force and character which attached to the recorded opinions of the Members assembled in Council, and it would obviously be inconvenient to produce them. The noble Marquess, alluding to what had been said by the Secretary of State for India in "another place," described his right hon. Friend as having said that, if these papers were laid before Parliament, a Minister would never consult with his Council at all. But his right hon. Friend the Secretary of State had not and could not have made any such statement. What his right hon. Friend said was that, if the confidential reports made by committees of this description were laid before Parliament it would lead to a different mode of transacting the business of the Department, and to the discontinuance of such committees. It was not the practice of the India Council for Members of it to give their reasons for assenting to or dissenting from every measure which was laid before it. When the Secretary of State decided against the opinion of several Members of the Council, or overruled the majority, it was usual for them to record their dissents; and, except under very peculiar circumstances, there could be no objection to the publication of any such dissents. Generally speaking, however, the opinions of the Members were given in conversation, and, as there was no reporter present to note down what they said, there was no record of the discussion to produce. As to the three Bills now before Parliament, no dissents had been recorded. The dissents which were made with regard to the India Civil Service Bill of last year, but which had no reference to the measure of this Session, had already been made public. Their Lordships must not forget that the duty of the India Council was to advise the Secretary of State, and not Parliament, and that it really formed part of the Executive Government. His right hon. Friend was anxious to afford every information in regard to the India Bills now before Parliament which was consistent with the interests of the public service, but, for the reasons he had stated, he trusted their Lordships would not insist that the reports of committees of Council should be laid on the table. When he spoke the other night of the opinion of the Council on the present Bill he did so in the most general terms. He said that it had met with their general approval; and that was a simple statement of the conversations which took place in the Council on the subject.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH understood that the object of the noble Marquess was to have produced, for the information of their Lordships, any papers which might show what the individual opinions of the members of the Indian Council were with regard to the particular measure now before Parliament. It seemed to him very extraordinary that the Council of India should conduct its business in such a manner as to have no record of its proceedings to produce. No doubt, the Council existed generally to give advice to the Secretary of State; but when it was established it was certainly contemplated that such a body, composed of able men, well acquainted with all subjects connected with India, would also inform and guide the legislation of Parliament on these questions. He very much regretted that a different system now prevailed. One observation he felt bound to make as to the grounds upon which certain propositions were submitted by the late Government with regard to the constitution of the Council. He then held, and still held, the confident belief that it was perfectly impossible, at this time of the day, to create any new institution whatever which should have real authority in the country unless it was, to a considerable extent, founded upon representation. It was with that view that he and his noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) had attempted in 1858 so to constitute the Council, as to give it in some degree the character of a representative body. No doubt, the arrangement was generally considered unsatisfactory, but that was the object with which it was proposed. In particular it was proposed that there should be placed in the Council two gentlemen representing the cotton interests of Glasgow and Manchester. If that proposition had been adopted they would probably not have now to regret, as they did, the want of that supply which would make them independent of America. The object of that proposition was to place in the Council men who would constantly urge upon the Government of India to take measures to secure an independent supply of cotton, and he greatly regretted that that view was not adopted.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clauses 3 (Composition of the Council of the Governor General of India),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that the principle of fixing the salaries of important personages by Act of Parliament was not adhered to by Her Majesty's Government, for not only did this clause enable the Secretary of State in Council to alter the salaries of the members of the Council of the Governor General, but another Bill gave power to alter the salaries of the Judges, which, he believed, was quite unprecedented.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the clause made no change in the present law.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 (Provision on Absence of Governor General in other Parts of India),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, he wished to draw their Lordships particular attention to this clause, the provisions of which were altogether new. In case the Governor General in Council should deem it expedient for him to visit any part of India unaccompanied by his Council, this clause provided that a law or regulation should be passed to enable him to exercise alone the powers which he might execute in Council, except that of making laws or regulations. It would be all very well if the body which had to make the law was the same as the body which decided on the expediency of the Governor General visiting the provinces without his Council. But by this Bill a different kind of Council was created by which the law would have to be made from that which had to advise the Governor General, and it was not only possible, but, he thought, very probable, that the legislative portion of the Council would decline to pass the

The Earl of Ellenborough

Act. As they knew nothing whatever of the transactions of the Government, they could only be cognizant of the circumstances which made it expedient that the Governor General should go from common conversation and rumours in the public papers, and they might make that a ground for refusing these powers. He would suggest that, instead of a law, an ordinance should be sufficient, signed by the Governor General in Council, so that those who declared the necessity of his going should have the power of enabling him to go.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON assented to the alteration.

Clause amended ; and agreed to.

Clause 7 (Provision on Absence of Governor General from meeting),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH suggested that, as the usual residence of the Governor General was at Barrackpore, sixteen miles from Calcutta, words should be inserted to require the signature of the Governor General to Orders in Council at which he was not present, if made at Calcutta, as was required by the words of the clause, "if such Governor General shall be resident at the place at which such meeting shall be assembled." He proposed to add to those words "or within twenty miles."

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON objected, on the ground that the existing law was not altered, and no inconvenience had arisen.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 8 (Power of Governor General to make rules for the Conduct of Business),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH requested the earnest attention of their Lordships to this clause. The Governor General had hitherto been in India solely responsible for every act of his Government. By this clause he was to divide his responsibility among the Members of his Council. He thought it a most dangerous proceeding, and one which would lead to great public inconvenience. He gathered that the object of the clause was to enable the Governor General to save himself a great deal of trouble by turning on Members of his Council the direction of separate departments, which was the introduction of a novel principle. Of course, the military man placed at the head of the Military Department would take the whole direction of it, and the Governor General would thus deprive himself of one the most important powers which he possessed—that of directing all military matters. When he was in India he wrote with his own hand every single letter of importance in the Military Department. The position of the Governor General would be altogether different if the whole direction of the Military Department were taken from him by the military Members of Council, not selected by himself, but by the Secretary of State in Council at home, whose views might, perhaps, altogether differ from those of the Governor General. The Governor General could not interfere in any way, for whatever the military Member did would become an act of Council. The Military Member might be removed from that department by the Governor General, but he would still remain in the Council to obstruct every measure of the Governor General. But what would be the position of the successors of the present Governor General? It was said to be Lord Canning's intention to return home next spring, so that he would only remain four or five months after this Act went out. He would make rules and regulations for the transaction of the business, and would place certain gentlemen at the head of the different departments; and the succeeding Governor General might entertain a totally different opinion as to the best mode of transacting business and might think it necessary to revert to the old system; so that the very first act of his Government would be to give mortal offence to those gentlemen with whom it was absolutely necessary that he should work well. This idea was not a new one—it was, in fact, a very old idea which had never yet been acted upon. Thirty years ago a question was put in a Committee to Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone on this very proposition, and he gave a very decided opinion against it.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the object of the clause was simply to enable the Governor General to make such rules and regulations from time to time as he might think fit, and it was founded on the strong recommendation of the present Governor General. In his despatch on the subject Lord Canning said—

“The fault of the present constitution of that Council is the waste of labour and the delays that it entails. This has been mitigated of late; but not so much as it might be. It has arisen chiefly from the fact that the wording of the law and long usage appear to prescribe that every act of the Governor General in Council, beyond those of mere routine (and not always excepting these), must be done with the actual consideration and concurrence of all the Members of the Council. This tradition was not long ago broken through, but not without misgivings on the part of some Members of the Government as to whether they were not unduly divesting themselves of the responsibility fixed upon them. A division of departments has, however, to some extent taken place, and the result has been good.”

The evils of the previous state of things was felt by Lord Dalhousie also, and he made certain changes in the direction of those which Lord Canning now proposed. He had the high authority of Mr. Cecil Beadon for saying that his practical experience had convinced him that some such arrangement as this was most desirable. The whole effect of the clause would be that in mere departmental matters the Governor General would place some Member of the Council at the head of each department to whom all the papers would be referred; but the authority of the Governor General would not in the least degree be weakened. It would enable the Executive Council to conduct the business in the manner they might think most convenient without being subject to the present restrictions.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that when he was in India he introduced a change in the manner of conducting the business of the Council, which saved a great deal of time. Formerly the Council met twice a week, when the secretaries of the different departments were introduced, and all the business accumulated since the last meeting was transacted. The reading of the letters, their discussion, and the making of orders often occupied the Council from eleven to five o'clock, and frequent delays and accumulations of business took place. He then proposed that all the letters should be sent to him in the first instance, and that in each case where he had no doubt he would write in pencil what should be done, and in those on which he wished to advise with the Council he would write “Reserve.” The letters would then be sent round to the Council, and if any Member doubted the expediency of what he proposed, or wished to consult his colleagues, he would write “Reserve” on the letter, and the matter would then be brought before the Council at the next meeting. In practice he found that he wrote “Reserve” much more frequently than any of his colleagues. Whatever he suggested was almost always adopted. The result was that instead of sitting six hours the Council generally rose in an hour and a half, and thus most valuable time had been saved. If Lord Canning had gone back to the old system he could very well understand that he would be overwhelmed with business. The opinions of Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone on this point were so strong that he would read them. These were the questions put to him by the Committee, and the answers which he returned—

"The Members of Council being usually persons of high character and long standing in the service, would it not be advantageous to delegate to them particular functions in the Government, so that the public might avail themselves of their services to the fullest extent?—If they were put at the head of departments, the Government remaining on its present footing, each would be responsible for his own department, and the Governor would be in a measure superseded; the opinion of these heads of the departments in Council would then have much greater weight than it has at present, and the Governor's attention would be drawn from the department committed to each individual.

"If that power were distinctly given to the Governor, of which you have spoken, of acting on all occasions independent of his Council, might not, in that case, the services of the Members of Council, being personally responsible for the good management of the departments over which they presided, be usefully available for the public service? I think the head of a department would be more effectually responsible if he were not a Member of Council."

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL thought that the interesting extract just read by the noble Earl referred to a wholly different proposition from that now under discussion. It was not proposed that each Member of the Council should be put in charge of a Department, but that the Governor General in his own Council might distribute the business according to his own sense of the exigencies of the Department. His noble Friend (Earl De Grey and Ripon) had quoted from Lord Canning's despatches. He would read a little further. Lord Canning said that practically a division of Departments had taken place, and he added—

"I would recognize this division by law, and I would carry it out more distinctly. For this purpose the law should declare that it shall be in the power of the Governor General to charge each Member of the Council with the direction of such Department of the Government as he may think fit; and that, subject to any regulations which the Governor General in Council may lay down, the orders of that Member of the Council should in that Department be held to be the orders of the Governor General in Council. It is not possible or desirable to define by law what questions should be submitted to the whole Council. Subjects constantly arise upon which it is quite right that a Member of Council should consult the Governor General, but which it would be a waste of time to bring before every Member of the Council. The practice should be regulated, as in the English Cabinet, by good understanding and common sense, and by the paramount authority of the head of the Government. There is no fear that any important questions would be kept from the consideration of the whole Council by such a change."

The clause now proposed would authorize the Governor General from time to time to make such regulations as he thought necessary for the more convenient transaction of business; and if the division of work which he made were found inconvenient, or if his successor disapproved it, the regulation might be altered or remodelled in a moment, according to the views of the Governor General for the time being. Among the Council there was a military Member, a legal Member, and one acquainted with finance; and he thought there would be no practical difficulty in distributing the business among them, so that each Member of the Council should be fairly conversant with the questions referred to him.

EARL GREY admitted the advantage of a greater division of labour among the Members of the Council. The complicated affairs of so large an empire could not be properly carried on unless there were some such division. But the question was should that division be provided for by a specific law? It seemed to him that it was an innovation, and rather a dangerous one, to provide by Act of Parliament that the Order of individual Members of the Council should, under certain circumstances, have the force of an Order of the Governor General in Council. As to the argument of Lord Canning, it really answered itself, because it pointed out what was the right way of effecting this division of labour—namely, by a good understanding among the Council and by agreement between them that certain questions should be disposed of by certain Members, reference being made in cases of necessity to the whole Government. The clause seemed to him to be an unnecessary one, and, being unnecessary, it would be safer to omit it.

VISCOUNT HARDINGE said, that when his father went out to India the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) told him that, unless he adopted some such arrangement as he had indicated for facilitating work in the Council, he would come to a deadlock. His father immediately assented to the noble Earl's proposition, and during the time he held office he did not experience the slightest difficulty in the business of the Council. He did not think that any sufficiently strong case had been made out for this change.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that according to the present law, the Governor General could not legally carry out the arrangement which was proposed unless he obtained the power to do so by Act of Parliament; because the acts which were to be done by the Governor General must now be done by the Governor General and the whole Council.

EARL GREY admitted that the existing law provided that questions should be disposed of by the whole Council; but that did not interfere with the understanding among the Members of the Council themselves to rely on each others judgment in certain matters. The practice of the Admiralty was to confide in each others judgment upon ordinary questions, and to adopt, as a matter of course, the recommendations of individual Members upon points referred to them, without the loss of time which would be occasioned by an investigation of details. He could not understand why the same practice should not be adopted in India.

On Question, Clause agreed to.

Clause 9 agreed to.

Clause 10 (Additional Members to be summoned for the Purpose of making Laws and Regulations),

EARL GREY said, he looked upon this as the most important clause of the Bill, and it would have an important bearing upon the future welfare, perhaps upon the future safety, of our Indian Empire. Unfortunately, he was absent from the House upon the second reading of this Bill, but he had read the debate which took place on that occasion, and it certainly appeared to him that strong objections were urged against the clause. He thought it would not be right to urge objections without at the same time suggesting some means of amending the fault, and he had, therefore, drawn up an Amendment, to which he earnestly hoped the Government would assent. The existing Legislative Council in India was an admitted failure. It was "a mock Parliament," in which the opposition to the Government was led by a Judge; and this was felt to be an evil so urgently requiring the interference of Parliament that it was probably the cause of the present Bill. What he feared, however, was that the Bill as it stood would not correct the evil complained of. It would, indeed, meet a portion of that evil.

It would correct the anomaly of allowing a Judge to take an active part in political matters in opposition to the Ministry. It had been well described, in fact, as a Bill for putting down Sir Barnes Peacock, and it would have no other effect whatever as regarded the character of the Legislative Council. But he did not see how this enactment would prevent a repetition of the evil complained of—its effect would really be in an opposite direction from that desired, because the increase in the number of the Council and the position of independence in which many of the Members would stand would not be likely to diminish the disposition among them to assume functions which did not properly belong to them, and to constitute themselves a mock Parliament. Nor did the Bill contain any provisions for putting an end to the publicity which was now found so detrimental. The silence of the measure on this head implied, he supposed, that the existing system was to be left untouched. Probably after that system had once been in force no Governor General, unsupported by Parliament, would venture to change it. From the reported speeches of the Government in both Houses he understood it to be their intention to leave things in this respect as they now were; and he could not find fault with them for coming to that determination, because, while he concurred with those who thought that Lord Dalhousie had made a great mistake in opening the doors of the Council to the public, still, when that had once been done, and when the people of India had become accustomed to know what went on in the discussion of measures, he greatly doubted whether it would be expedient to make any change, unless some other means were adopted by which a public discussion upon laws which were proposed might take place before those laws were finally passed. It appeared to him that under this clause they would have a body more numerous than the existing Council, probably more difficult to manage, and more inclined to extend its powers. He thought this would be a very dangerous result. Perhaps he felt the danger more from the circumstance that during the time he had the honour to hold the office of Colonial Secretary it was his duty to watch the proceedings of the Legislative Councils in some of the colonies; and his experience of the working of these bodies had impressed him with a strong conviction of the danger of their proceedings being in public. The additional Members were to hold their seats for two years, whether the Governor General desired it or not. Was it by any means certain that the Governor General would have it in his power to carry the measures he might propose? It it were understood that the official Members of the Council would in all cases support the measures of the Governor General, then the Legislative Council would cease to be a deliberative body. If they were to act together in the same way that in this country the Members of the Government in both Houses acted together it would be necessary that the measures to be submitted to the Council should have been considered by the Governor General and his Executive Council previously. But would there be no temptation to make speeches in the Council, addressed, not to the Members of it, but to the public of Calcutta and the public of India? Would there be no danger of weakening the Government and obstructing the Executive? If confidence among the Members of the Government as to the proceedings in the Council were shaken, it would be impossible for the Members to act in harmony in carrying on the executive service. He believed it to be absolutely essential that the opinions of the Council should be given in private. Publicity was impossible even for the most harmonious Cabinet that was ever brought together. Unanimity could not always be secured in Cabinets in this country, and in India the position of its members was very different. The gentlemen who held high offices in India had adopted the public service as a profession, had devoted their whole lives to it, and had risen to their high position by long service. It could not be expected that men in this position would forfeit all they had gained by the long labour of a life, by resigning office if they did not approve the measures of the Governor General. He was persuaded that in difficult times, and on questions that excited great public interest, it would be practically impossible for the Governor General to enforce support of his measures by the penalty of dismissal. These were insurmountable objections to the arrangement proposed by this clause. In the present state of society in India he believed it was impossible to establish anything like representative government. He thought the power of legislating should be concentrated in the hands of the Governor General and the Executive Council: but that power should be exercised, in the first place, subject to a responsibility to the Home Government and the Imperial Parliament, and, in the next place, he should be required to take such a course that public opinion in India might be declared on his measures before they were finally adopted. With these views he had ventured to propose the Amendment he intended to move. Its effects would be, in the first place, to leave legislation in the hands of the Governor General in Council. But he proposed that another body should be constituted, that for the want of a better name, should be called a Council of State, limited in number but still comprising as many members as might be found convenient, and consisting of men of the most distinguished character and station in India of different races and professions, so that the whole community might be fairly represented. From this body the Governor General should have the power of nominating Committees to inquire into any subject on which legislation might be required, and to prepare draughts of laws upon them. He further proposed that all draught laws which the Governor General thought were proper to be passed should, before being finally considered, be submitted to a meeting of the Council of State. That meeting he thought might, without inconvenience, be allowed to take place in public, and each member of the Council could freely express his opinion. He thought, also, that the nomination to this Council should convey honour and distinction; but his clauses contained no reference to precedence or dignity, because he thought honours should be conferred by the Crown, and not by Parliament. He also suggested that it should be in the power of the Governor General to refer to that Council any petitions presented to him in favour or against any draught law then under the consideration of the Government, and that the Governor General should also have power to authorize the petitioners, or other persons deputed for that purpose, to appear before the Council of State in support of their petitions. He further suggested that the Governor General should have power of calling together, in convenient places, those members of the Council who were unable to attend at the seat of Government, to consider proposed acts of legislation. Those members would be allowed to send in reports to the Governor General, showing what their opinions were upon matters affecting the general interests of India. Those were the principal features of the arrangement proposed by his clauses ; but, if the general principle upon which they were based received the sanction of the House, he was quite aware that their form would require careful consideration. Some such arrangement had been suggested by an experienced and noble Friend, and also by the history of events that had occurred in a neighbouring country. Some of the greatest laws passed during the reign of the first Napoleon, and some of them were so beneficial that their enactment in some degree compensated for the harassing wars in which Napoleon kept France engaged. Those laws were mainly put into shape by the Council of State, a body which possessed no legislative powers, but was simply a consultative body. The precedent of that Council of State had suggested itself in this instance as quite applicable to the circumstances of India. He would only further remark, in reference to the Bill as it stood, that it imposed upon the Legislative Council two distinct, and as he thought, inconsistent duties. The Legislative Council was to inform the Governor General of any objections to measures proposed, and was also to have authority to pass those measures. There would arise this difficulty—that if that body were made sufficiently numerous and independent to enable them to bring before the Indian Government these objections, and, at the same time, were endowed with authority which the Governor General could not overrule, there would be a serious danger of the whole machine being brought to a dead lock. But if, without giving power to interfere, and reserving the ultimate power of the Governor General intact, it was provided that the functions of the Council of State should be confined to considering and reporting upon proposed measures of legislation, he thought they might without danger enlarge the basis of that body and admit a larger number of persons. That was the leading idea of the Amendments he should propose, and to which he invited their Lordships to give their sanction. The noble Earl then proposed the first of the following Amendments of which he had given notice:—

“To leave out from (‘Governor General in Council’) to the End of the Clause, and insert the following Words, (‘there shall be appointed also a Council of State to assist in the Preparation and Consideration of such Laws and Regulations. The Governor General shall have Power to appoint from Time to Time such Persons as he may think fit to be Members of the Council of State, and also to remove the Persons so appointed ; but all such Appointments or Removals shall be only provisional until confirmed by the Secretary of State for India in Council.’)”

After Clause 10 to add the following Clauses (A.), (B.), (C.), and (D.)

“Clause (A.) It shall be lawful for the Governor General to direct the Council of State, or any Committee of that Body he may nominate for the Purpose, to inquire into any Subject on which Legislation may be required, and to prepare Drafts of Laws thereupon.”

“Clause (B.) Except in Cases of Emergency the Drafts of all Laws intended to be passed by the Governor General in Council shall be submitted to the Council of State, and shall be considered by that Body at One or more Meetings to which all the Members shall be summoned. It shall be the Duty of the Council of State to report to the Governor General in Council their Opinion on the Drafts of all Laws so laid before them, and to suggest any Amendments which they may consider to be required therein.”

“Clause (C.) It shall be lawful for the Council of State, with the Consent of the Governor General, to be signified by him in each Case, to take Evidence with regard to any Draft Law laid before them or any Amendment suggested therein, and likewise to hear Arguments in support of Petitions for or against any proposed Law by Persons appointed for that purpose with the Approval of the Governor General.

Clause (D.) If by reason of the Distance at which they reside any Members of the Council of State should be unable to attend conveniently at the general Place of Meeting, it shall be lawful for the Governor General to direct that such Members shall meet separately at any other Places he may appoint, to consider the Draft Laws laid before Council of State ; and the Members so assembled shall be empowered to present District Reports to the Governor General in Council on the Drafts submitted to them.”

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the object which the Government had in view in framing the Bill of which this clause was a most important part was to make as few changes as possible in existing legislation in regard to India, and only to make those changes which those who had most experience of the working of the existing system pointed out as being required. The noble Earl (Earl Grey) had adopted another course, and proposed to establish a body of a novel character and without precedent in any previous system pursued by this country since we had acquired our Indian possessions, and, therefore, the noble Earl was bound to point out how the Bill was open to the serious objection of tending to perpetuate existing evils, and also that the remedy which he proposed would obviate those evils without creating others of greater extent. Unless that could be shown he thought he had a right to ask their Lordships not to assent to the Amendment. The noble Earl said that the changes which the Bill would make in the Legislative Council would not remedy the evils which were found to exist. By the mode in which the Act of 1853 had been worked, the character and powers of a little Parliament were no doubt conferred upon the Legislative Council; but there was nothing in the present Bill which tended to perpetuate that evil. On the contrary, care had been taken to render it most distinct, that the Government had no intention of establishing in future anything of the character of a Parliament. Moreover, the expression "Legislative Councillors," which occurred in the Act of 1853, was not contained in the present Bill; and to protect themselves against misconception in India the Bill laid down the precise limits of the questions which the Council were to entertain and the course which they were to pursue. The noble Earl complained that the Bill did not make any reference to the subject of publicity. The question of publicity only applied to the Legislative Council when it assembled for legislative purposes, and on that subject the Bill, no doubt, did not contain any provision. But power was left to the Governor General, with the approval of the Secretary of State, to frame the rules which should guide the Council at its first meeting, and after the full and recent experience which he possessed no one could be more competent to discharge such a duty than the present Governor General. To the objection that the Council, as proposed to be constituted by the Bill, would prove more unmanageable than the present Council he could only reply that the Members of the existing Council held their seats ex-officio and were appointed by other authority than that of the Governor General; whereas the additional members of the proposed Council would be selected by the Governor General and would hold their seats for only two years. The noble Earl remarked that, although he could see no great danger from a selected Council, a party might be formed against the Governor General which would render him unable to pass laws which he brought forward. It was scarcely possible to imagine a case in which the selected Members, one half of whom were to be persons actually in the service, would combine to defeat a Bill brought forward by the Governor General; but, if such a case did occur, it would afford tolerably strong grounds for supposing that it was not altogether desirable that the measure should be passed. But the Governor General need not, and in his opinion, ought not, to appoint the whole of those twelve members at once. The Bill gave him power to nominate not less than six nor more than twelve, and the probability was that a limited number would be appointed in the first instance, and power would be reserved, in case it became desirable to legislate for a particular part of the country, to call in persons capable of giving valuable information of a local character. The noble Earl said that the Council would be too much open to the influence of public opinion at Calcutta, and too ready to make speeches appealing to public opinion in this country and in India. What was the remedy proposed by those who took objections to the measure supported by the Government? They proposed to establish, apart from the Governor General, contrary to immemorial custom, and unconnected with his authority, a great Council of State, which was to deliberate in public, to have its proceedings reported, and was then to submit its recommendations to the Governor General. But was not an independent Council such as that suggested by the noble Earl much more likely to overpower the Governor General, and to force their opinions upon him, than a Legislative Council of the character indicated by the Government? This Council of State, according to the noble Earl, was to be composed of a large number of persons in high position, and of great weight, representing, as far as possible, the various opinions and interests existing in India, and enjoying the super-added importance of rank and standing. Were such a Council established one of two things would happen. Either it would have no real power, would be unable to influence the Governor General, and would find its opinions constantly disregarded—in which case men of weight and influence would decline to sit upon it, and as a deliberative body it would fall into desuetude and disgrace—or the much more probable result would ensue, that such a Council, being independent of the Governor General, having among its Members no representative of the Executive Government, and being invited to conduct its deliberations in public, would be enabled to submit its recommendations with such authority that, except in cases of great emergency, the Governor General would find it impossible to disregard their opinions. It was true that these Councillors were to have no votes; but public opinion would, under a system of open debate, give them an amount of control which was more likely to create than to avoid evils. Indeed, by their having no votes their responsibility would be diminished. This Council was to be responsible to no one. It was to be appointed by the Governor General simply for consultative purposes, and its Members ought, from its very nature, to say whatever they thought upon every measure which was submitted to them, without the responsibility which must attach to any one who had to give a vote, and so influence the decision at which the Government was to arrive. He, therefore, ventured, with the most sincere respect for the opinions of the noble Earl, and of those who were to some extent in favour of his Amendment, to submit to their Lordships that, instead of destroying the evils which existed under the present system, it would have a tendency to increase them; that, while the proposition of the Government was consistent with previous legislation and with the views of the Governor General, and of those who had had the most recent experience in India, this was an entirely untried system, which would launch them upon an unknown sea, where they would, he believed, meet with storms and perils much greater than any to which they would be exposed under either the existing system or that which it was proposed to establish by this Bill.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that everything which his noble Friend (Earl Grey) proposed to do by a clause in this Bill the Governor General could now do, and he believed a great deal better, by his own authority. This was not an innovation, as the noble Earl supposed. It was a restoration. It was the restoration of the Government of Akbar. It was the restoration of the system of Government which was known to all India, which existed in every Native State, which possessed the affections of the people, and than which he believed that no more popular measure could be introduced, because it would be so identified with the ancient customs of the people of India. He should have no apprehension whatever as to the action of a Council of State composed as his noble Friend proposed to compose it. It was the only mode by which it would be possible to introduce any large number of Natives into a Council in consultation with the Governor General; and in his opinion the introduction of Natives to a great extent into the consultative Council of the Governor General was absolutely essential to the good government of the country and to its future tranquillity. Their Lordships really must consider the perilous condition in which, under any circumstances, we must stand in India. The circumstances of peril in which we had always stood had been infinitely increased by the late mutiny. There was now, he feared, between the Natives and the Europeans a feeling of hostility which might portend future disasters, and which it would require the greatest care and discretion on the part of the Government to allay. By adopting the course suggested by his noble Friend they would gratify the great body of the people, for whom we ought to endeavour to carry on our Government, and not altogether to rely upon the habits of the people of this country, but to look to the habits and feelings of those for whom we must govern. As regarded the plan of Her Majesty's Government, he would say this—that he had more than once in the course of his Parliamentary life had the misfortune—and it was a great one—to belong to a Government which did not command a majority in Parliament, and he was far from desirous to subject the Governor General of India to a similar misfortune. He felt perfectly convinced that, if the large number of additional Members permitted by the Bill were appointed, the Governor General would not have a reasonable expectation of carrying his measures in the Council. His noble Friend near him had assumed, and perhaps he was justified in assuming with regard to most subjects, that the Governor General would go into the Legislative Council sure of the votes of his own Executive Council and of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. Those votes amounted to six. The Commander-in-Chief would not be present, he was always with the army; and the Governor General had of late abstained from attending the meetings of the Council, and perhaps he was right in taking that course. One half of those who were to be appointed Councillors must be unofficial persons. Now, their Lordships could hardly be aware of the entire and absolute independence of the gentlemen of the Civil Service. They might depend upon it that they could not induce gentlemen of high character and station in the Civil Service to enter the Council if it was thoroughly understood that they were always to vote with the Government. There was no independent gentleman in India who would take the appointment upon that condition. They would be compelled to resign their situations; and if the Governor General obtained successors to them they would be persons of an inferior description, whose opinions would carry no weight, and who would, in fact, bring discredit on the Council. There were questions upon which even the Members of the Governor General's Executive Council could not be depended upon; and he was sure that means would be adopted by this Parliament of bringing forward all questions in some manner or another. As he told their Lordships the other night, there was an intensity of feeling not only upon the two questions as to the manner in which the Natives were to be treated, and how the interests of Europeans were to be maintained, but also upon the subject of religion, which made it impossible to depend upon the vote in the Legislative Council of a member of the Executive Council, even though he was a man who was perfectly reasonable on all other subjects. That was our real danger. The danger in 1851 was produced by the conduct of the Legislative Council with respect to religious questions. Let them not incur the same danger with a Council yet more unmanageable. He entreated their Lordships to recollect that they were legislating for India, and not for England; they were legislating for a country in which Englishmen might be counted by units, and the Natives, of two different religions, antagonistic to ourselves, by millions. They might depend upon it that there was danger at every step which we took, and that our only chance of avoiding it was to endeavour to conciliate the people and to act in compliance with their feelings and prejudices.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he could hardly understand whether or not the speech of the noble Earl who had just sat down was intended to support the Amendment, for he had pointed out that what it was proposed to do by it could already be done by the Governor General by his own authority. He could not avoid asking his noble Friend who had moved the Amendment whether he expected to carry it, because, if it were carried, the greater portion of this measure must be entirely recast; and pointing out to him that he had not informed their Lordships how he proposed to deal with the Councils of Madras and Bombay, to the reconstruction of which a not unimportant part of this Bill was devoted.

He must protest against the statement of his noble Friend that it had been admitted on all hands that the Legislative Council had been a total failure. On the contrary, it had been stated both by the Governor General and by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal that as regarded carrying on its legislative business the Legislative Council established in 1853 had been eminently successful, and they pointed to the statutes passed since 1854 as a sufficient proof that in that respect it had worked satisfactorily. He agreed with his noble Friend opposite that it had been proved to be most inexpedient that the Judges should be Members of such a body, because they were sometimes tempted to express opinions which involved serious risk and inconvenience to the Government. Another evil in the present system was that there was a tendency on the part of the Members of the Council to interfere with the executive acts of the Government. These were the two principal objections to the existing constitution of the Council, and both of these would be obviated by the present measure. As to publicity of discussion, his opinion was that the evils resulting from it had been much exaggerated, while there were instances where the publication of the discussions in the Council had been of eminent service. He could easily imagine that when the Government had been attacked by the local press it would be a great advantage to have the opportunity of defending their conduct in a public assembly, and there could be no doubt that the publication of the financial statements of the late Mr. Wilson and of Mr. Laing had had a salutary effect on the minds of the Native population, and especially of the European community. Lord Canning was of opinion that the present system of publicity would require to be modified in some degree if Native Members were admitted, as some of them might not be able to take part in viva voce discussion. It was provided that the proceedings of the Council should be checked by regulations framed by the Governor General, and it was also intended that the Government should have their own reports of the debates. The consequence of the Amendment of his noble Friend would be to transform the Executive Council into a legislative body, and to perpetuate the evils of the present system in an aggravated form. The Council would acquire enlarged powers and would be apt to gather within itself all the discontented elements which existed in Indian society. His noble Friend opposite deemed the duty of passing a Bill inconsistent with that of objecting to one; but in his opinion anybody who possessed the one function ought to possess the other. An observation which he had made the other evening had been misunderstood. He did not mean to say that India was divided into two classes, one desirous of consulting the interests of the Natives and the other of promoting only their own commercial interests. A remark to that effect was made by a noble Friend opposite; and upon that he (Earl de Grey) said that the civil servants in India in the main represented that class among Europeans who were disposed most tenderly to consult the feelings of the Natives. Whoever knew anything of that body must acknowledge that to be the case. A circular which had recently been issued by the Landholders and Commercial Association of India showed the antagonism which prevailed between the planters and the Natives of Bengal. He had no doubt there were many planters who had as anxious a desire to respect the feelings of the Natives as their Lordships had, but there existed a contrary spirit among a great number of them, and the reason was plain—their interests were not identical. The English in India were not colonists. No Englishmen went to live and die in India, but every Englishman hoped to come back and spend the evening of his days here. Therefore, he (the Duke of Argyll) viewed with very fear the calling together of such an assembly as that pointed out by his noble Friend; and he was quite sure that whatever the danger of the Legislative Council, including in itself a small independent element, that danger would be very much exaggerated by the Amendment.

LORD DENMAN said, he believed that the Amendment contained useful elements.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH wished to ask the noble Earl (Earl De Grey) what would happen if any one of the unofficial Members should commit an act of bankruptcy? In most Legislative Assemblies there was a power of getting rid of such Members, but he did not see any such power here. Bankruptcy was not of unusual occurrence at Calcutta, and, as far as he could see, a Member might be bankrupt twice within two years and still be a Member of Council.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, there was no provision in the Bill to provide for such a case as that alluded to, because it was supposed that the Governor General would take care to select such gentlemen as were not likely to be subject to such a contingency. The Government would, however, consider the point.

On Question, Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 22 agreed to.

Clause 23 (Governor General may make Ordinances having the Force of Law in Cases of urgent Necessity),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, this was a most important clause. When the Act, which they were now considering, was originally passed some years ago, he suggested that it was absolutely necessary that the Governor General in Council, as then established, should have the power, under certain circumstances, of making a law without its passing through the Legislative Council. That proposal was not then adopted. It was adopted in this Bill. It was now proposed that the Governor General should be enabled to make no ordinance which for a limited period of time should have the effect of law. This opened a question of the gravest constitutional importance. The law had been that, whatever executive powers might be granted to the Governor General, he should have no legislative powers without the concurrence of his Council. It was the Magna Charta of India. It had been adhered to throughout, and he thought very beneficially. He was unwilling to trust, except under peculiar circumstances of emergency, to any individual man whatsoever—however much he might respect him, or whatever personal confidence he might place in him—the absolute power of making a law to bind a great empire, not only without the concurrence of his Council, but, perhaps, even without having consulted them. He did not consider it safe to give that power to any human being, nor did he believe it was generally necessary. If they gave the Governor General in Council the power to make an ordinance which would last for six months, until the pleasure of the Queen's Government was known, that would be quite sufficient to meet any misconduct of the Legislative Council. But, looking to the great dangers which might threaten India, he would reserve to the Governor General, under an exceptional state of things, the power of making ordinances which should have legal authority without the concurrence of his Council; yet he would provide that the power should be exercised under the same circumstances as the present power of the Governor General to overrule his Council. The Amendment which he should propose would be to insert the words "in Council," and to add these words, "and the Governor General shall have the same power of overruling the Council at meetings held for the purpose of making such ordinances as he now has by law at meetings held for any other purpose." His object was not to deprive the Governor General, who was solely responsible for the good government of India, of the power of making ordinances under extraordinary circumstances which should have the force of law, but to compel him so to act after deliberation, and after having consulted those who by law were given to him as his councillors. He desired deliberation before action. He did not object to action under those emergent circumstances, but he did not think it was right for Parliament to intrust to any man the power of making even a temporary law without taking full security that it should be done after due deliberation, and after consulting with his Council.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that as this power was of such an extraordinary character, and would only be exercised under circumstances of peculiar emergency, the Government had thought it most desirable, on the whole, that it should be confided to the Governor General alone, in order that he might be solely responsible for its exercise. It might happen, too, that at the time when it was necessary to exercise it the Governor General might be absent from his Council. He hoped, therefore, that the noble Earl would not insist upon his Amendment.

Words inserted subjecting the exercise of the power to the restrictions contained in the previous clause.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 24 agreed to.

Clause 25 (Laws made for the Non-Regulation Provinces declared valid).

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that this clause was intended to legalize certain acts done in the non-regulation Provinces as to the legality of which doubts had been expressed. The non-regulation Provinces were conquered countries, and it was the universal law that conquered countries, until they were regularly placed under the ordinary law of the country conquering them, remained under the direct authority of the Crown. These doubts were suddenly started in the Legislative Council by the Chief Justice, and it certainly was very extraordinary that, having acted as legal adviser to the Government for six or seven years, in his capacity of legislative Member of Council he had never informed the Government he served of the illegality they were committing.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 26 to 49 agreed to.

Clause 50 (Provision for the Supply of the office of Governor General in certain Circumstances),

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that with respect to this clause, he quite concurred with the remarks made on the subject by a noble Lord who had occupied the position of President of the Board of Control (Lord Lyveden). From the earliest times of our connection with India, the rule had been that in the event of a sudden vacancy in the office of Governor General the senior Member of Council succeeded to all the powers exercised by the Governor General. Being necessarily a man of considerable experience he was accustomed to the manner in which business was conducted, he knew the policy of the Governor General, and no break would occur in the administration of affairs. It was now proposed to alter that rule, and to provide that the senior Governor of Madras or Bombay should succeed to the Government of India. It should be remembered that at one period of the year it took three or four weeks to get from Bombay to Calcutta, and though the latter place could be reached in a shorter time from Madras, it was evident that a Governor of one of the Presidencies who went to Calcutta must find everything new to him; and he would be likely to remain in the position only a very short time; neither of them would know anything of the persons by whom the business was conducted at Calcutta or of the policy of the Government; and it was evident that a very inconvenient interregnum would occur. When he was in India he urged earnestly upon the Government that they should appoint a provisional successor to the office of Governor General, and by such a course the evils likely to arise under this clause might be prevented. He hoped the noble Earl and his colleagues would reconsider the provisions of this clause, and turn their attention afresh to this particular subject.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, he was quite disposed to consider the views of so high an authority as the noble Earl upon this subject, and promised that the clause should undergo the further consideration of the Government.

Report of Amendments to be received on Friday next. [No. 199.]

PIERS AND HARBOURS BILL.

SECOND READING.

LORD CHELMSFORD moved the second reading of this Bill, which he said had received careful consideration in the other House of Parliament, and the object of which was to facilitate and encourage the construction and maintenance of piers and harbours. Great care had been taken not to encourage speculative undertakings, and precautions would also be enforced to insure that persons objecting to the schemes which were henceforth to be sanctioned without a local Act of Parliament should be properly heard. The Bill would form a useful supplement to the Government Harbours Bill, and he hoped their Lordships would allow the second reading.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

House adjourned at half-past Eight o'clock, till to-morrow Twelve o'clock.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 9 (Contributions to the Common Fund to be calculated according to the Annual Value of rateable Property),

MR. HENLEY said, the Drainage of Land Bill had been on the paper till to day as the first order, and no notice of any change in the order of business had been given up to the hour of two in the morning, at which hour he left the House. The Drainage of Land Bill was not now on the paper, and the Irremovable Poor Bill stood first. He understood the change had been made after two o'clock in the morning, and many hon. Members were, no doubt, under the impression that the Irremovable Poor Bill would not come on for a considerable time. That he regarded as sharp practice. With regard to the Amendment of his right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington), he was not prepared to discuss it as he thought it ought to have been discussed, as they were completely in the dark with regard to its operation throughout the country.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, it was understood on the day before that the Irremovable Poor Bill would come on first to-day. The Drainage Bill had been put down first by mistake on the paper; but he might mention that it was known to the Members of the Poor Relief Committee yesterday that that Committee would not meet that day in consequence of the Irremovable Poor Bill being on the Paper.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that he knew nothing of the verbal arrangements, but he had come a long way to attend to the Drainage Bill, in consequence of seeing it first in order upon the notice paper up to the latter part of last week. He thought, therefore, they had a great right to complain of the transposition of the orders.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, it was no excuse to say that a mistake had been committed. There ought to be a more orderly mode of conducting the business of the House. As far as he himself was concerned, his own Amendment, to add to the end of the 9th Clause—

“Provided also that extra-parochial places which have, heretofore, paid no contributions to the common fund of the union in which they are comprised shall, notwithstanding anything herein contained, be hereafter exempt from such contributions,” was now before the Committee; but had it not been for an accident he should not have been present to support it. He had looked at the votes that morning in order to ascertain whether the Irremovable Poor Bill was preceded on the orders by one or two notices, and then, to his great surprise, he found that the Bill stood first of all, and that if he wished to be present at the discussion of his own Amendment he must hurry down to the House.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, it was an error to say that the mistake was not discovered till two or three in the morning. It was discovered at five o'clock in the afternoon.

MR. HENLEY said, the mistake might have been found out by five o'clock, but it was not intimated to the House till between two and three in the morning.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, that all misunderstanding on this subject would have been avoided if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Villiers) had informed the House yesterday that it was his intention to bring the Bill in on that day.

MR. KNIGHT said, he could not agree that his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) had made out any case in favour of his Amendment, and he, therefore, felt bound to oppose it.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he would leave his Amendment with the Committee, only observing that it was supported by the great authority of the right hon. Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) and the right hon. Member for Kilmarnock (Mr. Bouverie), and that the owners of extra-parochial places would suffer injustice if, having hitherto paid nothing for the support of the poor in those places, they were now compelled to contribute to the common fund.

Amendment negatived.

MR. KNIGHT said, that upon that clause the whole of the Bill turned. It was, in fact, the introduction of a totally new principle in the administration of the Poor Law. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board said that since the passing of the Irremovable Poor Act in 1846, the pressure on the towns had increased. But the fact was that all the large towns, except Liverpool, were paying less for the poor than they did before the Irremovable Poor Bill was passed in 1846. [A great equalization of the poor rate had been going on since the peace. For the ten years ending in 1822 the average poor rates for England and Wales was 2s. 5½d. in the pound; and up to the passing of the Poor Law Amendment Bill the rate was 1s. 10½d. in the pound. During the last few years it had been 1s. 1½d. At the end of the French war many parishes paid in poor rates as much as 4s., 5s., 6s., and even 7s. in the pound; at present most of these were under 2s. in the pound. In 1815 Sussex was the most burdened by the poor rate, paying no less than 5s. 0½d. in the

pound; the lowest rated county, Northumberland, paid 1s. 1½d. in the pound. At present, or rather according to the last returns, the highest rated county was Wiltshire, where the poor rate was 1s. 10d.; the lowest rated, Derbyshire, paid 6d. The charge was false that the poor had been shifted from one class of parishes to another by pulling down cottages. He had tested the evidence given on this point by the census returns of 1851, and found that houses had increased in parishes where they were said to have been pulled down in order to drive out the poor. The fact was that it was found necessary to have the labourers living in the parishes in which they were employed; but it could be demonstrated that the villages and small towns from where labour was drawn increased in wealth enormously. The effect of small areas of rating was to spread villages and small towns all over the country, whereas large areas produced what he might call a congestion of habitations in one place. In the former case the labourers lived near to their work; in the latter they had often miles to go to their work. Mr. Darby, one of the Enclosure Commissioners, was examined before the Select Committee; and he stated that constant applications were made to the Commissioners to borrow money for the purpose of building cottages on entailed estates. It had been complained that while one parish paid 1s. 10d. in the pound another paid 10d. only. He denied that that was a grievance if the parish now paying 1s. 10d. formerly paid more; but if it was, he contended that the Bill would not cure the inequality of rating that now existed, for one union would still continue to pay double what was paid by another. He opposed the clause, for the equalization of the rates throughout a union was not a final measure. Evidently it was a stepping-stone to a national rate. No less than 9,000 parishes would be mulcted by the iniquitous operation of the Bill. When the grossest abuses of the Court of Chancery were swept away compensation was granted; but by this Bill it was proposed, without compensation, to take away from the present possessor of property one-tenth to one-eighth of his estate, and to hand it to some one else. The hon. Member for Sussex truly stated on the former occasion when the subject was discussed, that the area of relief was "neighbourhood." But was a union a neighbourhood? Why many unions comprised four, six, and even ten neighbourhoods. Let a man go to an overseer or a guardian and ask for relief; and what was the reply? Why, he was asked, "Where do you live?" "Twelve miles off." If that answer were given, clearly the officer would say at once, "I do not know you; I cannot relieve you; go to your neighbourhood where you are known." In the reign of Elizabeth the poor rates were at first imposed on petty sessional districts. The area was too large; and twenty-six years afterwards it was divided into parishes. Again, sixty years later, in the reign of Charles I., the Poor Law system was found not to work in the large parishes in the north and elsewhere, and a law was passed to divide them into smaller areas. And the same result had worked out in Ireland. Another effect of the Bill would be to do away to a great extent with the practice now followed of employing men rather than allow them to go upon the poor fund, and this would lead to a great increase of the rates. The Bill would not give satisfaction. The London parishes and others, including Norwich, complained that the three years' residence would prove highly injurious to them. He thought the London parishes were entitled to some consideration, and that a rate in aid or some other expedient should be resorted to in order to relieve overburdened parishes in London. The large town parishes were, generally speaking, unions in themselves. The present law of removability was most oppressive to the Irish. Where they became irremovable they were fixed for life. The moment they passed the parochial boundaries they became liable to be sent back to Ireland. The Bill, however, would remedy neither of these evils, and he would move the rejection of the clause.

MR. BARROW denied that this was the commencement of a system of parochial rating, for such a system commenced as long ago as 1834. [MR. KNIGHT: Charged on the parish.] The present Bill was intended to do away with a clumsy and unjust arrangement, by which under a system of averages one place was benefited at the expense of others. The charge for the common fund was not to be extended to larger areas than at present; it was simply to be levied on a new principle. It was not a question between town and country. It seldom happened that urban and rural parishes were combined in the same union. The complaints that were made were made by rural parishes in a country union, and by urban parishes in a town union. It had been urged that the Bill might increase the parochial burdens in some places to the extent of 2s. or 2s. 6d. in the pound. But the total amount of the poor rates was only 1s. 1½d. in the pound; and the irremovable poor were only one-third of the whole of the paupers. How, then, the imposition of 4½d. in the pound could cause a burden of 2s. or 2s. 6d. in the pound, he could not understand. He believed that the Bill would get rid of a great many of the inequalities which existed under the past system; and, therefore, he was anxious that it should pass without delay.

MR. HENLEY said, he was unable to support the clause. They were without sufficient information on the subject to enable them to judge of the effect of the change proposed. They could not be said to be acting on the recommendations of the Committee, for one of the principal recommendations of the Committee had been rejected by the House. He was surprised to hear his hon. Friend (Mr. Barrow) say that because the average rate for the poor in England was 1s. 1d., therefore, there could not be an advance of 2s. or 2s. 6d. in any one parish. No one could deny that the changes proposed in the Bill would be beneficial to the poor; but when they were breaking down the statutable liabilities of 300 years they ought to know exactly on whom the burden was to be shifted. He thought, if there were injustice in the existing system, it would be better to suffer that injustice for another year rather than to shift the burden in a way which they did not fully understand. His right hon. Friend (Sir John Pakington) urged that extra-parochial places would for the first time be subjected to the poor fund; but there were other places that might be included in the same way—mines other than coal mines, for example. Now that this shifting of burdens was taking place the whole question of settlement ought to be inquired into, with the view of placing it on a more satisfactory basis. No one thought it was in a satisfactory state at this moment. With regard to the rural parishes, they were what had been called "breeding parishes." The women there bore ten, eleven, or twelve children, and the hive soon swarmed. Well, the young ones, when they grew up, went away, some of them to the four corners of the world, and some of them to the large towns of the country. But, although the towns derived the advantage of their labour, they did not acquire a settlement in the towns; for cases constantly occurred in which, in default of acquired settlement, the man or the woman, or their offspring, came back to the birth settlement one or two or more generations after the original migration. He thought that the Bill should be tried for one year only, in order that it might be seen how it would operate, and in order to give time for full inquiry into the present law of settlement.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that it was he who was responsible for the first introduction of the change proposed. In the year 1845 he introduced a Bill making provision, not only for the irremovability of the poor, but frankly, on the face of the Bill, seeking to establish union settlement, and he made that proposal deliberately, and after full consideration with the authorities with whom he was connected. That Bill did not pass; but in 1846 he introduced a Bill of a similar nature, omitting the provision respecting union settlement. His belief was that the adoption by the Legislature of the principle of irremovability, especially when coupled with a union charge, would ultimately lead to the abolition of the law of settlement, as well as an enlargement of the area of rating, and he avowed that he thought those changes desirable. After he went out of office the Bill was proceeded with, and the present Speaker moved an instruction to the Committee that provision should be made for union settlement with respect to the irremovable poor. That instruction was carried out so far. In 1847 Mr. Buller moved for a Committee of Inquiry, and in that Committee the fullest inquiry took place. Indeed, he believed there never was a question so fully investigated and discussed as this had been. The Committee came to a Resolution declaring that the power of removing the poor ought to be abolished; but, what was more germane to the subject under discussion, they ruled also that the narrowness of the area of rating was a great source of evil, that it was desirable to extend the area of rating, and that unions formed the fittest area for that purpose. These were important decisions come to by hon. Gentlemen who were well able to judge, and after the fullest inquiry. It had been said that Mr. Buller changed his opinion. If so, the opinion of Mr. Buller must have been originally opposed to the extension of the area of rating, and the result of the inquiry must have been to lead him to the conclusion that the area of chargeability ought to be extended. When he (Sir James Graham) was connected with the Government of the Earl of Aberdeen, Mr. Baines, as head of the Poor Law Board, laid before that Government a Bill framed on the principles—a total abolition of the compulsory removal of the poor; an extension of the area of rating from the parish to the union; and an equitable establishment of a common fund based on an assessment of all rateable property. The hon. Member for Worcester (Mr. Knight) had referred to the fact that the unions in Ireland had been changed to electoral divisions; but an electoral division in Ireland, though less than the average of English unions, was much larger than an English parish. He must say that he believed nothing would so much benefit the poor of this country as the abolition of settlement. Every poor labourer should have the most perfect liberty to choose his place of residence where he pleased, and he believed that nothing would confer a benefit so universal or so great to the poor as the abolition of settlement. He admitted, on the other hand, that hasty legislation might be most unjust to those who had the burden of supporting the poor. He was of opinion that they must gradually approach to union rating, and coincidentally with it to the abolition of settlement. If, however, he thought the present measure too violent as an approximation, or as a step in the direction of those objects, he would be unwilling to adopt it. But he believed that the measure was a gradual and safe advance towards what he thought was advisable, while it was not unjust in itself. For that reason he should support the Bill. He, at the same time, thought that the whole question of settlement and the irremovability of the poor must next come under the consideration of the Legislature. He was disposed to think that the area of rating should be extended to the existing unions, but, at the same time, was ready to admit that if difficulties stood in the way it might be judicious to act as they had done in the case of Ireland and adopt a middle course, taking an area that would not be so large as the union nor so small as the parish.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he believed that the circumstances of the case justified the advance proposed to be made towards union rating. They had heard a great deal about the narrow end of the wedge being inserted, but the truth was that it was introduced by the minority of the Committee to which his right hon. Friend had referred, who brought in a Bill which led to the irremovable poor being placed on the common fund. He cordially supported the Bill, as he thought it would be highly beneficial to the poor.

MR. CAYLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle had spoken with great caution as to the probable effects of the proposed change of taxation, and he hoped the Government would take warning from the tone of the right hon. Gentleman's speech. The effect of the proposed change would be to impose upon close parishes for the first time a tax of 3s. in the pound, a sum equal to 15 per cent upon the rack rent. Again, it required 15 per cent to bring the land into cultivation. Other charges amounted to 5 per cent. The management came to another 15 per cent. All these together amounted to 50 per cent. If then it was true, which he hoped was not the case, that the land of the kingdom was mortgaged to the extent of 50 per cent, the apparently occupying owner was really an occupant only on sufferance. He should like to know what practical acquaintance the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board had with poor rates, and he would ask whether he had ever paid poor rates in the course of his life? The law intended that the support of the poor should fall on all classes of persons within a parish. Then, on what principle did they impose the burden on one class only? A great shifting of the burden of taxation had been going on during the last two or three centuries. The statute of Elizabeth imposed the poor rate on every man; and stock in trade was exempted only by the annual exemption Bill. If they were going back to first principles in making changes, why not go back to the original principle of the law? He had no objection to the abolition of settlement and to the imposition of a national rate for the support of the poor, provided it was practicable. He believed, however, it was not practicable. The moment a national rate was resorted to, it would be found that they had launched into a sea of experiment and extravagant management. Believing that the clause would greatly increase the rates in many parishes, and would introduce in others a heavy charge for the first time, and believing that it contained one of the most direct attacks on vested interests ever made, he would give it his most determined opposition.

MR. WALTER said, that unfortunate

9th Clause seemed to be thought a convenient one for hanging all sorts of arguments upon, and he rose merely to hang another upon it, which, he thought, had been lost sight of in the present discussion. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire had spoken of the shifting of burdens, and it was, no doubt, a proper subject of discussion under the clause. But nothing had been said of a considerable shifting of burdens that had already taken place in so many rural parishes by the rating of railways. He was not aware that any complaint had ever been made by landlords of the relief given to their parishes in consequence of a very heavy portion of the burden of supporting the poor having been thrown upon railways which passed through them. When hon. Gentleman spoke of the shifting of burdens, and of injustice being inflicted on certain parties, they should remember that no great measure of this kind could be passed without some shifting of burdens, and even a certain amount of injustice. It should at the same time be borne in mind that the shifting of burdens was no new principle in our legislation, but was one that had been frequently acted upon during the last twenty years.

SIR JERVOISE JERVOISE said, he considered that anything which would extend the area of the labourer's exertions would be an advantage. Serfdom had been abolished in Russia, and he thought they ought not to retain it in England. He believed the Bill before the Committee would be beneficial in that respect, and, therefore, he should support it.

LORD LOVAINE said, the question was not to be decided by the instances of particular parishes. It had been said that relief should be made as easy of access to the poor as possible. He believed that there could not be a greater curse to the poor than that relief should be made easy of access to them. What was wanted was that the deserving poor should be relieved in their distress. He regarded the present measure as an attempt to relieve the towns at the expense of the country parishes.

MR. ALDERMAN SIDNEY contended that as the management of the poor was in the union boards of guardians, the maintenance of the poor should be on the unions. In the Metropolis the want of a wider area of rating was to throw the support of the poor upon the poor. He believed that the law of settlement had very much to do with the strike in the building trades, because the men complained that, not being able to get residences near their work, they were away from home at least fourteen hours a day. He should support the clause.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) had referred to the rating of railways for the poor. It was only just that when a new description of property was raised up in a parish it should be subjected to the charge of the poor. A new element of rating was introduced, and it was only fair that it should be included. If, however, railways had been of advantage in one way to agricultural parishes they were a great drawback in others, for they were constantly drawing parishes into litigation, and entailing upon them heavy burdens, to the extent of hundreds, and sometimes thousands of pounds. He had certainly never heard before that the poor laws had anything to do with the strike in the building trades. He should be glad to know whether the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor Law Board intended to persevere with this clause after the comments which had been made upon it?

MR. CONINGHAM said, it should be considered that railways had no voice in the administration of the poor funds, and, besides, that they added greatly to the value of landed property in rural parishes.

MR. KENDALL urged that more time was required for the consideration of that large and important subject. He was convinced from his own experience that a union rating would lead to laxity of administration.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to put before the Committee the result of some recent experience which he had acquired. A committee of which he was a member had raised £40,000 to relieve the distresses in the ribbon trade at Coventry, and in the adjacent districts. They worked for some time by a central committee upon the numerical principle—he meant according to the population of each parish. He saw the principle fail. Without the test of individual responsibility they could obtain no security that imposition would not be practised. They, therefore, gave up the numerical principle. The Committee then obtained a census showing the number actually in distress in each district without reference to mere population, which was equivalent to value. They found that if they took that consideration only they would equally waste their funds and fail to do justice. He was convinced that if the committee adopted the principle of rating by value they would annul the sense of responsibility in the parishes, and lose all economical control, and that a great mass of irremovable poor would be located in several unions, in which the responsibility of individuals would be too small to induce exertion to prevent abuse. He, therefore, opposed the element of numbers alone, as he opposed the element of value alone, feeling convinced that the principle of the old law of Elizabeth, the union of the two, was the proper basis of legislation on the subject. It might be difficult, but the Legislature should not give it up on the ground of difficulty. He was convinced that a maximum rating ought to be adopted, and that being reached, all further proceedings should be in the nature of a rate in aid, which should extend over the union of which the parish, in which the rates had reached a maximum, formed a part.

Motion made, and Question put, "That Clause 9 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 127; Noes 44: Majority, 83.

Clause agreed to.

MR. AYRTON said, he would propose a clause restricting the operation of the Act to five years. If found to be a wise measure it could be renewed.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, he had heard no reason given for adopting the clause, but he should not wish to oppose it if it were the wish of the House.

MR. CAYLEY said, he should support the clause. The clause on which they had just divided had been carried by a majority, not one-tenth of whom had listened to the discussion which took place, and who only came into the House when the question was put.

MR. POULETT SCROPE said, he hoped that no limit would be introduced into the Bill.

Clause negatived.

Preamble agreed to.

House resumed; Bill reported, without Amendment, to be read 3^o To-morrow.

REMOVAL OF SCOTCH AND IRISH POOR BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Warrant of Removal to be signed in Petty Sessions, or by a Police Magistrate),

COLONEL DUNNE said, that on behalf of his hon. and gallant Friend (General Upton), he would move to insert after "Ireland," in line 11, the words "or any place in Scotland to Ireland."

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he must oppose the Amendment, on the ground that the machinery of the Bill was wholly applicable to England.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that some of the most cruel cases of removal took place from Scotland, and he should press the Amendment if the right hon. Gentleman did not give him some assurance that a measure would be introduced for dealing with the Scotch grievance.

MR. C. P. VILLIERS said, the machinery of the Bill would not apply to Scotland, and, therefore, he proposed to withdraw all reference to Scotland in the Bill. His learned Friend the Lord Advocate would, however, next Session, bring in a Bill to carry out the objects of the present measure with reference to Scotland.

MR. HENNESSY said, he must object to proceeding with the measure, which was one of great importance, in the absence of any Irish official.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he could not sufficiently admire the spirit with which his right hon. Friend the President of the Poor Law Board had promoted the Bill. It would be of great advantage to the Irish poor, and he thought the hon. Gentleman ought to thank his right hon. Friend for the perseverance which had enabled him to bring it to its present stage.

MR. MONSELL said, he believed it would be of great advantage to the poor of Ireland, and regretted that the case of Scotland had not also been proceeded with. He was satisfied, however, with the statement that a Bill relating to Scotland would be introduced next Session.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed; Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

ROYAL ATLANTIC MAIL COMPANY.

PETITION.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he rose to present a petition from Mr. George O'Malley Irwin, who claimed to be the original promoter of the Royal Atlantic Steam Packet Company, complaining of the manner in which the affairs of the Company had been conducted by Mr. John Lever, and charging against him various fraudulent acts in his capacity as managing director.

MR. ROEBUCK: Sir, I rise to order. I want to know if a libel such as that the nature of which we have just heard, ought to be circulated by means of a petition to this House?

MR. SPEAKER said, the hon. Member for Brighton was in order in stating the prayer of the petition.

MR. CONINGHAM observed that perhaps the hon. and learned Member would allow him to finish, and he would see that the petition was not a libel. The hon. Member accordingly proceeded to read the petition.

MR. ROEBUCK: Now we know that that petition is a libel, and I want to know if a libel can be read in this House. This man has been in prison for nine months, and I want to know if such a petition as that can be received. I move that the petition be not received, and the reason why I make that Motion is this—

MR. SPEAKER: A petition is presented to this House on the responsibility of the hon. Member presenting it. The House is not acquainted with the contents of a petition until after it is presented, and, therefore, it is presented on the authority of the hon. Member who has it in charge that it contains no offensive matter, or matter that is contrary to the rules of the House. We have only heard the statement of the hon. Member, and if there be any question about the contents the petition the proper course is to move that it be placed in the hands of the clerk, and read by him at the table.

MR. ROEBUCK: Then, Sir, I move that this petition be read by the clerk at the table.

"Petition of George O'Malley Irwin, alleging certain Frauds stated to have been committed by the Managers and Officers of the Royal Atlantic Mail Steam Navigation Company, and praying for inquiry; and also that the Attorney General may be directed to prosecute John Orrell Lever, esquire (a Member of this House), and other Managers of the said Company, for participation in the said alleged Frauds."

—brought up and read.

Motion made and Question proposed. "That the said Petition do lie upon the Table."

MR. ROEBUCK: I am about, Sir, to move that that petition be not received. In the first place, I think the right to present petitions to this House on the part of the people of England is one of the most important that they can enjoy, but if it should be turned to the purposes of private malice it may become one of the greatest evils. Let me tell the history somewhat of this man. In the first place, he has been convicted of forgery, and has been nine months in prison in Ireland. He has brought actions against Mr. Lever, and all those actions have been rejected by the English Courts of Law. Now the whole of that petition is accusation, and I hope this House will not allow itself to be made an instrument to gratify the malicious propensities of any individual. I say, Sir, without taking up the time of the House, that this man is unworthy of credit. He has proved himself so. He is lying in gaol on an accusation of forgery, of which he was convicted; and I say that such a man as that ought not to have the power of giving pain to any hon. Member of this House. I, therefore, move that the House do not receive the petition.

LORD DUNKELLIN seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "Petition" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "be rejected"—instead thereof.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: The petition, as far as I could collect from the reading, implicated the character and conduct of an hon. Member of this House. I think it would have been well if the hon. Member for Brighton, before presenting that petition, had given notice to the hon. Member concerned that he was about to do so, and that it contained a statement gravely implicating his conduct. I am not sure whether the hon. Member for Brighton took that course. I believe it is one not only in conformity with the usual practice of the House, but it is a simple rule of justice. The question now submitted to the House, however, is whether the petition shall be received or not. Now, as far as I can collect, there seems to be nothing in the petition which should induce the House to reject it. It is a statement implicating a Member of this House, and without saying anything about the accusations—I know nothing about them—the House should consider whether, supposing the statements were true, they would not receive a petition of the kind if it were expressed in proper language, although it might inculcate the character of a Member of this House. I apprehend we have but one course to pursue. The petition being presented by the hon. Member inculcating the character of another Member, and couched in proper language, is one which we are, I imagine, bound to receive; then it is our duty to ascertain whether there is any foundation for those charges or not. But I apprehend it is the duty of any hon. Member of this House, before he presents a petition inculcating so gravely the character of another hon. Member to ascertain that there is ground for making those charges and to be prepared to substantiate them, when the House, in vindication of the character of one of its Members, offers him the opportunity of so doing. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Brighton is prepared to do this. He has not given notice of a Motion founded on the petition, and I must say that an hon. Member who presents a petition of this character containing grave charges against the conduct of a Member of this House is bound to take the first opportunity of laying before the House the grounds upon which he has thought himself justified to bring such accusations. If it turns out, as we all must hope it will turn out with respect to the character of any Member, that such charges are unsubstantial and not founded in fact, and that there is scarcely sufficient prima facie evidence on which to bring them under the notice of the House, then it will be a matter for the House to consider whether the hon. Member who brings forward these charges is not justly worthy of the condemnation and censure of the House. As far as the reception of the petition is concerned, I apprehend that in conformity with the usual practice, the petition not being worded disrespectfully or in unbecoming language, is one that we ought to entertain.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, there was another matter that the House ought to take into its consideration. The House had delegated to a Committee an inquiry into the circumstances of the Atlantic Steam Packet Company. That Committee had diligently inquired into the subject, but had not yet reported. The Committee would, however, sit the next day for the purpose of considering the Report, and he thought it was hardly right that a petition involving so many circumstances connected with the question should be received until the Report was made. At all events he thought the hon. Member for Brighton ought to withdraw the petition until the Report was before the House. He might state that no charge had been made before the Committee to inculcate the directors of fraud or malversation, but he had seen a letter signed by the gentleman who signed this petition, not addressed to the Committee, but sent to a Member of that Committee, which contained many of the charges now before the House; but he (Sir John Trollope) thought the Committee exercised a wise discretion in refusing to enter into those charges, as they had not been referred to them. The hon. Member for Brighton would, he repeated, do well to withdraw the petition until the Report of the Committee was before the House.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he wished to say a few words on behalf of an absent Gentleman, who was his colleague. He did not dispute that the knowledge of the practice of the House possessed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) was superior to his own, but he could not help dissenting from the rules laid down by the right hon. Gentleman as regulating the presentation of petitions. It was evidently impossible for him during the rapid although distinct reading of the petition by the clerk at the table to understand fully the extent of the imputations against his hon. Colleague. But what he knew of him who had signed the petition would make him very tender about believing everything he might put forward. He would undertake to say that if the House thought that such imputations, reflecting as they did upon the life and business habits of a gentleman out of that House, were matters for inquiry within that House, his hon. Friend (Mr. Lever) would not shrink from taking the full responsibility of his acts. He felt certain that if his hon. Friend had had any idea that such a petition would be presented he would have attended in his place. Meanwhile, as it was not the practice of the House to concern itself with the occupations or professional business of hon. Members out of doors, he should support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend for the rejection of the petition, the presentation of which would do no credit to the House, nor was it calculated to increase the confidence which hon. Members were accustomed to place in those rules of justice and honour that guided the transactions of the House. He regretted that the hon. Member for Brighton had not first satisfied himself of the truth of the charges in the petition. That hon. Member was not lucky in the allegations he made against individuals. Only yesterday that hon. Member had "hinted a doubt and hesitated dislike" against a gallant and distinguished officer, and now he brought charges of dishonesty against an hon. Member of the House. He trusted that the House would mark its sense of the nature of the petition and the manner in which it had been presented, and that such charges would not be tolerated by the House.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that when a petition of this nature was about to be presented to the House it was usual, in conformity with the courtesy due from one gentleman to another, to give to the hon. Member whose conduct was complained of notice of such intention, in order that he might be in his place and have an opportunity of meeting the charges contained in the petition. Under these circumstances he certainly thought that the hon. Member for Brighton would do well, seeing that a Report was to be presented on a future day, to withdraw the petition now. [Some cries of "No!"] Hon. Members said "No!" and assumed that, because the petition contained libellous matter, the House ought not to entertain it; but numbers of petitions containing libellous matter were presented. The newspapers published them and the speeches made in connection with them at their own risk; but the rule laid down by the House was that such petitions should be printed for the use of Members only, as the charges made might be groundless. He did not think that the House ought to reject the petition or to deny access to any petitioner who made charges which he stated he was prepared to substantiate. At the same time opportunity should be given to the Member of meeting the charges made against him. He would not say there was anything in the petition which required the cognizance of the Committee now sitting, but he thought the hon. Member for Brighton should not have presented it without giving full notice to the Member whose conduct it impugned.

MR. DISRAELI: Sir, it is important that the country should clearly understand that the reception of petitions by this House is not a matter of course. The presentation of petitions is the exercise of a valuable right to the people, and I hold the privilege to be of inestimable value; but it should be clearly understood that the House has the power of refusing the reception of petitions. In this instance, some grounds of objection may arise on the matter of the petition, and thus some hon. Gentlemen have stated as a ground for its rejection, that it is libellous. The matter contained in the present petition may be, as the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield says, utterly untrue and unfounded, but I confess I do not think that a sufficient ground for refusing to receive this petition. It is the duty of the House to listen to any charges that may be made against its Members, and I suppose that the first feeling of any Gentleman whose character and conduct has been assailed would be to throw no obstacle to the fullest investigation. Another ground of objection may be found in the manner of the presentation, and with respect to the manner in which this petition has been presented I do think very grave objections arise. Not merely a deficiency of that courtesy usual between Members has been shown by not giving notice to the Member whose conduct is impugned, or any public notice of the intention to present the petition, but it is impossible to shut one's eyes to the fact that weeks have now elapsed since the subject to which it related was matter of controversy and discussion in this House. The attention of the country has been drawn to it, and yet this Gentleman never thought it his duty to present a petition till now. And when is this petition presented? At the fag-end of the Session, when it is quite impossible, if it be desirable, that a Committee should be appointed to examine into the allegations. That is a course of conduct which the House ought not in any way to sanction, for it tends to show that the presentation of this petition is not invested with the bond fide and genuine character which a petition alleging such grave charges ought to have. I think, however, that the House should be cautious in supporting a Motion for the rejection of a petition, and I, therefore, trust that the hon. and learned Member, who has properly called attention to the subject, will be content with the suggestion made that the petition should be withdrawn. I think that such a course will sufficiently show the sense of the House that in the presentation of a petition containing grave charges against an hon. Member there has been a want of that courtesy which should attend such a proceeding; and that, moreover, the petition has been presented under circumstances of delay, after the question has been under the consideration of the House, that are full of suspicion. I cannot condescend to go into the character or conduct of the petitioner. I have no doubt that in due course that will influence the opinion of the House and the country on the subject; but the manner in which the petition has been presented is not respectful to the House, nor has there been paid that deference to fair and honourable conduct which is desirable, and which we should be anxious to encourage. I, therefore, think that the petition should not be received, but I hope that the hon. Member for Brighton will withdraw it.

MR. GREGORY: As Chairman of the Committee which is now sitting, I may observe that we received an application from this person (Mr. O'Malley Irwin) to be examined, with a view to substantiate against the hon. Member and others connected with the Galway contract similar allegations to those which he has made in this petition. The Committee, having looked at the reference that was made to them, were of opinion that it was altogether out of place for them to consider these allegations, and they, therefore, refused to enter into them. I must call the attention of the House to the position we are in. I think the House ought to mark very strongly its disapprobation of the conduct pursued by the hon. Member for Brighton. Remember the position in which we stand. If an hon. Member is to come down to this House and make himself the vehicle of libel and slander, all I can say is that, under these circumstances, the character of every Member of this House is liable to be affected by any person, no matter how low his position in society, who chooses to hand a Member a petition affecting his character and fair fame. These things go abroad into the world, the Member is gibbeted before the public for doing things which may be, and which in this case I believe are, entirely false. A man brings charges of the worst and most degrading character, and they go abroad into the world before he has an opportunity of repelling them. I think the House ought to mark its sense of such conduct by rejecting this petition, and I certainly cannot congratulate the hon. Member for Brighton for having converted himself into a "lion's mouth" for the reception and venting of every charge which a person of bad character may choose to make.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, if there was one privilege or right which the people prized more than another, it was the right of petition. But it was the bounden duty of the House to take care that the right was properly used, and not abused. He knew nothing of the hon. Member against a letter signed by the gentleman who signed this petition, not addressed to the Committee, but sent to a Member of that Committee, which contained many of the charges now before the House; but he (Sir John Trollope) thought the Committee exercised a wise discretion in refusing to enter into those charges, as they had not been referred to them. The hon. Member for Brighton would, he repeated, do well to withdraw the petition until the Report of the Committee was before the House.

LORD DUNKELLIN said, he wished to say a few words on behalf of an absent Gentleman, who was his colleague. He did not dispute that the knowledge of the practice of the House possessed by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) was superior to his own, but he could not help dissenting from the rules laid down by the right hon. Gentleman as regulating the presentation of petitions. It was evidently impossible for him during the rapid although distinct reading of the petition by the clerk at the table to understand fully the extent of the imputations against his hon. Colleague. But what he knew of him who had signed the petition would make him very tender about believing everything he might put forward. He would undertake to say that if the House thought that such imputations, reflecting as they did upon the life and business habits of a gentleman out of that House, were matters for inquiry within that House, his hon. Friend (Mr. Lever) would not shrink from taking the full responsibility of his acts. He felt certain that if his hon. Friend had had any idea that such a petition would be presented he would have attended in his place. Meanwhile, as it was not the practice of the House to concern itself with the occupations or professional business of hon. Members out of doors, he should support the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend for the rejection of the petition, the presentation of which would do no credit to the House, nor was it calculated to increase the confidence which hon. Members were accustomed to place in those rules of justice and honour that guided the transactions of the House. He regretted that the hon. The presentation of petitions is the exercise of a valuable right to the people, and I hold the privilege to be of inestimable value; but it should be clearly understood that the House has the power of refusing the reception of petitions. In this instance, some grounds of objection may arise on the matter of the petition, and thus some hon. Gentlemen have stated as a ground for its rejection, that it is libellous. The matter contained in the present petition may be, futation of the allegations embodied in the petition. Now, it appears to me that my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton has not, so far as any statement goes which I have heard from him, fulfilled either of those duties. He has not, so far as I am aware, told us that he himself has examined into the charges in question, or satisfied himself that there were prima facie grounds for those charges being made. Neither does it appear that he has given Mr. Lever or any other person alluded to in the petition notice that he was about to lay it before the House. That being the state of the case, my hon. Friend would, I think, do well to take back the petition. He would, by adopting that course, be afforded an opportunity of informing himself somewhat better upon the subject, and if upon inquiry he should find that the matter of the petition is really such that the honour of the House is involved owing to the conduct of one of its Members, and that a serious examination of the charges made is necessary, he might bring the subject forward on some future occasion, having in the meantime given Mr. Lever due notice that it was his intention to take that course. I trust, therefore, my hon. Friend will either withdraw the petition, or that the debate will be adjourned.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he wished at once to express his readiness to withdraw the petition in compliance with what seemed to be the wish of the House. He might, however, before he sat down, be allowed to say that of all the Members of the House the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield was the very last who ought to complain, as he had done, of personal attacks being made, inasmuch as no hon. Gentleman so freely used, or rather abused, the system of personal attack as himself. With respect to the remarks which had been made by a noble Lord who had taken part in the discussion (Lord Dunkellin), as to the course which he (Mr. Coningham) had on the previous day pursued in calling the attention of the House to the appointment conferred upon a gallant officer, he would only say that as a Member of Parliament he claimed it as a right to call in question the expediency of all important public appointments if he felt called upon to do so. ["Question, question!"] He trusted that as he had been attacked hon. Members would not interrupt him. It was contended by the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) that in presenting a petition which was characterized as libellous he was doing a serious wrong to the character of an hon. Member, and suggested that the petition should, on that ground, be rejected. He would, however, venture to say, in reply to that suggestion, that if he were attacked in the same way as the Gentleman against whom the accusations were made, he should, so far from endeavouring to avoid publicity, urge the institution of the strictest and most searching investigation into all the details of the charge. He had, he might add, no personal knowledge of Mr. Irwin, and had received his petition only a few hours before. He found that Mr. Lever was absent, but having learnt that the petitioner had appealed to the Committee now sitting upstairs with the view of having the subject of the petition investigated; that the Committee had rejected his request to be examined on the subject, and that their labours were on the point of terminating, he looked upon the presentation of the petition as a matter of urgency. He was, he could assure the House, actuated by no motive whatsoever save a regard for the public interest in taking the course which he had pursued, and he was strongly of opinion that when hon. Members recalled to mind all that had occurred in courts of law and elsewhere on the subject there existed a prima facie case on which the presentation of the petition could be justified. It was, he thought, for the interest of the House that the petition should be referred to the Committee upstairs and printed, while he was at the same time, as he had before stated, ready to withdraw it in compliance with what appeared to be the general wish.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he wished to refer to the course adopted by several hon. Members last Session, when charges of a nature to seriously affect his character had been made against himself, as one which was in accordance with the usual proceedings, under similar circumstances, of Members of the House and of gentlemen. The individual who made the accusations against him had, he might add, not been convicted of any crime, yet those Members to whom letters were addressed praying that the charges might be brought before the House were so good as to communicate with him whom those charges affected. He had disregarded the attack for some time, but, finding that it began to assume a serious character, he had instituted proceedings in a court of law, and the offender was sentenced to imprisonment whom the petition was presented. But if the House received the petition they would constitute themselves a species of grand jury, and find a true Bill without giving the hon. Member an opportunity of inquiry into his conduct. If he understood the petition rightly, it contained serious charges against the hon. Member for Galway, and it asked the House to instruct the Attorney General to prosecute him for these matters. Now, if that hon. Member had been guilty of the frauds imputed, or the misconduct, that would not be the course which the House would pursue. It would not instruct the Attorney General to prosecute, but it would expel the Member—expulsion would be the proper course for such misconduct. He could not understand how it was that the hon. Member for Brighton had presented the petition without first giving notice of his intention to do so. He would not go into the question whether the petition was libellous, or whether the allegations were true, he would simply say that it ought not to have been presented, but having been presented simple withdrawal would not satisfy the justice of the case. The petition ought to be rejected altogether at the present moment. If the hon. Member should bring it forward at a future time, let him bring forward a petition properly worded, and give notice to the Member charged; and if the charges were true, let the Member be expelled from the House.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I wish to call the attention of the House to one point that has not yet been noticed, but which appears to me to have a material bearing on this case. Last year there was a Committee appointed to inquire into the circumstances attending the Galway packet contract, and after the Committee had made its report its attention was drawn to those charges which Mr. O'Malley Irwin made against Mr. Lever. The Committee thought that these charges ought not to be passed over. Mr. Irwin and other persons were examined with respect to them, and the Committee in their Report summed up the facts as they appeared in the evidence, and concluded by saying—

“Your Committee having now set forth the whole facts of the case, deem it advisable to leave the matter to the judgment of the House without suggesting any opinion of their own.”

The effect of this is that it cannot be said that these facts are now brought before the House for the first time; the House has had the opportunity if it had thought fit to use it to inquire into all the circumstances of the case. It has not so thought fit, but it is open to any hon. Member, with this Report before him, to make a Motion for further inquiry; but it is hardly fair to make an attack upon an hon. Member without notice on facts which are not new, and which the House, having the facts before it, has not thought fit to notice.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It seems to me that this matter involves to a great extent the privileges of the House of Commons and the duties of Members of Parliament. I cannot, however, admit that the fact that a petition contains grave charges against the character of any hon. Member—charges even amounting to a libel—ought to be held to be a good reason why the petition should not be received. I am, upon the contrary, of opinion that if any one of our number be guilty of any act disgraceful to himself personally and unbecoming his position as a Member of Parliament, it is rather the interest of the House that accusations made against him should be examined, while it is one of the material and essential privileges of the subject to be able to petition Parliament on any matter on which any individual may deem it desirable that his opinions should be submitted to its consideration. I do not, at the same time hold that an hon. Member is bound to present any petition which may be intrusted to him. No man has a right to come to me or to any other hon. Member and say, “I insist on your presenting my petition.” It is the duty of every hon. Member to whom a petition is handed for presentation to ascertain by inspection, and inquiry, if necessary, that its contents are fit to be laid before Parliament; and, if the petition should happen to be one inculcating the conduct of any Member, I should deem it to be the duty of the person intending to present it to do two things—first of all, to satisfy himself by the most diligent inquiry that there was a prima facie ground for the imputations which it contained, and, if he were unable to do that, to return the petition to the person from whom it emanated; secondly, in the event of his coming to the conclusion that just and sufficient grounds for the imputations existed to give notice to the Member against whom the charges were made, that on a certain day he meant to present a petition against him—thus affording him an opportunity of being in his place and making such a reply as he might have it in his power to make in resolution in favour of the Member inculpated; but to say that no subject of this realm shall present a petition inculpating a Member of this House does seem to me to be throwing an immunity over Members of the Legislature to which they are not entitled.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Brighton having offered to withdraw the petition, the first question I have to ask is whether the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield will withdraw his Amendment?

MR. ROEBUCK: I will not, Sir.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, it appeared to him that the charges contained in the petition were different from those which were referred to the Select Committee of last Session. The question before that Committee was one affecting the conduct of public officers of the Government. It appeared that Mr. Lever had contracted to give a large sum of money to Mr. Irwin and Mr. Holmes in the event of his succeeding, through their means, in obtaining a subsidy for the Galway Packet Company. That agreement was clearly proved before the Committee, and then the question arose whether the money was not intended to be given for the exercise of improper influence on the part of Mr. Irwin and Mr. Holmes. The whole evidence was directed to that point. There were no general charges of fraud such as those contained in this petition, no request that the Attorney General should be instructed to prosecute. Mr. Irwin came forward last year to establish his right to the sum of £10,000 which Mr. Lever had contracted to give him. That contract was said to affect the validity of the transactions with the Government. The Committee, seeing that the affairs of the Galway Company had passed into other hands, did not feel themselves bound to make any recommendation to the House on the subject; but at the same time he was clearly of opinion that no question of fraud committed by Mr. Lever was concluded either by the Report of the Committee or by the evidence taken before them.

The House divided:—Ayes 84; Nocs 75: Majority 9.

Question again proposed, "That the said Petition do lie upon the Table.

MR. SPEAKER said, he had then to put the question that the petition do lie on the table.

Lord John Russell

MR. CONINGHAM said, he would beg leave to withdraw the petition.

MR. BRADY did not think the hon. Member for Brighton deserved much credit for the step he had taken. An hon. Member before presenting any petition was bound to look to the character of the person from whom it had emanated. The character of the present petitioner was well known in all the courts of justice. The time of the House had, therefore, been misspent in considering a petition coming from such a source.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

MANAGEMENT OF THE DOCKYARDS, QUESTION.

THE EARL OF GIFFORD said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether any steps have been taken to carry out the Recommendations of the Royal Commissioners upon the Control and Management of the Dockyards, so far as those recommendations relate to the accounts of those Establishments, and to the placing of the Department of the Storekeeper General under the Control of the Controller of the Navy; and, if so, whether he had any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of any Board Minutes which may have been written, or of any Instructions which may have been sent, to the Dockyards upon those subjects?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET in answer to the question of his noble Friend, begged to state that the Admiralty, in accordance with the recommendation the Royal Commissioners upon the Control and Management of the Dockyards, had given directions that the accounts of those establishments should be placed under the Accountant General of the Navy. Instructions have been issued to that effect, and there would be no objection, if moved for, to place copies of them on the Table. With regard to the other part of the question, the placing of the department of the Storekeeper General under the control of the Controller of the Navy, he had to state that that was a matter which, having reference to the organization of the Admiralty itself, would no doubt be a subject of consideration before the Select Committee on the Admiralty next Session.

GREENWICH HOSPITAL BILL.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary of the Admiralty with reference to this Bill, which stood fifth among the Orders of the Day. That Bill was likely to occasion much discussion, and he wished to know what course the Government intended to take in regard to it?

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he did not know what priority would be given to any of the several measures marked on the Paper as first to be taken by the Government; but he thought it would be convenient to the despatch of public business if the second reading of the Bill to which the right hon. Baronet alluded were at once fixed for some day when there would be an opportunity for mature discussion.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, it was his intention to have brought on this Bill, if there had been an opportunity of doing so, before a very late hour; but in consequence of a communication which his noble Friend the Duke of Somerset had made to him to-day, he thought it more desirable not to bring on the second reading till Thursday next. He proposed, if he had the opportunity, to bring on the Bill on Thursday evening; and, if other important business prevented his doing so, he proposed not to proceed with the Bill during the present Session.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to know after what hour on Thursday the noble Lord would not proceed with the Bill?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, he would not bring it on after 11 o'clock.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL. OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I promised to state to the House this afternoon what course we mean to pursue in regard to the Bankruptcy Bill. There are three main points in which the Lords have made Amendments to that Bill. One is as to the appointment of the Judge; another is the substitution of official assignees for the creditors' assignees; and the third is as to the retrospective operation of certain clauses of the Bill. What we mean to recommend to the House is to agree with the Lords' Amendments in regard to the Judge; in regard to the assignees, we must prefer the creditors' assignees. We have no proposal to make to the House in regard to the third point. I should also state that we mean to have a morning sitting on Thursday for the purpose of going into Supply, and it would be very convenient for the despatch of business if hon. Members would abstain on that day from making preliminary Motions, so as to allow us to make as much progress in Committee as possible.

MR. DISRAELI: The noble Lord has not stated on what day he proposes to take the Lords' Amendment on the Bankruptcy Bill into consideration.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: On Thursday evening.

CASE OF COLONEL HENRY.

ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She would be graciously pleased to grant the pension of a major, in place of that of a captain, to Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, Royal Artillery, who had lost his arm when in command of an important battery before Sebastopol, he holding at the time the rank of brevet-major, which rank had been conferred upon him for distinguished conduct in the field; and to assure Her Majesty that that House would make good the same. Colonel Henry had performed the most distinguished service while in charge of a large and important battery which was placed in advance during the arduous siege of Sebastopol, and upon which the whole force of the Russians was turned. On the 17th of August, 1855, he had, while in command of that battery, had his right arm carried away by a round shot. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, who had been an eye-witness of the operations in the Crimea, in a letter which he had written, stated that "not only were the duties which Colonel Henry performed on the 17th of August, 1855, equal, but if anything superior to those of a field officer of infantry." The battery under Colonel Henry threw in upon the enemy nearly 1,000 32-pound shot in one day. On the 17th of November his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief again wrote that "Lieutenant-Colonel Henry's name was omitted to be placed on the roster of field officers when he received the brevet of major for distinguished service. Had that omission not occurred, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry would have been detailed as a brevet-major for the identical duties which he performed on the day he lost his arm." His Royal Highness recommended this case as one of peculiar hardship, and stated that Colonel Henry "was only prevented solution in favour of the Member inculpated; but to say that no subject of this realm shall present a petition inculpating a Member of this House does seem to me to be throwing an immunity over Members of the Legislature to which they are not entitled.

One is as to the appointment of the Judge; another is the substitution of official assignees for the creditors' assignees; and the third is as to the retrospective operation of certain clauses of the Bill. What we mean to recommend to the House is to agree with the Lords' Amendments in regard to the Judge; in regard to the assignees, we must prefer the creditors' assignees. We have no proposal to make to the House in regard to the third point. I should also state that we mean to have a morning sitting on Thursday for the purpose of going into Supply, and it would be very convenient for the despatch of business if hon. Members would abstain on that day from making preliminary Motions, so as to allow us to make as much progress in Committee as possible.

MR. DISRAELI: The noble Lord has not stated on what day he proposes to take the Lords' Amendment on the Bankruptcy Bill into consideration.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: On Thursday evening.

CASE OF COLONEL HENRY.

ADDRESS MOVED.

COLONEL NORTH said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She would be graciously pleased to grant the pension of a major, in place of that of a captain, to Lieutenant-Colonel Henry, Royal Artillery, who had lost his arm when in command of an important battery before Sebastopol, he holding at the time the rank of brevet-major, which rank had been conferred upon him for distinguished conduct in the field; and to assure Her Majesty that that House would make good the same. Colonel Henry had performed the most distinguished service while in charge of a large and important battery which was placed in advance during the arduous siege of Sebastopol, and upon which the whole force of the Russians was turned. On the 17th of August, 1855, he had, while in command of that battery, had his right arm carried away by a round shot. His Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief, who had been an eye-witness of the operations in the Crimea, in a letter which he had written, stated that "not only were the duties which Colonel Henry performed on the 17th of August, 1855, equal, but if anything superior to those of a field officer of infantry." The battery under Colonel Henry threw in upon the enemy nearly 1,000 32-pound shot in one day. On the 17th of November his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief again wrote that "Lieutenant-Colonel Henry's name was omitted to be placed on the roster of field officers when he received the brevet of major for distinguished service. Had that omission not occurred, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry would have been detailed as a brevet-major for the identical duties which he performed on the day he lost his arm." His Royal Highness recommended this case as one of peculiar hardship, and stated that Colonel Henry "was only prevented from serving as a field officer by the impossibility of other corps sharing in the professional work of the Royal Artillery, and that his duties as captain of a large and important battery in the advance were quite equal, if not superior, to those of a brevet-major of the Line." Sir Robert Dacres, who commanded the Artillery in the Crimea, as well as other competent military judges, had also given their testimony that Colonel Henry was a brave and most meritorious officer, and every way entitled to the boon which the present Motion sought to confer on him. He trusted, therefore, that the House would take the matter into their consideration.

SIR DE LACY EVANS said, he never knew of a case which seemed to him better worthy of consideration. He had not the pleasure of knowing Colonel Henry, but he knew that the gallant officer stood very high in the estimation of his corps. He was persuaded that the decision which had called for the Motion did not originate with the heads of the department. He thought the warrant was a fair and liberal regulation, but who was it who had interpreted the relative duties of the several ranks to which it referred? He had had some experience of services rendered in the field, and he could say, without hesitation, that Lieutenant-Colonel Henry's services were greater than those usually performed by field officers. He (Sir de Lacy Evans) was not an artillery officer; but, without making any invidious distinction in its favour as against other branches of the service, he must say that it was probably the most distinguished corps in the army, and entitled to high consideration. The question was one, however, which affected the whole of the army. The noble Lord the Secretary for War was not now in the country—they all lamented the cause—but as there was evidently some mistake, he hoped the noble Lord at the head of the Government would give some explanation on the subject.

MR. T. G. BARING said, he must, in the first place, beg to inform the hon. and gallant Colonel who had brought the matter forward that he was mistaken in supposing that the case of Lieutenant Colonel Henry had not been brought under the notice of the noble Lord the Secretary for War. It had been brought under the noble Lord's notice on several occasions; and the papers showed that he had gone very carefully into the facts, and given a very decided and deliberate opinion on the claim itself with a knowledge of all the circumstances. Before going into the merits of the case itself, he would beg the House, and also the right hon. Gentleman in the chair, to consider whether, under all the circumstances of the case, it was in order that the Motion should be put to the House, involving as it did an expenditure of public money. The hon. and gallant Member (Colonel North) had not put the Motion in terms similar to those in his notice. The question of order was too important to be passed over. In all cases involving the expenditure of public money, it was the order of the House that two opportunities of considering such question should be afforded; first, on the Motion that the House should resolve itself into a Committee to consider the case; and then, in Committee, upon a Motion for an Address to the Crown, praying that such a pension should be directed to be granted, and assuring her Majesty that the House would make good the same. The position of the hon. and gallant Gentleman was, in his opinion, therefore, clearly wrong, for his Motion had been made and seconded for an expenditure of public money contrary to the rules of the House. With respect to the Motion itself, he thought the House must feel that it would be extremely unadvisable for it to pronounce a judgment on individual cases contrary to the rules of the service. The hon. and gallant Colonel was himself the originator of the Pension Warrant. It was drawn up in consequence of some changes which he had advocated, and the hon. and gallant Gentleman expressed himself perfectly satisfied with its terms; yet he was the first man to bring the authority of the House of Commons into play in order to break through it. [Colonel NORTH: No, no!] He would show that the Motion would have that effect. The case was a very simple one. Clause 10 of the warrant declared that, as a general rule, the pension or gratuity should be granted according to regimental rank, but that should any officer, with or without brevet rank, have been employed at the time he was wounded in the discharge of duties superior to those attached to his regimental commission, the gratuity or pension should be in accordance with the regimental rank immediately above that held by him at the time. Under that clause, if a captain was discharging the duties of field officer he would be entitled to the pension of a field officer; but that was not the case made by Lieutenant Colonel Henry himself, for in one of the first letters, if not the first, from him on the subject, he stated that, though not performing the duty of a field officer at the time he received his wound, he was, nevertheless, induced to lay claim to the pension. It, therefore, appeared clear from Lieutenant Colonel Henry's own letter that he was not performing the duties of a field officer, but those of a captain of artillery. He must at the same time observe that there was not the slightest intention on the part of the War Office to disparage the services of Lieutenant Colonel Henry, who had done his duty well and gallantly, and was entitled to all the consideration due to officers who were wounded in service. He had received the usual gratuity of a year's pay, was transferred to the Horse Artillery, and received £100 per annum for the loss of limb. Lieutenant Colonel Henry was at that moment doing his duty and receiving his full pay in the Artillery, and he also received £120 a year for commanding the riding school department. Under those circumstances he hoped the House would arrive at the conclusion that that was not a case in which they ought to interfere with the War Office in the interpretation of a warrant which applied to the claims of so great a number of officers. Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member would not object to state how he came into possession of the documents from which he had read extracts, and which he Mr. Baring believed were portions of the correspondence that had passed between the General Commanding-in-Chief and the War Office in respect to this case. [Colonel North: They were sent to me. Does the hon. Gentleman deny their authenticity?] He did not dispute their accuracy, but he was not aware they had been moved for or laid on the table of the House or furnished to the hon. and gallant Colonel from the War Office, and he would add that he felt certain that his Royal Highness the General Commanding-in-Chief had not given any authority to any one in his office to publish such letters. The documents, moreover, gave an imperfect idea of the correspondence, and omitted all notice of the objections of the War Office. It was for the Secretary of State for War to decide upon all matters of expenditure, and it was not because claims were put before him in a favourable point of view that he was, therefore, bound to admit their justice.

Mr. SPEAKER said, that having been appealed to on a point of order he was bound to give his opinion. The Motion of the hon. and gallant Member for Oxfordshire, as it appeared on the paper, was not one which he could with propriety put from the Chair, because there was a Standing Order of not less than 200 years' standing which said that no Motion for any public aid or charge should be presently entered upon, and that they should not proceed to discuss any demand for public money on the same day it was made. He had pointed out the informality to the hon. and gallant Member, who has thereupon altered the form of his Motion. He could not say that the Motion was not in order in that form; but the hon. and gallant Gentleman laboured under the disadvantage of proposing a Motion which in effect pointed to the words which had been left out, and which were themselves irregular.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he could not regard the question as one of money, but one which affected the whole of the Ordnance corps. When the army was ordered to the Crimea there was such a want of artillery that a captain of artillery, though a field officer by brevet could not be spared to carry on the duties of a field officer. Could it, therefore, be supposed that it was the intention of the Secretary of State that the Ordnance corps should be debarred from the benefit of the Pensions Warrant? The General Commanding-in-Chief, it appeared, stated that Colonel Henry had virtually fulfilled the duties of a field officer. [Mr. T. G. BARING: The General Commanding-in-Chief does not say that Colonel Henry performed the duties of a field officer.] In the letter read by his hon. Friend his Royal Highness gave it as his opinion that Colonel Henry had duties to perform greater than those performed by an ordinary field officer. It was well known that the letter read by his hon. Friend was written by Sir Charles Yorke, Military Secretary to the Commander-in-Chief. Colonel Henry had performed the most distinguished services in the Crimea, and his name had been held up to the approbation of the army by the general in command before Sebastopol. On the day he received his wound he had been ordered to draw off the fire of the Russians, and in doing so he fired 1,000 rounds of heavy shot—an action in itself. No stronger case, therefore, could be presented than that of Colonel Henry. And as he was the only officer of Artillery in the Crimea or India who survived the loss of a limb, it could not be said that in granting his claims the country would be put to expense for other claimants. With reference to what fell from the Under Secretary for War, he (Captain Jervis) begged most emphatically to deny on the part of Colonel Henry that this question had anything to do with pounds, shillings, or pence, it was a point of military honour. Was Colonel Henry when he received his wound doing duties equivalent to a field officer's, or was he not? The Commander-in-Chief said he was. The Secretary for War said he was not. But who was the proper authority on such a subject, surely the military one. He trusted, therefore, the House would assert the principle that the civil authorities should not confine themselves to the mere wording of the warrant, but should be guided by what was the real intention of those who drew it up.

COLONEL NORTH said, he supported the Motion. The opinion of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief on this matter ought to have been attended to. He was burdened with all the disagreeable duties of holding courts-martial on officers, but had no voice in rewarding them. He could not but express his regret, therefore, that the hon. Under Secretary for War should have opposed the Motion on a mere quibble as to whether the Motion was rightly drawn or not, when it involved the case of one of the most distinguished officers which the country had produced, and who had been fearfully maimed in the service of his country. He should certainly take the sense of the House on the Motion.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped the House would consider well before it acceded to the Motion. It was no part of the functions of the House of Commons to administer the details of any department of the Government, and least of all would it be expedient that the House should take into its hands the administration of the military branch of the public service. It was obvious that if it were once understood that an officer whose claims, whether for promotion, or honours, or pecuniary allowance, had not met with the approbation of the responsible officer of the Government, who was answerable for the grants on the subject, could obtain the aid of some influential Member of the House, capable, either by his force of speaking or his position, to give effect to his claim, and that these matters could be made the subject of private canvass in the House there would, in the first place, be an end of all proper discipline in the army; and in the next place, no limit to the expenditure of public money. If one case was brought forward on very peculiar grounds, and in a manner to enlist the sympathies of the House, a precedent would be established, and upon that precedent other cases of the same nature, though, perhaps, not so strong, but coming within the same limit, would be submitted to the House and argued, and it would be quite in vain for the War Department to establish regulations and try and administer them, if exceptions from those regulations were forced upon them by debates and Motions. The hon. and gallant officer said it was extraordinary that the opinion of the Commander-in-Chief, whether here or abroad, should not be taken on the construction of a financial regulation; but, having been for many years the Secretary at War, he knew it was a fundamental maxim that then the Secretary at War (and the Secretary for War now occupied, of course, the same position) was the Financial Minister alone responsible for these grants, and for the interpretation of all regulations involving grants, though, of course, he would naturally pay great attention to military authority as to the conduct and merit of officers. Consequently, he could not admit that, after his noble Friend at the head of the War Department had repeatedly and deliberately examined this case, and come to the conclusion that it did not fall within the regulation, his opinion was to be set aside in consequence of other views taken by military officers. It might be right or not that the regulation should be altered so far as regarded the Artillery service; but, so long as the regulation remained unaltered, it was the duty of the Secretary for War to interpret the regulation according to its letter and spirit. A letter written by Colonel Henry had been read, stating that the service he then performed was the service of a captain; and how, therefore, could the head of the War Department set aside that allegation. Notwithstanding the sympathy which the House might feel for the gallant officer in question who had performed such distinguished services, he must say that it would set a bad precedent if it took upon itself to administer these rules and regulations instead of leaving them to be carried out by the public servants responsible to Parliament and the Crown.

COLONEL DICKSON said, the meanest subject of the realm could bring his grievance before that House. Why, then, should an officer in the army be debarred from doing so? He would admit that, if the warrant was read literally, Colonel Henry was not entitled to any pension beyond that of a captain, but it would be a gross injustice to place him in that position. The neglect of such claims as had justly been made by Colonel Henry, had caused wide dissatisfaction in the army at the weak manner in which the interests of deserving officers were supported against the innovations of the War Office. Officers in mere connection with the War Office, who had never seen a shot fired, or who had not seen as much service in their whole lives as Colonel Henry had seen in three months, were in receipt of large incomes, while under the warrant a most distinguished officer was refused that to which he was clearly entitled. He felt assured that if that state of things continued it would ultimately lead to results in connection with the army that would be greatly to be deplored.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to take into Her most gracious consideration the case of Lieutenant Colonel Henry, Royal Artillery, who lost his arm when in command of an important battery before Sevastopol, he holding at the time the rank of Brevet Major, which rank had been conferred upon him for distinguished conduct in the field."

The House divided:—Ayes 34; Noes 63: Majority 29.

PESTH CONSULSHIP.

ADDRESS MOVED.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to move that an Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She would be graciously pleased to give directions that steps be taken to enable Her Majesty to appoint a Consul at Pesth. The position of the town of Pesth as a place of commercial importance had become greatly altered since the navigation of the Danube had been rendered more free by the operation of the arrangements entered into at the Congress of Paris in 1856. He had, he might add, on a former occasion, asked the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary whether he intended to appoint a Consul at Pesth, and his answer had been that he did not think the town stood in need of the appointment. The noble Lord had also on the same occasion stated that Mr. Dunlop had been withdrawn from Pesth at the request of Austria, but the very fact that Mr. Dunlop had been there for seven months appeared sufficient proof that diplomatic agency between us and that part of the world was required. Mr. Dunlop had been sent to Pesth by the Embassy at Vienna, to which he was attached, at the request of the Government, with the view of furnishing information to them with regard to what was going on in Hungary, and he had, he believed, during the period which he held office not only obtained the respect and esteem of all with whom he became acquainted, but had also supplied the authorities at home with most authentic reports—reports, however, which Austria did not like, as she feared they might create an unfavourable impression in this country with respect to her conduct towards her Hungarian subjects. Be that, however, as it might, the appointment was one of importance, as hon. Members would readily admit when he told them that Pesth and Buda, which were separated from one another only by a river, as in the case of Southwark and the City of London, and which, therefore, in reality constituted a single city, contained a population of not less than 300,000 inhabitants. Pesth had also a Chamber of Commerce, and steamboats without end; while he found, from statistics which had been furnished him from that quarter, that the population of that town, which had in 1780 been only 13,000, had in 1800 increased to 30,000, in 1850 to 83,000, and in 1857 to 136,666 persons, Buda being on the opposite side of the river, with a population as large. Notwithstanding its importance, however, we had no Consul there, the nearest Consulate to it being that at Galatz, which was 300 miles distant. Why that should be so he was wholly at a loss to conceive, especially when he bore in mind how our consular establishments were scattered all over the world. We had, for instance, within a small district of Turkey in Asia five Consuls—one at Damascus, with a salary of £500 a year; one at Aleppo, with a salary of £350; one at Antioch, with a salary of £200; one at Jerusalem, with a salary of £350; and one at Jaffa, with a salary of something like £300. Now, of all the gross jobs that had ever been perpetrated he believed the appointment of a Consul at Jaffa was the greatest. The gentleman who held that appointment, too, had advantages which other Consuls did not possess, inasmuch as he was allowed to trade, and to report direct to the Foreign Office instead of to the Embassy to which he belonged, as with one or two exceptions those filling similar positions were obliged to do. He was a native of Turkey, in Asia; he had been a Roman Catholic, had become a Protestant, and had promised, he believed, to build a great number of churches, but he did not know that that promise had in a single instance been carried into effect. Now, why there should be a Consul at Jaffa, and not one at Pesth, he did not understand. He would at all events assure the House that he brought forward the present Motion at the request not only of a large number of persons resident in that city, but also of British subjects trading in that quarter. The noble Lord, indeed, had assigned as a reason for withdrawing Mr. Dunlop that it was not deemed desirable to give encouragement to any disaffected parties in Hungary. [Lord JOHN RUSSELL: I gave the Austrian version.] But he would ask the Austrian Government where they would find a man in Hungary who was not disaffected? Hungary sought the restitution of her ancient rights and constitution. Hungary asked for the restitution of her laws as they existed in 1848, and she would not give up a single point till Austria made that concession. It might be that Hungary at the present moment was following the advice of leaders to maintain the peace, but they might depend on it that the day was not far distant when the Hungarian question would again come before Europe, and might involve in it great difficulties. On a former evening he had asked whether the English Ambassador at Vienna had advised the Emperor of Austria not to receive the address from the Hungarian Diet at Pesth unless it fully recognized the Emperor's title as King of Hungary. The noble Lord at the head of the Government said there was not a word of truth in the Report. He hoped the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, who was not in his place on the former evening, could adhere to the statement that there was no foundation for the report of the Hungarian address having been sent back from Vienna by the advice of the English Government. But he thought there was some mistake about it. The report that there had been some interference by England was believed at Paris; it was believed at Turin, and it was not denied at Vienna. He was authorized to say that nothing would give the Hungarian people more satisfaction than the establishment of some diplomatic relations with them by the appointment of an English Consul at Pesth. At the present time, also, the steamers on the Danube were manned to a considerable extent by English engineers. These British subjects hoped the Government would take their case into consideration, and he had received a deputation from their body to request him to urge upon the Government the necessity of considering their case, and to point out that they would feel much safer if there was a Consul at Pesth, to whom they could apply in any case of necessity. In every point of view, commercial and political, a Consul at Pesth was required. He hoped the Government would take the subject into its serious consideration. He was sure the more it inquired the more it would be convinced of the necessity of some Consular establishment in that large, rising, and important town.

Mr. WHITE seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that steps be taken to enable Her Majesty to appoint a Consul at Pesth."

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that he would say a few words on the subject. With respect to the political part of the question, his noble Friend at the head of Government was quite right in urging on a night when he (Lord John Russell) was absent that the British Government had nothing whatever to do with the sending back of the Address that was sent by the Diet of Hungary to the Emperor. It did not appear to him that it was the sort of question on which any Government would consult the Foreign Ministers about. If any Address had been forwarded to him for presentation to Her Majesty, in which her title of Queen was omitted, and styling her "High and Mighty Lady," neither he nor his noble Friend would think of consulting any Foreign Minister as to the manner in which they should answer it. That was a point entirely for the consideration of the Minister of the Sovereign to whom the Address was sent. The Hungarian Diet themselves seemed to have felt that the title they gave was not proper, for they afterwards adopted another form of Address, which had been received. It was unnecessary, therefore, to discuss that point further. With regard to the subject of the hon. Gentleman's Motion, he did not think it necessary then to go into the subject of consular establishments generally, or the question of the Turkish Consuls in particular, as he did not think the House of Commons was the fitting place to decide where Consuls ought or ought not to be sent. With regard to Pesth, we had a diplomatic establishment at Vienna, and any representation could be made to the Court of Vienna which the Ministers of the Crown might think necessary. He had never been told by any persons interested in commerce that a Consul at Pesth was necessary. However, he was very glad to hear of the prosperity of Pesth, and if no war took place, if peace were maintained, and the resources and riches of Hungary continued to be developed, it might at some future time be of great advantage to appoint a Consul there. But he did not think there would be any advantage in such an appointment at that moment.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would advise his hon. Friend to leave the matter in the hands of the noble Lord. The people of Hungary might be assured that the people of England would ever take a warm interest in their freedom.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he would not trouble the House to divide on the question. But the noble Lord should recollect that the House of Commons had to pay the expenses of the consular establishments; it was, therefore, the duty of the House to see that the money was not uselessly expended in the appointment of Consuls where they were not necessary. He believed that it was necessary to have one at Pesth; but he feared the noble Lord had given way too much to Austria in his foreign policy. In his opinion they did not want Austria as a counter-balance to France, for England never had a better ally than the Emperor of the French; and France and England, with a united Italy by their side, could defy the world.

MR. LAYARD observed he was glad that his hon. Friend intended to withdraw his Motion. His hon. Friend seemed to be under the impression that it depended upon the noble Lord whether there should be a British Consul at Pesth, but that was not so. No country could appoint a Consul to any place except with the consent of the Government of the country within which the place was situated. He thought the Austrian Government had been wrong in insisting upon the withdrawal of Mr. Dunlop, because it was far better that the British Government should receive authentic reports of what took place in Hungary rather than the unauthentic accounts which they would, otherwise, have to rely upon.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

CROWN SUITS LIMITATION BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.
House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL proposed a new clause, the object of which was to prevent time running against the Crown during the existence of a demise.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH complained that the Amendment proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman had not been printed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he did not think it necessary to print an Amendment which did not at all militate against the provisions of the Bill.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered to-morrow.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.—ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [10th July], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

MR. LAYARD said, he must appeal to the hon. Member for Bath to postpone the Bill. His hon. and learned colleague (Mr. Locke), who was engaged in the discharge of professional duties at Brighton, had given notice of an Amendment that the Bill should be read a second time that day six months, and took a great interest in the question.

MR. TITE observed, that the hon. and learned Member for Southwark had already spoken against the Bill for three-quarters of an hour, and he did not see why he should postpone the second reading in consequence of the learned Gentleman's absence. The Bill had now been on the paper for a second reading twenty-six times, and he begged to proceed with it.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for to-morrow.

METROPOLIS LOCAL MANAGEMENT ACT AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. TITE moved the second reading of this Bill, which he stated referred to the proposed re-distribution of a debt of £94,000 among certain parishes, some of which the Metropolitan Board of Works thought had been unfairly burdened. The case of the parishes had been heard last year by the Select Committee to which the whole subject of this and the previous Bill had been referred, but two very important parishes, Camberwell and Wandsworth, alleged that they had not been heard, and that their cases, which were of extreme hardship, had not been fully considered. It was a matter the Board as a public body were unable to give an opinion upon, and as he, Mr. Tite, had always intimated, he intended, if the House should read the Bill a second time, to move that it be referred to a Select Committee, who would decide the justice or injustice of the case of the parishes in question.

MR. AYRTON said, he rose to appeal to the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department to give his assistance in rejecting the Bill. The provisions of both the preceding Bill and that under consideration were contained in a measure which was brought before the House last year. That measure was referred to a Select Committee, over which the present Secretary to the Treasury presided, and after a most careful examination, extending over seventeen days, and the hearing of witnesses from all sides, the Committee passed that portion of the measure which was contained in the Bill which had been just read a second time, and rejected that portion which was contained in the Bill now before the House. In that decision the Metropolitan Board of Works had acquiesced by proceeding with No. 1 Bill; yet they now came forward, he thought, in a very sly manner to impugn the decision of the Select Committee and reopen the whole question. If they meant to reverse the decision of the Select Committee, why did they not bring forward both Bills as one measure? He hoped the House would not encourage such irregular attempts at legislation, which would plunge the metropolitan parishes into a most wasteful, unnecessary, and useless expenditure.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: What I understand this Bill to effect is a fresh reparation of debts created under the Main Drainage Act. There is no allegation, I believe, that these debts were not properly partitioned according to the provisions of the Act; but the Metropolitan Board of Works think that a different distribution would be more equitable, looking to the results of the drainage. They accordingly came here with a Bill last Session, substantially identical with the one which has now been read a second time, calling for a new distribution of these charges. Well, the Bill was referred to a Select Committee, of which my right hon. Friend who is now Secretary to the Treasury was chairman. I believe that Committee was very well constituted, and they went most fully into the whole matter, hearing counsel, and sitting seventeen days, at a great expense of attention to the Committee and of money to the parties. The Committee struck out the clauses which now constitute No. 2 Bill, and the Bill came back to this House without those clauses. The Bill, however, did not pass this House last Session, in consequence principally of the want of time. The hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Tite), now the organ of the Metropolitan Board, has introduced these two Bills this Session—one the Bill that came out of the Committee last Session; the other consisting of the clauses struck out by that Committee. Now, I certainly do not think my hon. Friend open to any charge of slyness in respect to that procedure.

MR. AYRTON: I did not mean the hon. Member for Bath, but the Metropolitan Board of Works.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: In respect of that procedure I must say I do not see anything unfair or unreasonable in putting this matter into two Bills. But what my hon. Friend proposes is to read this Bill a second time on the 16th of July, and to refer it to a Select Committee, to be named by the Committee of Selection, who should hear counsel reargue the case. The House, however, is not in a position to form any opinion on the merits of this question and the distribution of these burdens. We are called on to reconsider the decision of the Select Committee last year without any ground being shown why that decision was an improper one. Under these circumstances I think it will be desirable that this Bill should not be proceeded with, and I would strongly advise my hon. Friend, who, I repeat, is not open to any charge of slyness, to withdraw the Bill.

MR. BRISTOW said, that the Bill of last year contained about 200 clauses, and, so far from the present measure having been considered for seventeen days, it had not been considered for more than sixty minutes, and besides, as the Metropolitan Board of Works were the promoters of the Bill, the parishes were not heard before the Committee of last Session. It was on that account that the Metropolitan Board of Works came forward now and asked that the parishes might be heard at their own expense before a Select Committee.

MR. LAYARD said, he did not wish to insinuate any charge of slowness or anything else against the hon. Member for Bath, but he thought it hard upon his own constituents that they should a second time be put to all the trouble and expense of a contest before a Select Committee merely because the people of Camberwell and Wandsworth had been too negligent to come forward to state their case at the proper opportunity. He, therefore, begged to move that the Bill be read the second time that day six months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he rose to second the Amendment. The measure was brought in as far back as the 22nd of February, and he could not understand why its progress had been so slow. If he had had charge of it he would have had it passed months ago, even if he had only had Wednesdays for the purpose. It was a little too much, now that they had reached the dog-days, and were within a fortnight, or, at the most, three weeks of the prorogation, to ask them to refer the measure to a Select Committee, in order that Camberwell and Wandsworth might have an opportunity of pouring out all their griefs. He knew something of what it was to hear the complaints of those two parishes, and believed that a whole Session would hardly be enough to satisfy them. The people of the Metropolis must be greatly obliged to the hon. Member for Bath and the hon. Member for Kidderminster for volunteering to conduct their affairs, for it was by those Gentlemen that these two Bills were introduced, and he certainly could not compliment them on the manner in which they had performed their task. On behalf of the Metropolitan Members he repudiated all blame for the present unsatisfactory state of this question.

MR. TITE said, that the absence from the Bill of last year of a clause for relieving Camberwell and Wandsworth from other parishes led to so much opposition and delay that he was obliged to withdraw the Bill. He was still in the unhappy dilemma of being between these fighting parishes. He denied that it was owing to any laches of his that the Bill had progressed through the House so slowly. The Coal Duties Bill, though brought in by the Government itself, had not been advanced at a much more rapid rate. Neither he nor his hon. Friend (Mr. Bristow) had obtruded their services upon the inhabitants of the Metropolis, but they had been freely chosen by popular election in their respective districts to represent Chelsea and Greenwich at a Metropolitan Board. As, however, the opinion of the House seemed adverse to proceeding with the measure he would not persevere with it further.

Amendment and Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(1.) £12,134, National Gallery.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, it would be in the recollection of the few Members present on the occasion when a similar Vote was brought forward towards the close of last Session, that he had called attention to the repeated assurances given by various Committees, as well as by a Royal Commission, that the time had arrived when the Royal Academy ought to vacate the national building in Trafalgar Square. The noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown did him the honour of replying to the observations which he then made, and sketched out the different removals which the public requirements had compelled the Royal Academy to make already; he admitted that the time had arrived when the national collection had grown to such an extent that it could not longer continue to occupy the building jointly; but the difficulty was to provide the Royal Academy with suitable lodgings at the least possible expense to the country. At the same time he proceeded to ask the House to vote a sum of £17,000, with the simple object of making the Royal Academy more comfortable in its temporary quarters. What had been done could not be undone, but he felt that he was warranted in the objections which he took at the time to the proposed expenditure, and the objects for which that outlay was to be made. From the steps which had been erected—they did not deserve the name of a staircase—a room was entered which he would not criticise, because he believed his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Works was not prepared to defend it; but those who favoured Mr. Pennethorne's plan contended that for the money spent two rooms had been added—one, the new room, as it was called—in the National Gallery, and the other the sculpture room in the Royal Academy. The new room, as far as it went, was a very good room, except that it was too narrow for its length, and that the entrance was also narrow and obscure; but, in addition to the fact of its being built across the entrance-hall, which was absolutely necessary as an accessory to the original plan of a portico, there was no possibility of egress from it into the Royal Academy. The only channel, a tiny passage which existed during the alterations, had been shut up, and it would require a large expenditure of public money to open a proper communication. A plan had been submitted by Captain Fowke, embracing a suite of rooms which, when the time arrived for turning out the Royal Academy, would not have required one shilling outlay. The noble Lord the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer were at first favourable to that design, though they abandoned it afterwards on pecuniary grounds; but he was assured by those competent to form an opinion on the subject that the additional expenses which would be required to establish a communication between the existing National Gallery and the other part of the building would more than exceed the original estimate proposed by Captain Fowke. In order to obtain a proper conception of the room in which the sculpture was exhibited, hon. Members must imagine themselves in the street facing the building. They had first to mount a flight of steps, by which they arrived at the basement or floor, and that had been no sooner reached than they were invited to descend again—imitating very closely the action of the squirrel in his cage. It was but recently that sculpture had been placed in groups, the original intention being that it should occupy particular niches; considerable differences of opinion consequently existed with regard to the most advantageous mode of displaying works of that description, but he ventured to affirm that in no other country in Europe was there a sculpture gallery where the first view obtained of the sculpture was from above, the figures standing between the spectator and the light, with their backs towards him. He should not have felt it necessary to direct attention to the subject were it not that a rumour had reached him, which the proceedings in "another place" tended very much to corroborate, that before, or probably after, the close of the Session, an additional outlay would be sanctioned by the Government in connection with the building, with the object of fulfilling the provisions of the Turner will, which, if not complied with in a period of ten years expiring next November, were to become null and void. Several of the clauses in the will in favour of the relatives of Mr. Turner had been set aside, and he would ask whether the only clause to be rigidly insisted on was that binding the State to incur a heavy outlay in placing his pictures "in a room or rooms in the National Gallery?" He ventured to think it would be found almost impossible to carry out all the testamentary intentions of that gentleman. Our collection of the works of old masters included about 300 pictures. Mr. Turner left to the nation 324 works, of which 104 were very large pictures. There were a great number of drawings, of which some were so prurient that they could not be exhibited, and others were so unfinished that their exhibition would rather detract from than add to the fame of Mr. Turner. He should himself be glad to see a selection made from these works according to the plan which was adopted in similar cases in France. He saw that last night the Lord President moved in "another place," for the appointment of a Select Committee to consider what could be done with the Turner and Vernon collections and similar bequests; but so many Commissions and Committees had reported upon the National Gallery, without any attention being paid to their reports, that he could not think that that Committee had been appointed with a view to the direct guidance of Her Majesty's Government upon the subject. An Act of Parliament which was passed in the year 1854 or 1855 authorized the Government to dispose of works of art left to the nation, and, in fact, to set aside the terms of bequest; and, therefore, he did not see why a Committee of the House of Lords was required to settle the question. The reason why the trustees of the National Gallery could not deal with it was, that although learned, able, liberal and enlightened men, they were perfectly irresponsible, and, therefore, did not possess the confidence of the public. That was a matter which must be considered ere long, and in his opinion the National Gallery must be placed, like other public property, under the management of some one who would be responsible to Parliament, and have a seat either in one House or the other. He should be told that all that was very well, but should be asked, "What are you to do with the Turners?" They must either remove from the National Gallery pictures of second-rate character and doubtful authenticity, and replace them by Turner's, or they must devote to the reception of the Turner collection two rooms of the National Gallery, to the exclusion of the Royal Academy. Last year, when he made some remarks with reference to the National Gallery, he received a number of anonymous letters, complaining that he had charged the Royal Academicians with every offence under the sun. One letter, which was written in a very facetious style, alluded to some of his ancestors, and was signed—he hoped it was a forgery—"R.A." No one could appreciate more than he did the immense services which the Royal Academy had rendered to art in this country, and he should be the last person to speak slightly of a body which included such men as Landseer, Eastlake, Fildes, and other great artists. All he desired was that the Royal Academy should be removed to Burlington House, which was purchased for the nation about the year 1854, at an expense of £5,000 a year, and which was now occupied by the London University and the Royal Society, who last winter refused to allow the Fine Arts Club to use their rooms once or twice a year. That removal could be effected without much cost to the nation, because last year the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Works, who, like himself, not expecting this Vote to come on, was not then in his place, stated that the Royal Academy was quite willing to erect a gallery on the site of Burlington House at their own cost. He implored the Government to give an assurance that, no matter what might be the Report of the Committee of the other House, they would ask for no Vote this Session, nor would they during the recess authorize the spending of a shilling, or the laying of a brick for the erection of a building for the Vernon and Turner Galleries. The reason he asked for this assurance was that Lord St. Leonard's had made no secret that his desire was that a gallery should be erected for the Turner pictures in direct communication with the National Gallery, and that a grant should be made for its erection. He asked the Committee to consider what the amount of the Vote would be for the erection of a new building. The mere alteration of certain rooms last year cost £17,000, and common sense told them that to acquire the site of St. Martin's Workhouse, and to erect an entirely new gallery from the foundation upwards, could not cost less than from £80,000 to £100,000. He knew from his experience in the House that whenever a Vote more monstrous than usual was required, it was the practice for the Minister in charge of it to inform the House that so much money had already been spent, that the public faith was pledged, and that, therefore, the House must agree to the completion of the work and grant the Vote. It was to prevent that that he now sought an assurance from the Government that they would not proceed further in the matter without the sanction of the House.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the noble Lord took a great interest in this subject last year, and was one of the advocates of Captain Fowkes' plan for the alteration of the present building. That was a very good plan, and, had it been carried out, a very handsome building would have been constructed at a considerable expense. The plan we adopted was one of a much more limited character, and effected a great improvement in the interior, without incurring a heavy outlay in altering the elevation of the front. Many people may think that a more handsome building might have been erected on the spot where the National Gallery stands, which is certainly a very commanding position, where a fine piece of architecture on a much larger scale would have been very effective. The gallery is there, however, and the question is whether it is sufficiently commodious for the purpose for which it was intended, or whether it will be necessary to pull it down and erect another at a large expense? My opinion is that we had better take advantage of what we have. The alterations which have been made, though they have not met the approval of the noble Lord, are reckoned great improvements by the public. In the first place, we have added to the accommodation of the gallery a large and convenient room, in which the pictures may be seen exceedingly well. This increase in space has enabled the pictures to be properly classified, according to the different schools and periods, so that the collection is now instructive as well as pleasing to the eye of the connoisseur. The noble Lord apprehends that if the Royal Academy were removed from this building a very large expense would be necessary to effect a communication between that portion of the building which is devoted to the National Gallery and that which is occupied by the Academy. The noble Lord is quite mistaken in that respect. There is a door-way communicating between the two parts of the building, which could be thrown open at a very small expense. Then, as to the sculpture-room, I do not mean that it is a place which would have been built intentionally for that purpose. But it is, at least, vastly superior to the little black hole in which the statuary used to be displayed. These changes have been effected at a very moderate expense—not much more, I think, than £15,000, and in a very short time. No doubt it is intended that the Royal Academy shall go elsewhere, and when that takes place a very great addition will be made to the space applicable to the national collection. The noble Lord has talked of “other arrangements;” but even supposing that the Royal Academy gone, and the rooms which they now occupy added to the space available for the public pictures, yet there is reason to expect that in the course of time even that will not be sufficient. As the collection now stands, the Turner pictures, if they were brought in, would nearly, if not entirely, fill the space occupied by the Academy. The question would then arise, how can the accommodation be extended. Plans have been proposed by which the present building might be enlarged at a comparatively small expense. That is a matter for future consideration, but, of course, the noble Lord may rest assured that no such operation will be commenced without the previous sanction of the House. Burlington House has been suggested as a site on which the Royal Academy may construct their building, and I am inclined to think that it would be a very good situation. The question is whether the front should be towards Piccadilly or in another direction. Accommodation may be provided there amply sufficient not only for the Royal Academy, but also for those scientific bodies which, although the noble Lord spoke of them rather slightly, are entitled to the protection and encouragement of the Government. Highly proper and expedient as it may be to give assistance to art, yet I trust that science will always be deemed worthy of public support in this country. It is obvious that while societies of artists may raise money for the exhibition of their pictures, scientific bodies cannot procure funds by the same means, and are often unable to provide the means of carrying on their meetings and investigations, unless the public assist them by providing some place of meeting. I am sure that the House will share that feeling; and that if the site of Burlington House should be held applicable for the Royal Academy ample room will be given both to art and science.

Mr. LAYARD said, it must be owned that the English were the most curious people in the world in dealing with their national art collections, for they were always admitting that their present arrangement was wrong, and inquiring how it might be set right, and yet nothing whatever was done. Last year £15,000 had been voted for the improvement of the National Gallery, but the only alteration made, as far as he could see, was the addition of an extra room, of which all he could say was that it might form a very handsome hall for a railway station. It was plain and unornamental, and almost every third-rate town in Italy had a much finer one for the exhibition of works of art. It was a great pity that so much valuable space should have been wasted by the construction of a couple of staircases, one leading to the Royal Academy and the other to the collection of old pictures, when one would be quite sufficient as soon as the Royal Academy is removed. At the present moment the National Gallery was already too crowded, and many of the pictures by the old masters were hung too high. They had abundant materials for a splendid national collection of pictures in this country, and proper provision should be made for its accommodation. At Hampton Court last year pictures of great value were going to ruin. He found some of them absolutely falling off the canvass. He understood that this year the restorers had been let loose there, so that he supposed there was some alteration; but there were pictures at Hampton Court which ought to be sent to the National Gallery. The really valuable part of the collection of pictures did not form the attraction at Hampton Court. From personal observation he was able to say that that was the case with the cartoons, which, in his opinion, ought to be removed to the National Gallery as most important objects of study for our young artists. Then, as to Dulwich, there were many pictures of the Flemish school there which were wanted in the National Gallery. There were pictures in the National Gallery which he should like to see sent to Dulwich, and pictures at Dulwich which he should like to see sent to the National Gallery. They had no classification of schools and epoch in the present arrangement of the old pictures in Trafalgar Square. No man in the country had a greater knowledge of art, or had greater taste and judgment, than Sir Charles Eastlake; but, unfortunately, there was the trustee system, and as long as they had it they would not have a good gallery in the country. If there was proper space the national collection would be very much increased by bequests. They did not want any great additional expense. What they wanted was judgment. He hoped that there would be no more patching, but that some definite plan would be acted on to increase the National Gallery, and render it worthy of the country. The Committee were aware that many plans for affording additional room had been from time to time put forward. He had suggested one which had received the approbation of his hon. Friend the late Sir Charles Barry, and which he believed to be the best. It was to raise on the British Museum another story. His opinion was that by the adoption of that plan they might have the finest series of galleries in the world—exceeding in extent those of the Louvre and the Vatican. At all events, he trusted that some plan would be adopted which would put an end to the system of having the national collection scattered about the Metropolis.

COLONEL SYKES remarked, that he was agreeably surprised by, and decidedly satisfied with, the alteration effected during the last twelve months in the National Gallery.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH observed, that he thought the nation had not got a quid pro quo. The accommodation afforded for the exhibition of the national collection of pictures was not value for the money expended in providing it. If another story were added to the British Museum it would be best applied to affording additional room for the rapidly increasing collection of books; but it had been, on very strong grounds, suggested to add another story to the National Gallery for the purpose of affording additional space for pictures. The soot of London did not ascend above a certain height, and, therefore, if the National Gallery had a higher elevation, the pictures would be taken out of a very deleterious atmosphere. It was monstrous to provide accommodation for the Royal Academy when they wanted it only for three months in the year. That year's exhibition would now soon be over, and, as they had to find an asylum for the Turner pictures before next November, he hoped they would be deposited in those rooms. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to ask for any grant that Session towards alterations in the National Gallery?

MR. W. EWART said, that the sooner the Royal Academy had their own rooms the better. They would then enter into free competition with other societies, and would, he believed, on that principle, effect greater good to the Arts than at present. The original design of the National Gallery contemplated extension in the rear, and there was space enough in that direction to form one of the finest galleries in the world.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, the Committee must be very much obliged to his noble Friend for having brought forward this question. He agreed very much in what had fallen from the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. Augustus Smith), and they must all concur in the observation of the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard), that the National Gallery was either now or would soon be required for the purposes of the national collections alone. The Committee had for some years fully agreed that the Royal Academy must go elsewhere, and he should like to know from the Government what chance there was of that event taking place. Three or four years ago negotiations were entered into for a transfer of the Academy to Burlington House. The negotiations were then in a very satisfactory state. No opposition was raised by the Royal Academy. They were ready to erect buildings if a site was given for the purpose. Other societies who had claims on the consideration of the Government were also to be accommodated. He was the last person to say that the £15,000 had not been well expended; but beyond that improvement nothing had been done with a view to removing the Royal Academy, or applying the site of Burlington House to the object for which it was purchased. As it was admitted that the accommodation obtained by the expenditure of the £15,000 was not sufficient, it was important for the House of Commons to know whether the negotiations previously commenced with the Royal Academy were still in progress, or whether they had entirely ceased, and there was no probability, after all, of the Royal Academy being transferred from Trafalgar Square to Burlington House? If the noble Lord at the head of the Government could give an assurance that the negotiations were in progress, and that some definite scheme was on foot for applying the space acquired at Burlington House to those objects, for which a large sum of money had been expended in its purchase, it would give satisfaction not only to those hon. Members who took an interest in all questions affecting the progress of science and art, but to all classes of the community.

MR. TITE said, he had seen the sketch of Mr. Pennethorne, and the improvement already effected was part of a complete plan, which, when carried out, would give the nation a gallery neither disgraceful to them nor discreditable to the architect. He thought that the £15,000 had been well spent, and that great additional accommodation had been obtained by that means. One advantage of the discussions on the subject was that all were now agreed that Trafalgar Square was the proper site for the National Gallery. He remembered sitting on a Committee to inquire into the subject, and he rather thought that their Report was in favour of removing the pictures; but the common sense of the community had prevailed, and it was now admitted on all hands that the interests of science and art would be best consulted by the national pictures being collected on that one spot. He hoped that the Turner Gallery would form part of the national collection, and that there would be a gallery representing the English School. If a site were given to the Royal Academy at Burlington House nothing would be easier in an architectural point of view than to erect a building which would be a credit to the nation.

MR. DILLWYN said, he hoped that if a Committee were to be appointed next year it would be composed of hon. Gentlemen who had some special knowledge of art, and who were independent of the Government.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he must press for an assurance that no further demand for money for building purposes would be made that Session. In the remarks which he had made he had not had the slightest intention of saying anything in detraction of the usefulness of the scientific bodies. The noble Lord had misunderstood him on that point.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to ask why the £8,670 remaining from last year's grant for the National Gallery was not deducted from the amount of the present Vote?

MR. LAYARD said, he hoped that the trustees of the National Gallery would not be called upon to expend all the money voted in any particular year within the twelve months, which would sometimes lead to the purchase of common instead of really valuable pictures.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was not aware that there was any intention to propose an additional grant.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, he would remind the noble Lord that he had asked what was the state of the negotiations between the Government and the Royal Academy with reference to the transfer of the latter to Burlington House?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was not aware of the exact state of the negotiations, but the Royal Academy was prepared to go to Burlington House when they were summoned to do so; but some alterations in the building would be required, and he believed the plans had not yet been prepared.

MR. PEEL said, that, in reply to the question of the hon. Member for Lambeth, he had to observe that the balance in hand for the purchase of pictures was only £3,000, and as had been remarked by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Layard), it would be very unwise to compel the trustees of the National Gallery to expend the whole of the Vote for pictures in each year.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £2,000, British Historical Portrait Gallery.

MR. SPOONER said, he had always opposed this Vote and he should continue to do so. He would ask for an explanation of the object for which the gallery was formed. It could not be to promote art, for the trustees set out with the declaration that they did not care how bad the picture was so long as it was a portrait of somebody notorious in our history. Neither could it be to show respect to the memory of the persons who were exhibited, for the trustees did not care what the moral character of those persons was so long as they fulfilled the same condition. There would soon be a demand for a building in which to keep these portraits. He thought the House was already expending too much money in the promotion of arts and sciences. He would move that the grant be not allowed.

MR. SLANEY said, he entirely differed from the hon. Member, as he thought the grant one that would be sanctioned by the great body of the working classes. He regretted the collection was placed in so obscure a building, but when it was opened to the public, and it was known for the purpose of collecting the portraits of personages whose names were illustrious in the history of the country, he felt sure that none of our more public collections would be more popular. [MR. SPOONER: Why, Nell Gwynne is one of the portraits!] He must certainly admit that some of those whose portraits might find a place in it were not of that high moral character that might be wished. However, he fully believed that the more the public were familiarized with works of art the better it would be for the public taste and the public happiness.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTHE said, he would recommend the Government to put a stop to the purchase of portraits until they had a proper building to put them in. If the last Government had continued in office the Royal Academy would be by that time in their own palace without the expenditure of a shilling on the part of the public. That negotiation had, however, been put a stop to—no one knew why, although it was clear the space was wanted for the National Gallery. He was ashamed that there was no suitable building belonging to the country in which so interesting a collection as the national portraits could be placed.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he thought that that infant collection had made fair progress during the short time that it existed. The Royal Academy understood that it would be their duty to vacate the National Gallery whenever the public convenience required it, when the House had made up its mind as to the disposal of Burlington House, and when the National Gallery had been enlarged on an adequate scale to allow of future extension. The occupation of the first portion of the site of Burlington House by the Royal Academy would, however, dispose of the whole question of the employment of that side. This was a question which ought not to be compromised until it had been considered as a whole.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, that no answer had yet been given to the simple question—what were the Government about to do with respect to moving the Royal Academy from Trafalgar Square? The right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, said the Royal Academy would vacate the National Gallery whenever public convenience required it. But the public convenience had required them to go for some years; and, as the public convenience required them to go, and the Royal Academy were ready to go, he wanted to know why they had not gone? The Committee ought to be told whether there was any real intention to propose any plans which would have the effect of accomplishing the transference of the Royal Academy from Trafalgar Square.

MR. LAYARD said, he did not believe the public grudged the expenditure, but they had a right to know what was done with the money, and why the pictures were kept in a private house, where they were virtually inaccessible to people at large. Why was not the collection added to the National Gallery or placed in some of the buildings at Kensington?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he would remind the Committee that there were many bare walls in the lobbies and corridors of the Houses of Parliament where these pictures might be hung. If the lady whose portrait had been alluded to was not thought a proper character to hang in the corridors she might be put in the tea-room. He did not grudge the £2,000 for the gallery, but he grudged the separate establishment, and he should oppose any banishment to Kensington.

MR. SPOONER said, that as he appeared to be alone in his view of the question, he should not trouble the Committee to divide, but would content himself with protesting against the public money being wasted on such tomfoolery. It was all very well to say that the people would not grudge the money. Perhaps those living on the spot would not. But the Committee ought to think of the people from the Land's-end to John O'Groats, who had not a chance of seeing these pictures, or of benefiting from the expenditure. The Portrait Gallery neither served for the promotion of art nor for the cultivation of a healthy moral feeling, for the Commissioners said they did not care how bad was the quality of the picture or the character of the person depicted.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he believed that, if proper arrangements were made—that was, if the Royal Academy was removed from the building in Trafalgar Square, and a portion of the building appropriated to the collection—all the necessary accommodation might be afforded there. In any case, he hoped Parliament would not allow the collection to be removed to Kensington. The pictures of the nation ought to be placed in Trafalgar Square; but at present they were scattered all over the town.

MR. KER said, that a more miserable set of portraits could not be produced than those in Great George Street. They were totally unworthy of the collection.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £3,000, Purchases from Soltykoff Collection.

MR. DILLWYN said, it was unsatisfactory that these purchases should take place while no one knew where they were to be put. He complained of the arrangement which they seemed to be getting into of scattering these collections all over the town.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he agreed that the arrangement was objectionable, but it was one which they were not getting into but getting out of. At present, objects of mediæval art were divided between the British Museum and Kensington. It was possible that those two establishments might authorise rival bidders to compete at auctions, but when the question of the Soltykoff collection was brought before the Treasury they declined then to enter into the question whether any purchases which might be made should go to the British Museum or the Treasury, but determined to treat the purchases as made by the nation. In his opinion, it was unreasonable to maintain a mediæval department at the British Museum, and he thought the Kensington collection ought to be the single collection of objects of this kind.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he hoped that the truth of the proverb ce n'est que le premier pas qui coûte was not about to be exemplified, and that the course suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would not lead to the breaking up of the British Museum.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he could bear testimony to the sterling merits of the various articles purchased from the Soltykoff collection, and to the marvelously cheap rate at which they were obtained by the Government.

Vote agreed to, as were also

(4.) £6,620, Magnetic Observations Abroad.

(5.) £500, Royal Geographical Society.

(6.) £1,000, Royal Society.

MR. W. WILLIAMS, at twelve o'clock, moved that the Chairman report Progress.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he understood that the right hon. Member opposite intended to discuss the Colonial Votes, which would be next taken.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he was perfectly ready to proceed.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress, and ask leave to sit again," put, and negatived.

The following Vote was then agreed to.

(7.) £4,300, Bermudas (Civil Establishment).

(8.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £6,278, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge of the Ecclesiastical Establishment of the British North American Provinces, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. WHITE said, he must object to the item of £2,990 for the ecclesiastical establishments of Canada, as the prosperity of that colony had passed into a proverb. Her revenue was upwards of £2,000,000 a year, and she was, therefore, rich enough to pay for her own ecclesiastical institutions. He did not like the Vote for Nova Scotia, but he would admit that Nova Scotia was a poorer colony. However, he should move to reduce the Vote by £2,990, the amount asked for Canada.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he had intended to call attention to the amount of the colonial expenditure on going into Committee of Supply, but under the circumstances he would not detain the House many minutes while he rapidly glanced at the mischief involved in the Estimates before them. He considered that expenditure of the taxes of one country in the administration of another was as unprecedented in the history of the world, as it was mischievous to the best interests of the colonies themselves. He did not complain so much of the burden laid upon the British taxpayers, who were perfectly able to bear much more if just cause were shown; but he objected to the principle of the existing system—the colonies became suckers rather than off-shoots, and diminished the aggregate power of this country by a process of subtraction from instead of multiplication of its internal resources. The largest portion of the English expenditure for the colonies was the military expenditure, but he had no opportunity of bringing that matter before the House in the present Session, because the Army Estimates were passed before the Select Committee on the subject had reported. He would, however, call attention to the Report of that Committee, which contained many remarkable suggestions, and which was the more remarkable, as it showed, what, from his experience of the House, he was led to believe was a rare circumstance, an instance of hon. Members coming out of Committee with different opinions from those with which they went in. Nothing he believed had operated more to bring about this result than the evidence of prosperous colonies having troops and pay from England, for local purposes of their own, or even merely to support a Governor independently of his local legislation in some special policy over which we had no control. The amount voted for the civil expenditure in colonies was less than for their military expenditure, but it was by no means unimportant, and though the amount included in the present Estimate could not be reduced by more than £100,000 a year, yet as long as one shilling of it remained it was like poison to the empire both at home and abroad, and ought to be eradicated as quickly as possible. He had pressed that consideration on the attention of the House before, and likewise on the particular notice of the hon. Member for Birmingham, and he was surprised to find that that hon. Member had, at a public meeting during the last recess, endeavoured to reconcile his habitual absence from Committees of Supply with his diatribes against a wasteful public expenditure by saying that the Committees only attempted to economize in thousands, whereas he wished to deal with millions. He (Mr. Adderley) must, however, submit that such a plea was as absurd as it was unstatesmanlike. He should like to know, too, what was the use of the Chancellor of the Exchequer coming down to the House, Session after Session, and complaining of the extravagance of the public expenditure, if he took no practical steps to check its amount in such an instance as this? It seemed to him that the right hon. Gentleman was in the position of a man throwing gold into the sea while bemoaning his poverty. He would support the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman opposite on the Vote for the clergy of North America. What reason on earth had they to provide the salaries for the Bishop and Archdeacons of the colonies? He knew it would be said that there was an honourable understanding that the salaries of these clergymen should be paid; but he would remind the Committee that these salaries were originally paid out of lands which were now given up to the colony, and it ought to have been provided at the time of the transfer that these salaries should be paid. He was reminded of what happened to a right rev. friend of his own—the Bishop of New Zealand. The right hon. Member for Droitwich (Sir John Pakington) was accustomed year after year to bring forward the case of Bishop Selwyn's salary, and this House's refusal to pay it, as a positive breach of faith; but that right rev. Prelate had over and over again assured him that he did not wish the point to be urged; that he would rather be without payment from the Parliament of Great Britain, and derive his income from the bishopric itself. For his own part he thought Bishop Selwyn was right; and that those payments were as injurious to the Church as the military expenditure was to the colonies. Was ever a Church on earth so supported? There were instances of Churches flourishing on local endowments, and there were instances of Churches flourishing on the voluntary principle; but when was it ever heard before that a Church in one country throve on the finances of another? They were accustomed the Church to lean on support that would one day fail them, while they were drying up the real sources of her strength. He did not expect to remove the Vote at once; he knew that was impossible, for the money was pledged; but he gave notice that, if no other hon. Member took up the subject, he would early next Session call attention to the matter, and he hoped the House would then determine to put a complete stop to this expenditure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the item of £2,900, on account of Ecclesiastical Commissioner's Establishments in Canada, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he thought he should be consulting the wishes of the Committee by not entering at that moment into the question of the military expenditure connected with the colonies. He might observe, however, that the result of the Committee alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman had been to prove that the expenditure, amounting to £4,000,000 and upwards, which it was stated was the expenditure on account of the colonies, had been enormously exaggerated, and that a very great portion of the expenditure was not on account of the colonies properly so called, but on account of the naval and military stations which the country had to maintain for its own imperial purposes. It was impossible to apply to the military system of the colonies any self-acting and unbending rule. The Vote in question was an expiring Vote, inherited from former years, and was the execution of a pledge on the part of the Crown. That pledge, however, did not go beyond the lives of the persons to whom it was made, and he could assure the right hon. Gentleman that there was no idea on the part of the Government of assisting systematically Canada, or any other colony in the maintenance of her clergy.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, that while entirely concurring with his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Adderley) in the opinion that the colonies ought as a general rule to pay themselves the salaries of their public officers, he thought it was undesirable he should seize the opportunity presented by the present Vote to express opinions which wore the appearance of casting a doubt on the liability of this country to perform the pledges which were entered into with respect to it.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that the purpose for which he rose was to call attention to the distinction between imperial and colonial purposes. His right hon. Friend talked of taking off £100,000; but he (Mr. Hope) did not know where it was to come from. Bermuda was a naval station, and British Columbia could hardly yet be left to its own resources. There then remained the West Indies, where the only person responsible to the country was the Governor; and he was of opinion that that official should not be left dependent for his income on the colony. As to the colonies on the coast of Africa they were maintained for the suppression of the slave trade. British Caffraria was perhaps a more questionable item; but on the whole he did not see how any portion of the Vote could be got rid of.

MR. WHITE said, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(9.) £1,600, Indian Department (Canada).

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought it ridiculous that, year after year, we should be called on to Vote blankets for the Indians.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Vote was much smaller than it had been, and would probably cease in the course of a few years.

Vote agreed to.

(10.) £8,600, to complete the sum for British Columbia.

MR. ADDERLEY said, he took objection to that Vote. In particular he objected to the charge for the Royal Engineers. They had been sent to survey the land, and land surveys should be paid for by the colony. If they were intended for defence the number was ridiculous. He hoped that in a few months they should hear of British Columbia meeting its own civil expenditure. He also thought that some explanation ought to be given of the item of £2,000 for contingencies. He did not see why this country ought to be called upon to contribute to the civil expenditure of British Columbia.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, he agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that this country ought not to be required to contribute to the civil expenditure of its colonies; but it should be borne in mind that the colony was as yet only an infant colony. The greater part of the Vote was for the additional pay to the Royal Engineers, owing to the high price of provisions there. The Vote would not be of a permanent, but purely of a temporary character.

MR. WHITE said, he should oppose the Vote, on the ground that when the colony of British Columbia was established, the right hon. Member for Hertfordshire promised distinctly that it was to be a self-supporting colony. With a proper title any money that was necessary could be got from capitalists in the city.

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE explained that if the cost of the Royal Engineers were left out of the question British Columbia did at the present moment bear its own expenditure.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following Votes :—

(11.) £14,728, Governors, &c., West Indies and other Colonies.

(12.) £5,706, Stipendiary Justices (West India Colonies and Mauritius).

(13.) £9,630, to complete the sum for Civil Establishments (Western Coast of Africa).

(14.) £5,954, Saint Helena.

(15.) £700, Orange River Territory.

(16.) £15,000, British Kaffraria.

(17.) £960, Heligoland.

(18.) £2,986, to complete the sum for the Falkland Islands.

(19.) £2,914, to complete the sum for Labuan.

(21.) £700, to complete the sum for the Fiji Islands Inquiry.

(22.) £10,090, Emigration Board.

MINES TRESPASSES PREVENTION BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. H. B. SHERIDAN said, that there were at present very general and well-founded complaints of the state of the law in respect to trespasses and dilapidations by mining operations. There was very little remedy for mine-owners or others suffering from proceedings of this character. The trespasses were most commonly committed by persons who made secret encroachments on the mines of others, and the dilapidation was frequently caused to public buildings as well as private houses on the surface of mining districts. Parties who felt themselves aggrieved in this way had now to seek redress either by means of an application to Chancery or by action for trespass; but the great defect in the law was that before the action for trespass could be taken the wrong must have been done—the injury must have been inflicted. By the Bill before the House he proposed to enable parties to apply to the local magistrates or to the County Court in districts in which the local magistrates were part owners of the mines; but, if the House read the Bill a second time, he would, in Committee, propose to strike out the words which would provide that form of procedure, and move the insertion of others which would make the application one to a Judge in chambers. At present when an inspection was desired full notice had to be given of the application. The consequence was that the trespasser long before the order was obtained was able to obliterate all marks of his interference by bricking up the space which had been opened in the separating wall, and breaking up the galleries, and thus destroy the evidence against him. When it was remembered how prisoners were sometimes able to break through the walls of their cells without discovery, it might be imagined how difficult it would be to detect wrong doings in a place under ground and in pitchy darkness. In one case, where thousands of tons of coals had been stolen in the course of nine or ten months, and proceedings were subsequently taken, although the workmen had been constantly warned that they were trespassing, yet the jury found the master by whose orders they had acted “guilty of stealing coals, but not of knowing it.” The Judge, of course, could not receive this verdict, and the man was acquitted. It also often happened that when a mine approached a town, and it was found it could no longer be worked with safety in consequence of houses or a church in the neighbourhood, the mine was let to a man of straw, so that the whole of the profit of the working went to the owner, the man who leased it having little more than his mere wages. The consequence was, when it was ascertained that the injury was inflicted, there was nobody from whom to obtain redress. The remedy by which he proposed to meet that state of things was that where the owner of property suspected even that damage had been done, he should be enabled to apply to a Judge at chambers upon an affidavit, stating his grounds of suspicion, for leave to inspect the workings. He should have no objection to the local Government inspector being the person charged with such inspection. The Town Council of Wigan had adopted a petition in favour of the principle of the Bill, and he (Mr. Sheridan) had a copy of a letter written by a coal owner and magistrate of Durham to the Home Secretary, calling his attention to the subject, and expressing himself in favour of the measure before the House. He simply proposed by the Bill to simplify the present system of obtaining the inspection of mines, and he trusted, therefore, the House would read the Bill a second time.

MR. COBBETT seconded the Motion.

Motion made, Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. PAULL said, that as it was his intention to vote against the second reading, he wished to explain the circumstances under which his name appeared on the back of the Bill. He was applied to by the hon. Gentleman to allow his name to be placed on the back of the Bill, the object of which, he said, was to facilitate the inquiry as to trespass on the grounds under mines. He (Mr. Paull) objected, on the ground that he had had nothing to do with its preparation, nor had he had even an opportunity of reading its provisions; but being assured by the hon. Member that the Bill had been discussed amongst parties interested in mines, and that he had spoken to two or three Gentlemen on the subject of allowing their names to be placed on the back of the Bill, he (Mr. Paull) unadvisedly consented. He had, however, since taken an opportunity of intimating to the hon. Gentleman that he did not, on an inspection of the Bill, approve of its provisions. He had also found that in the opinion of the parties likely to be effected by the Bill in the county of Cornwall, that it was not a desirable measure to be passed, and, therefore, he could not give his support to it. He trusted the hon. Gentleman and the House would be satisfied with that explanation of his reasons for taking the unusual course of voting against a Bill to which his name was attached.

MR. CLIVE said, he trusted the hon. Member would withdraw the Bill, first, because at that period of the Session, and in the present state of the House, there was no probability that it would be carried, so that it would only waste time which might be spent on other business; and, secondly, because it contained provisions so arbitrary that they would require more modification than could well be made in Committee. The Bill left no discretion with the Judge. Upon mere suspicion and before any damage was done, a party might go before a Judge and obtain an under-ground search warrant. The law at present was that in all cases damage must first be shown to have been done. If the Bill should pass at all it could only pass on the ground of some great public interest being affected. For those reasons, then, he repeated he would counsel his hon. Friend to withdraw the Bill.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATHS RELIEF BILL.

COMMITTEE. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [12th June].

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," and which Amendment was, to leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,'"

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed.

MR. DENMAN said, he could not but express his surprise and regret at the opposition of some hon. Members on that side of the House. That opposition was neither consistent with Liberal opinions nor was it calculated to advance the Liberal character of the House, and he could only account for it by supposing that through pressure of business those hon. Members had been unable to study the subject. The objects of the Bill had been somewhat misrepresented. Originally no person, of whatever sect, was absolved from the necessity of taking oaths. Afterwards the Quakers, Moravians, and Separatists were excused from taking oaths, and by a subsequent Act the exemption was extended to those who had formerly belonged to either of those sects, and who, though they had left those bodies, yet retained the scruple. In 1853 the Common Law Commission recommended that persons holding conscientious religious objections to the taking of an oath should be allowed to make an affirmation, if the Judge was satisfied of the sincerity of the objection. In 1854 a clause was introduced into the Common Law Procedure Act to carry out the suggestion with regard to civil cases, and the objections taken to the clause were rather on the ground that it left too much to the Judge than on any ground relating to its principle. The present Bill only proposed to extend the present law in civil cases to criminal cases. That extension was even more safe than in the former case, for in civil cases witnesses had more frequently an interest in the matter in dispute, whereas in criminal cases the witnesses were for the most part persons accidentally present at the circumstances to which they deposed, and who had no interest in the matter. In 1849 a Bill to that effect passed through the House, and it was then as now alleged that persons did not usually object to be sworn. It was proved, however, that numerous persons had been sent to prison to mix with common felons because they objected to swear on a book, which, as they conscientiously believed, forbade them to swear at all. He believed that the Bill under consideration had not had fair play, as it was confounded with a Bill which had also been introduced this Session, and which had been lost. That Bill was intended to abolish oaths in a certain sense, and he had supported it because he believed that the oath had not that religious sanction which was supposed to form its whole vitality. But the Bill under consideration had no connection with or resemblance to that other Bill. On the contrary, it preserved the religious character of the proceedings. He believed, however, that many Gentlemen had formed an opinion against the Bill solely because they thought it was similar to that other Bill which had been lost. The effect of the existing state of the law was that well known offenders often escaped punishment because the most material witnesses might have a religious scruple against taking an oath. He had no hesitation in stating that in his opinion the evidence of an objecting witness, whose sincerity was above suspicion, was more credible and trustworthy than nine-tenths of the persons who too often rushed into the witness-box without thinking of the responsibility they were incurring in taking an oath. As an example of the cases in which conscientious objectors were imprisoned, he might mention the case of a lady of birth and position, who was called as a witness in a case at Lewes in 1848, and who, though informed by the Judge, the late Mr. Baron Alderson, that she must take the oath or he would be compelled to send her to prison, respectfully but firmly refused, on the ground that she considered it to be unlawful according to the literal interpretation of the text in Scripture. She was accordingly sent to prison. She afterwards wrote to the plaintiff in the case, saying that she could not bear that he should be put to the loss of the money to which he was entitled through the want of her evidence, and she, therefore, begged him to accept a cheque which she enclosed for the amount of his debt and costs. Was that a person whose evidence ought to be rejected as unworthy of belief? And yet if a murder were committed, and that lady were the only witness, she would be rejected under the present law, and the murderer would escape. He hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee, in which case he thought there would be no objection to the clauses, for they were identical with the enactments of the Common Law Procedure Act.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

SHERIFFS' COURTS (SCOTLAND) (No. 2) BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CAIRD, having presented a petition from the Edinburgh Chamber of Commerce in favour of the Bill, said, the object of the Sheriff Small Debt Courts Extension Bill is simply to extend the summary jurisdiction of these Courts from £12 to £25. It allows actions of greater value to be tried by consent of parties, admits the attendance of agents, settles the amount of fees, and provides an appeal on points of law. The Bill is, therefore, merely an extension of the existing system, and the adoption of certain principles sanctioned by seventeen years' experience of the County Courts in England. But each point now introduced was proposed when the present Act was discussed in 1853. It is not correct, therefore, to say that there is anything new, crude, or merely technical in the change now proposed. When the English County Courts were first established, the summary jurisdiction was limited to £20, but after four years' successful trial that limit was raised to £50. In Ireland it had been gradually raised from £10 to £50. Now the Scotch resident Sheriff is an educated lawyer, and holds a similar position to that of a County Court Judge. He is reckoned competent to decide summarily in cases up to £12, and, if so, is equally competent to decide cases up to £25. For the importance of a correct decision on a question of £12 is surely as great to a poor man as is £25 to a man in better circumstances. Moreover, the jurisdiction of the Sheriff in his ordinary Court is unlimited in amount, so that it can hardly be argued that the present Sheriffs are not competent to deal summarily with cases up to £25; but in Scotland we have a system of double Judges in our County Courts which does not exist in England, and which leads to great expense and delay. It introduces the most objectionable practice of appealing the whole facts and circumstances of a case by written pleadings from the Judge who has heard the evidence and seen and examined the witnesses to one who has not had that opportunity. The expense and delay thus caused in cases up to £25, is out of all proportion to the value of the sum in dispute, and is in many cases practically a denial of justice. In the Summary Court, the Judge's decision up to £12, as compared with the tedious processes of the ordinary Court in all cases above £12, is, in cost and delay, as shillings to pounds, and days to months. I have obtained returns of the actual cost and delay in several of the most important Scotch Courts from the year 1853 to the present time, from which it appears that, on litigated cases between £12 and £25 in value, the average amount of expenses found due by the unsuccessful party was about £15, and the average duration of the cases about ten months; that is to say, that, by the present system, it costs £15 in expenses, and takes ten months to establish a claim of between £12 and £25 in the Sheriffs' ordinary Courts. But, whilst that is the average delay, a litigant who is fighting for delay may stave off a decision for two years. I have had a case sent to me in which the arts of the system are very forcibly illustrated. The sum at issue was £13 14s. The first proceedings were taken on the 27th July, 1859; proof in March, 1860; judgments given in September, 1860, and January, 1861; and final judgment on the merits in March, 1861. But this did not end the matter, for the case was still in Court on the question of expenses, the amount on which, on one side, was between £60 and £70, and this, too, when the original sum in dispute was only £13 14s. It may be stated broadly, that in no litigated case can a decision be obtained in the ordinary Court in less than six months, or at a less cost than the whole amount in dispute up to £25, the proposed limit of this Bill; whereas by this Bill all cases to that amount may be settled in a few days, and at a cost of a few shillings. But there is a peculiar hardship in cases where no defence is made, and these comprise more than 60 per cent of the whole. In the Summary Court, such cases, "decrees in absence," cost 3s. 7d. each; in the ordinary Court between £2 and £3. Now, as the number of such "decrees in absence" in the ordinary Courts amounts to upwards 6,000 in the course of a year, this Bill will effect a saving, in such cases alone, of utterly useless expense to the amount of near £12,000. By this Bill I propose to continue the system of allowing no appeal up to £12, but to give an appeal on points of law above that sum. This system, but with no appeal up to £20, has worked admirably in the County Courts in England, in which 5,440,000 plaints have been entered between 1847 and 1857, involving a sum of upwards of £16,000,000 sterling, and from which there has been only 177 appeals to the Courts at Westminster. I regret that the Government have not themselves taken up this question, which has long been most anxiously desired by the people of Scotland. Petitions in favour of it have been presented from the most important seats of industry—from Glasgow, Edinburgh, the county of Lanark, Forfarshire, Aberdeen, and the Convention of Royal Burghs, and I have this day presented one from the Chamber of Commerce of Edinburgh. In 1852 the whole country was agitated on the subject, and the claim was then for extension to £50. The Lord Advocate passed a Bill in 1853 which raised the summary jurisdiction from £8 6s. 8d. to £12 only. In England after four years' trial it was raised from £20 to £50. I now ask that in Scotland after eight years' trial, it should be raised from £12 to £25. In so moderate a measure I trust that the House will be guided by common sense, and by the experience both of England and Ireland. It is no fault of mine that the measure has not been brought forward by the law officers of the Crown, and the House will, perhaps, recollect that the County Courts Act, from which England has derived so much advantage, was originated by a private Member, and was at first opposed by the legal advisers of the Crown. This is a question of principle, on which laymen are quite as capable of judging as lawyers; there are no technical points of detail, and such Amendments as are required can be introduced in Committee. I regret that, owing to the late period of the Session, I cannot now hope to carry through this measure. But I have been anxious to state its object; and, as it has been very favourably received in Scotland, I shall now give notice, in withdrawing the Bill this year, that early next Session I shall introduce a measure with the same object.

MR. ROEBUCK said, before the hon. and learned Gentleman expresses the opinion of the Government with regard to this measure, I am anxious to address a few words to the House. I am extremely sorry that my hon. Friend has felt it incumbent upon him to withdraw the Bill. The questions involved in it are of so simple a character, are so thoroughly understood, and are so desirable, that I think the Bill, late as the Session is, might have been assented to without discussion, and have passed on the spot. For my own part, I must confess that I cannot see why the Judges of the Sheriff Courts in Scotland should not be as capable of performing the duties of Judges in Small Debt Courts as the Judges who now so advantageously preside over the County Courts in England. I believe that the Bill of my hon. Friend merely provides for Scotland that which it fully deserves—namely, a cheap and expeditious mode of recovering small debts. The Bar of Scotland holds as high a rank as that of England; and there is no reason, therefore, to presume that justice could not be as well administered in Scotland under the change proposed by my hon. Friend as is now the case in England. There is consequently, in my opinion, no reason for maintaining a distinction in such a matter as this between England and Scotland; and I cannot conceive that any difficulty could have arisen if my hon. Friend had persevered with the Bill. The only difficulty which could have been anticipated must have been the apprehended indisposition of the House of Lords to pass such a measure at so advanced a period of the Session, and I am convinced in my own mind that that apprehension has really no foundation. The House of Lords fully appreciates the advantages which the establishment of County Courts has conferred upon the people of this country, and I for one have not the slightest doubt that even at this advanced period of the Session they would not have interposed obstacles to the introduction of the same benefits into Scotland.

THE LORD ADVOCATE: After what has been stated by my hon. Friend (Mr. Caird), that it is not his intention to persevere with the Bill this Session, I shall reserve any opinion I might have had to express in reference to the merits of the propositions contained in the measure until it may be brought forward for discussion in a future Session. At the same time I feel it my duty to say a few words upon the conversation which has taken place in regard to this Bill. The hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, who has just addressed the House, appeared to think that, as the law with regard to the recovery of small debts now stood, Scotland laboured under some considerable disadvantage in comparison with England. Now, my own opinion is that, instead of sustaining any injury, Scotland is at present particularly favoured. There exists in Scotland what I believe has no existence either in England or Ireland—namely, a local jurisdiction, which is reasonably rapid and comparatively cheap. Therefore, before such a change as that proposed by the present Bill is introduced, it behoves us to consider what great advantages would be conferred upon Scotland by an Amendment of the existing law. The present jurisdiction for the recovery of debts, leaving out of the question the Sheriffs' Court jurisdiction, which extends only to debts up to the amount of £12, is not even confined to £20, but is without any limit whatever, and embraces within its scope a great variety of subjects. It is much cheaper than the Queen's Courts, which, before the establishment of the County Court system, were the only resources for the recovery of debts in England. Returns which were moved for some years ago when this question was brought under the discussion of Parliament, showed that the average cost of litigated cases in the Sheriffs' Courts are exceedingly moderate; and as the jurisdiction is summary as well as cheap, there have been no complaints of the law as it now stands. No doubt there are cases between £12 and £25 which may involve as difficult points of law as much larger sums, but at present no difficulty is experienced even upon that point. I fully admit that under the English County Court system the recovery of small debts is both expeditious and economical; and in the large towns of Scotland, the extension of the principle may be attended with advantage; but it is extremely problematical whether, in country towns, where now for a few pounds a decision can be readily obtained from the Sheriff, the same advantages will be derived. If my hon. Friend had simply proposed to raise the small debt jurisdiction to £25, I do not know that there would have been any objection to his Bill; but he proposes to complicate matters by granting an appeal to the Court of Session. I am not prepared to say at present whether that would be advisable or not, but I am fully prepared to state that the machinery which would be introduced under the Bill would be much more cumbrous than that which now exists.

MR. HADFIELD: I understand that in contested suits the expense now reaches about £15. That is much higher than the cost of a contested suit in this country, under the County Court system; and I think the introduction of a system that would render the process of the recovery of small debts in Scotland more economical would be a great boon. I sincerely trust that the hon. Gentleman will renew his application for a Bill next Session; and I have no doubt that if it succeeds in obtaining the sanction of this House, the people of Scotland will derive great advantage.

INDICTABLE OFFENCES (METROPOLITAN DISTRICT) BILL.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [3rd July].

" 'That the Bill be now read a second time; and which Amendment was, to leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.' "

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

MR. BRISTOW said, he objected to the Bill, on the ground that it would abolish Grand Juries within the metropolitan district. It seemed to him that, although the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Walpole) had moved the second reading of the Bill on a former day, no one really cared about it—not even the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, who was not in his place to take charge of it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that any—one was at liberty to move an order that stood upon the paper. He was favourable to the Bill, and he, therefore, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman, opposite thought himself at liberty to move the second reading.

MR. AYRTON said, he should move the adjournment of the debate. It would be extremely inconvenient if, in the absence of hon. Members who had charge of Bills, other hon. Members, without being authorized by them, were to move the Order of the Day. An hon. Member might for some good reason determine not to proceed with a Bill, and then next day he might find that some one behind his back had forwarded it a stage.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the course he had taken was by no means unusual, for at the end of the Session scarcely a night passed over without some instance of the practice. He had, however, just heard that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill wished the Order of the Day to be postponed.

Debate further adjourned till Wednesday next.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—CONSIDERATION.

Order for Consideration, as Amended, read.

MR. A. EGERTON said, he had given notice of his intention to move a clause on the rating of coal mines, but that owing to the lateness of the Session, he would withdraw the clause, reserving to himself, however, the right to move for the appointment of a Select Committee next Session to consider the subject.

Clause 8 (Power to levy rates),

MR. AYRTON remarked that an Act was passed some few years ago consolidating the law relating to the assessment and collection of county rates, and he believed the law had been found effective, but the Metropolitan Board of Works desired to introduce a new system of assessing and collecting its own rates, instead of adopting the law on the statute book. It was a very inconvenient course of proceeding, and was adopted because the representative of the important parish of St. George's, Hanover Square, had assumed a disagreeable attitude. The better course for the Metropolitan Board of Works would be to introduce a short clause, giving them the same power to collect their rate as the justices had for the collection of the county rate. In that way the Board would be relieved from the inconvenience of exercising their patronage in appointing a great number of rate-collectors. There would then be one law for collecting both rates, and much inconvenience would be saved to the ratepayers.

MR. BRISTOW said, the original Bill was faulty in this respect, that though it enabled the Board of Works to levy a precept if the parish refused to raise the money, they had no power to compel it. In the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Tite) he could not consent to striking out the clauses, but he would rather that the Chairman report Progress.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the proposal of the hon. learned for the Tower Hamlets was a very reasonable and proper one. The rates which were levied by the Metropolitan Board were imposed upon the basis of the county rate, and that being so all that was required was that the Metropolitan Board of Works should have the same power of levying the rates as the county magistrates had. He should move, therefore, the omission of the clauses on the subject, or would consent that they should pass on the understanding that upon the Report a clause should be introduced which would carry out the object of the hon. and learned Gentleman.

MR. BRISTOW said, that he would undertake to bring up such a clause upon the Report.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 9 to 71, inclusive, were also agreed to.

Clause 72 (Removal of Encroachments on the Highway),

MR. LOCKE said, that he was informed that the Metropolitan Board had no distinct principle as to the mode in which they exercised the power which this clause conferred; and, therefore, they sometimes allowed an encroachment, and sometimes refused a very necessary work. For instance, there had been what he might term a monstrous exercise of power on the part of the Board of Works with reference to a church in Penton Street. They alleged that the church encroached on the road, which it did not do to the extent of one inch. In the same street there was a ginshop which the Board of Works had taken under their protection which projected more than the church did. A suit was instituted by the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and Vice Chancellor Stuart had given judgment for them, and in the course of it made some strong observations on the conduct of the Board. On appeal that judgment was overruled by Lord Chancellor Campbell on a dry point of law, yet the latter said that the Board had the right to give their assent to the projection, and that they ought to have given it. Since that decision had been given the Board had been written to for its assent, which had been refused. The consequence was that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had been compelled to take down the chancel of the church.

MR. BRISTOW said, that in respect to the case referred to, the Lord Chancellor decided that the Metropolitan Board of Works was right—[“No, no!”]—that they had kept within the scope of the Act of Parliament. The clause under discussion was considered by the Committee upstairs to be a proper one. The old Act gave to the Metropolitan Board of Works the power to assent to or dissent from any projection beyond the line of frontage in any particular street, and the way that power was exercised was this:—When any person wanted to make a projection he made application to the Metropolitan Board for leave, and the Board sent their superintending architect to examine into the matter, and upon his report the Board generally acted. Some twenty or thirty cases of that kind came before the Board every week, and it was very creditable to the Board that, having been in existence for several years, there was only one case to which exception was taken. Now the object of the clause was to give the Board power to carry out their own orders, a power which they had not at present. The clause would give the Board power to summon a person who might have put up a projection of which the Board did not approve, and a justice might order the alteration or removal of the obstruction, and the expenses to be paid by the parties acting in contravention of the orders of the Board.

MR. LOCKE observed that the Lord Chancellor expressly disapproved the judgment displayed by the Metropolitan Board of Works in the case he had alluded to.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he conceived that the explanation given of the expediency of the clause was quite satisfactory. The hon. Member for Southwark stated that in respect to a particular case the Metropolitan Board of Works had been guilty of misconduct; but, considering that twenty or thirty of these cases came before the Board every week, if their course of practice was a wrong one there would be numerous remonstrances against it, and that there were many was not alleged.

MR. BARROW said, he was of opinion that the instance which had been adduced showed that the Metropolitan Board of Works had stretched their powers beyond a reasonable extent, and he objected to the present clause, because it would give the Board additional power to enforce their dissents. At present the power of enforcement was left to the local authority of the different vestries, which acted in this respect as a species of Courts of Appeal, and he for one was more inclined to trust the authority to them than to the Metropolitan Board.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he knew nothing of the particular case, but he knew as a member of the vestry that the present law worked inconveniently, inasmuch as the order was given by one body and had to be carried out by another, while sometimes the two bodies differed as to the propriety of the order. The clause would remove the difficulty, and he should, therefore, vote in favour of it.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Committee was about to inflict on individuals the necessity of defending themselves against the arbitrary discretion of the Metropolitan Board of Works; and he trusted, therefore, the intervention of the vestries would be retained. If, however, the Committee decided on abolishing such intervention they ought to give the parties the power of appealing directly to the Quarter Sessions. At any rate such an appeal would be better than one to the Court of Chancery.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 28; Noes 36: Majority 8.

Clauses 73 to 94 agreed to.

Clause 95 (Power to alter the names of streets),

MR. COWPER said, he objected to old streets having their names altered at the pleasure of the Metropolitan Board, and he would, therefore, propose an Amendment providing that the re-naming of streets should not be left to the mere will of that Board, who might call them after their own names, but should be subject to the approval of the Commissioners of Her Majesty's Works.

MR. LOCKE said, he was surprised at the Amendment. The Government were quite ready to vote in support of the Board in reference to such matters as the pulling down of houses and the projection of buildings, and were content to oppose them when it came simply to a question of giving names to streets.

MR. BRISTOW said, he believed the scheme adverted to by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Works—namely, that it had been proposed that streets should be called after the members of the Metropolitan Board—had originated in Punch. He trusted the Amendment would be withdrawn.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY remarked that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Works was hardly justified in endeavouring to throw ridicule on a body of men who, he felt bound to say, did not, as time would prove, deserve all the attacks which had been made upon them.

MR. COWPER said, he had read the statement to which he had called the attention of the Committee in the newspapers, and if he were wrong in deeming it to be correct, he was glad to find he was mistaken. He had no wish to say anything against the Board of Works, for, as an hon. Member had stated, there was no lack of persons to do that.

MR. AYRTON said, he thought the power conferred by the clause of allowing the Board to name, or alter the name of, any street at their pleasure ought to be confined to cases in which there were duplicate streets, or in which several parts of the same street were called by distinct names—as, for instance, in the case of several blocks of buildings in the New Road.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he could bear testimony from personal experience of the inconvenience and confusion caused by streets in London being called by the same name.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that it was not a matter of first-rate importance, but it was as well that any legislation which took place upon it should be proper. In accordance with the existing law the Board of Works might, "where more than one street in the Metropolis was called by the same name, alter the name of all such streets, except one, to any other which the Board might think fit, subject to the approval of the First Commissioner of Works." The effect of the clause under discussion would be so to enlarge the power thus enjoyed as to enable them to alter the name of any street, whether there was a duplicate or not, and to make that alteration without the sanction of the First Commissioner. Unless some good reason were urged for conferring these enlarged powers he did not see why they should be given.

MR. BRISTOW said, he would undertake, if the clause were passed in its present shape, to bring up a clause on the Report which would confine the power of the Board to the alteration of the streets in those cases in which they found more than one street of the same name.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, he did not see why there should be any objection to the sanction of the First Commissioner being rendered necessary in these cases.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

MR. CAVE moved the insertion of a clause continuing certain exemptions from paving rates. He stated that in the case of Dock Companies, though they used the pavement in the neighbourhood for which they ought to pay, yet that they ought not to be assessed at the full value of their property, as a great part of their profit was made out of goods re-exported in bond, which passed over no pavement. This had been decided in a Court of law.

MR. DENMAN said, that the case referred to had been overruled; and that it was no longer held that the benefit derived ought to be taken into consideration.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS, MR. TITE, SIR JOHN SHELLEY, and MR. BRISTOW opposed the clause, which was negatived.

MR. CAVE then moved the insertion of a clause giving a right of appeal against the decisions of vestries and district Boards under sec. 159, 18 & 19 Vict.

MR. DENMAN objected to the clause, because there was an appeal at present in respect of all matters with regard to which parties ought to have an appeal.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE opposed the clause.

MR. AYRTON said, the clause would virtually transfer to the justices the duties which Parliament had intrusted to the vestries and district Boards.

MR. CAVE said, he not would press the clause, though he doubted whether the right to appeal was sufficiently clear.

Clause negatived.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

LEASES, &c., BY INCUMBENTS RESTRICTION BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee)

MR. FREELAND moved to insert the following clause:—

"Notwithstanding anything contained in the 11th section of an Act passed in the 14th and 15th years of Her Majesty, chapter 104, any rector, vicar, perpetual curate, or incumbent, shall have such and the same powers of sale, exchange, and enfranchisement as are possessed by any Ecclesiastical Corporation, sole or aggregate, under any Act now in force; and the provisions of an Act passed in the Session held in the 23rd and 24th years of Her Majesty, chapter 124, shall, so far as the same relate to powers for the raising or application of money by trustees, allowances to lessees, arbitration, valuation, rate of interest, apportionment of rent, and substitution of titles on exchange, be applied, mutatis mutandis, to sales, exchanges, or enfranchisements of any manors, lands, tenements, or hereditaments in this Act comprised; but the proceeds of any such sales or enfranchisements, and any monies received by way of equality or exchange, shall be applied according to the provisions in that behalf contained in the said Act passed in the Session held in the 5th and 6th years of Her Majesty, chapter 108, and in the said Act passed in the Session held in the 21st and 22nd years of Her Majesty, chapter 57."

Clause agreed to.

Bill reported, with Amendments; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR acquainted the House, That he had received Letters from Vice-Admiral Sir James Hope, K.C.B., and Major General Sir John Michael, K.C.B., in return to the Thanks of this House and to the Resolutions of the 14th of February last, communicated them in obedience to the Order of this House of the said 14th of February: The said Letters being read, were Ordered to lie on the Table, and to be entered on the Journals.

ASSIMILATION OF CRIMINAL AND CIVIL PROCEDURE.

PETITION.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a Petition from Bezer Blundell, praying that a measure may be passed to enable defendants in prosecution for Libel to be examined on Oath. The noble and learned Lord said, that in 1851 he had the great satisfaction of effecting, with their Lordships' concurrence, the most important change and improvement which had for many years been introduced into the procedure, indeed, he might say, into the jurisprudence, of this country—the allowing parties in all civil suits whatever to be examined as witnesses, and compelling them to be examined at the instance of their adversaries. The effects of the change had proved most beneficial in all civil suits, and he had decided to extend it partially to criminal cases, by giving the option to the defendants to be examined if they chose, submitting themselves, of course, to the sifting of cross-examination, which any innocent person must rather desire than wish to avoid. The objection taken to this proposal, when he had introduced a Bill on the subject, was that any person who declined the leave to be examined would be supposed to do so from consciousness of guilt. He (Lord Brougham) owned that this did not much change his opinion, because it would only serve to convict the guilty. The petition which he now had to present afforded a strong illustration of the bad state of the law in this respect. It was from Mr. Blundell, and the facts stated in it strongly supported his (Lord Brougham's) view of the subject, and showed the necessity of a change in the law. Mr. Blundell, in his endeavours to improve the administration of the County Court, became involved in a correspondence which, it was alleged, partook of a libellous tendency. Proceedings were taken against him, and Mr. Blundell offered to deposit £100, to cover the costs of his adversary, if he would allow the action to be brought in a shape which would admit of his being examined. That proposition, however, was declined, and an indictment was brought against him not only for libel, but for an attempt to extort money. The latter part of the case broke down, and an acquittal was directed; but the charge of libel was persevered in, and, as Mr. Blundell was unable to be heard in his own defence as a witness while his adversary was allowed to be favoured, he was convicted though he could have proved the truth of the statement. His only remedy, as he was advised, was to prosecute his opponent for perjury, who would, in turn, be debarred from giving evidence in his own behalf. Mr. Blundell complained of this state of the law of libel, and asked that defendants might be heard in their own behalf. For his own part, he would be prepared to go further, and to extend the principle to all criminal cases.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON, in moving the second reading of this Bill, said, that when the present Secretary of State for India introduced in "another place" his measure of 1853, he stated that, in consequence of evidence which had been given before Committees of both Houses, and in consequence of the opinion of Members of the India Council, the Government had come to the conclusion that it would be desirable to make an effort for the amalgamation of the two chief Courts of Judicature which now existed at each of the Presidency towns. But it was thought desirable that, before taking any steps to carry out the alteration suggested, measures should be adopted for the improvement of the civil and criminal procedure, and a Commission was appointed to report upon the subject. That Commission had drawn up a plan which had been sent out to India. The code of civil procedure had been passed by the Legislative Council, and the reports of its working were most satisfactory. The code of criminal procedure was now passing the Legislature, and would, no doubt, become law in the course of the present year. A penal code for the whole of India had been passed, to come into operation on the 1st of January next. The Government, therefore, were now in a position to redeem the pledge given in 1853. That was the object of the present Bill. At the present moment there existed for Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay two principal courts of judicature, one called the Sudder Court and the other the Supreme Court. In the one the Judges were selected from the Indian civil servants, and in the other they were English barristers. Both Courts exercised a similar jurisdiction, although within different limits. The Supreme Court of Calcutta exercised a jurisdiction of a personal description in regard to Europeans all over India, except in the Presidencies of Madras and Bombay, so that every European, whether in the service of the Government or not, charged with a criminal act, must be taken to Calcutta to be tried. The Sudder Courts exercised a certain amount of superintendence over the proceedings of the Courts in the Mofussil. Now, while it was most desirable that in a Court of last resort there should be combined the advantages and powers possessed by both these Courts, and that it should unite to the legal knowledge and judicial training of English barristers the knowledge of the language, habits, and feelings of the Natives which was possessed by the Civil Service Judges of the Court of Sudder Adawlut, it was equally desirable that the Courts which exercised a superintendence over the inferior Courts should in part consist of persons who had received the training and possessed the knowledge of an English barrister. It appeared to the Government that if the two Courts were amalgamated their supervision might be extended, and the exercise of justice by person well trained in the law would be secured in different parts of the country, thus remedying a great evil of the present system, and providing better security for the due administration of justice. Opinions had been given in favour of the amalgamation of the Supreme and Sudder Courts by many whose judgment in the matter must have the greatest weight, and amongst them Sir Edward Ryan, who at the time he expressed his opinion was Chief Justice of Bombay, and Sir Frederick Halliday, the Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal. The noble Earl having read extracts from the evidence of these gentlemen, proceeded to say that by this Bill they proposed to abolish the existing Supreme Court and the existing Sudder Court, and to form in lieu of them a High Court of Judicature, to be established as the Supreme Court originally was by letters patent. With respect to the qualification of the Judges, it was proposed to take for the legal class the same standard as existed for appointments to the Supreme Court—namely, they must be barristers of five years standing; as to the Civil Service Judges nearly the same standard as existed for the Sudder Courts—namely, they must be of ten years standing in the service, three of which must have been passed as Zillah Judges; or they must have been Judges of an inferior Court for five years, or pleaders in the Supreme or Sudder Courts for ten years. One third of the Judges (including the Chief Justice) were required to be of the legal class, and one third of the Civil servant class. Her Majesty's Government had been anxious to take power for the Governor General, if he should think fit, to appoint certain Natives who had served in the lower Courts of India, Judges of this Court. Lord Canning and other authorities were of opinion that Natives who had acquired experience in the present Courts should be eligible for the highest judicial appointments, and that some of them would be found capable of sitting side by side with British Judges. A very necessary and salutary provision was made for sending Commissioners to try cases in parts of the country distant from the ordinary Courts; and also for the exercise by the High Court of a general supervision over the other Courts in the country, which would place the Chief Justice somewhat in the position of a Minister of Justice. He believed that this measure would improve the administration of justice in India, strengthen the highest Court of judicature in that country, and elevate the character of the other Courts by placing them under its Supervision.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^d.

LORD BROUGHAM left it to those who were experienced in Indian affairs to deal with the Bill at large. There was, however, one provision upon which it required no local knowledge of India to express a decided opinion, and which he trusted would be erased from the Bill. He alluded to the provision that the Indian Council should have power not only to appoint the salaries of Judges upon their entrance into office, but from time to time to alter those salaries ; the effect of which would be that the emoluments of the Judges would depend upon the pleasure of the Council. It was obvious for what purposes that power might be used, and the proposal was as novel as it was objectionable. He hoped it would be struck out of the Bill.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, that the construction put upon the clause by his noble and learned Friend was certainly not that contemplated by the Government. What was intended was that the power to alter the salaries should not apply to Judges who had been appointed, and whose salaries had been fixed, but only to those who might be "thereafter appointed." That was certainly the intention of the clause, and he would be glad to consider any words which the noble and learned Lord might propose to make it clearer.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: I so far concur with the noble Earl (Earl de Grey) that I think it would certainly be a considerable improvement if the Supreme Courts of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay had given to them the power of despatching one of their members into the Mofussil, for the purpose of trying charges against Europeans. That object might be accomplished without any difficulty by having a single Judge for the purpose at each of those Courts. But it would be advisable, also, to give that Judge the assistance of some person, such as one of the Judges of the Sudder Courts, conversant with the laws, customs, and language of the Natives. Otherwise, the Judge of the Supreme Court despatched to the Mofussil would be completely in the hands of the interpreter and lower officers of the Court, who would probably be bribed by one, and possibly by both of the parties in any case he had to try. This Bill goes very far—indeed, like the other Bills—it goes far beyond the necessities of the case. The noble Earl told us that on the Report of the Law Commission which sat some twenty years ago, and on the evidence which was taken in 1853, Sir Charles Wood in the latter year announced his intention at some time or other of introducing a Bill of the same tendency as the present. Your Lordships, however, knew perfectly well that to give evidence on the general subject and to give evidence as to a Bill actually before Parliament are two very different things. If this Bill had come up early in the Session, I think your Lordships could not have refused—what I would even now propose were it possible—that it should be referred to a Select Committee for the purpose of hearing the opinions and statements, not only of Judges who have exercised authority in the Supreme Court, but of the many learned persons, for learned they are, who have officiated as Judges in the Sudder Courts, and in different parts of the country. We should then have been prepared to decide on this measure with a knowledge of the subject which we have not at present. The state of the Session, however, renders it impossible for us to avail ourselves of that assistance. The idea of this measure is by no means a new one. The Government, indeed, seem to be in possession of a great many exploded ideas which are quite of old date. I can recollect this notion twenty or thirty years ago; and it was weighed and considered and rejected during that period, till it was at length taken up by Sir Charles Wood. I well recollect the very long speech which the right hon. Gentleman made when he first brought the proposal forward, for I calculated that its length was about equal to one of my wars. The Gwalior war consisted of two battles, fought in one day, and the length of the fighting part of that war fell considerably short of the length of Sir Charles Wood's speech. In 1830 Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone was examined on this subject, as well as on the constitution of the Council, and he gave a decided opinion against the union of the Supreme Courts and the Sudder Courts. Even on the subject of the Council I consider Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone's opinion as valuable as any we possess; but with respect to any matter connected with the jurisdiction of the Courts and the administration of justice, there has been no man at any time whose opinion deserves so much respect as that of Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone. He was himself a lawgiver—a great lawgiver—not merely a very able man, but one to whom the people of India were extremely attached, and he was not likely to be opposed to any alteration which would be of advantage to them. Yet, with all his knowledge and with his philosophical mind, he decided that it was not expedient to unite these Courts, and the reason which he gave was that it would introduce into the Mofussil all the technicalities of the English law. I wish those of your Lordships who are connected with Scotland to consider what would be your feelings now if any Government were to introduce into Parliament a Bill for uniting the Courts of Scotland to the Courts of England, and making those Courts consist of three times the number of persons of which they consist at present. What would be your feelings if not only barristers of five years' standing, and gentlemen of the Faculty of Advocates, were supposed to be capable of all possible functions, but persons in a similar position to the Judges of the Zillah and Small Cause Courts were declared eligible to be appointed to the highest Court of judicature—such as Chairman of Quarter Sessions, County Court Judges, and persons of an inferior description who by rural courtesy are called lawyers? But all those persons may be introduced into this Court in India, which you will observe is the Court to which all the Courts throughout India, European and Native, are to appeal. I can imagine great objections to such a fusion of Scotch and English law, and no doubt great inconvenience would result from it. But how infinitely small would be the inconvenience of that amalgamation compared to the inconvenience of the amalgamation which is now proposed. The Judges to proceed to the Mofussil are to form a Court capable of infinite subdivision by their own authority. There is to be one Judge, or two Judges, or three Judges, as they please; and all these different Courts are to exercise the whole appellate and original jurisdiction now possessed by the Sudder Court and by the Supreme Court. English lawyers know nothing of the language of the people. They know nothing of the law by which cases are to be decided. They know nothing of Hindoo or Mahomedan law. They know nothing of the various regulations which, during one hundred years, successive Governors-General have, with great zeal, introduced. They know nothing of the customs of the country or the habits of the people. They know nothing of the laws of caste; and these gentlemen are to be sent into the Mofussil to give satisfaction to the Natives in the administration of the law. I think that if it were desired to devise a system which would produce discontent from one end of India to the other, and degrade the administration of justice, it is that system which is provided by this Bill. But if that is not a sufficient objection, as I think it is, give me leave to draw your Lordships' attention to the financial working of this Bill. With the exception of the noble Lord who has introduced the Bill, I doubt whether any of your Lordships have looked into it to see what will be the cost, and what will be its particular effect upon the expenditure. Three Courts are to be established, and a fourth may be established, and, probably, will be established, for the North-Western Provinces. To show the animus with which the Bill was introduced, when it was presented to the House of Commons there was no limit as to the number of Judges. The House of Commons, with rare economy, limited the number to fifteen for each of the four Presidencies. The number of Judges by whom appellate jurisdiction is to be exercised is by this Bill sixty. How many Judges are there now? At Calcutta there are three, at Madras two, and at Bombay two, making seven in all. Of the sixty Judges twenty must be barristers. Thirteen barristers of five years' standing are to go out to India as Judges. Every one of those gentlemen, of necessity, in order to induce them to go and to place them on a level with those who are there, must have £5,000 a year. There are eighteen Judges in the Company's courts; therefore, only two have to be added to complete the twenty who must be covenanted servants. How is the intermediate body of twenty to be made up? No power is given to the Governor General to make an original appointment. It is a greater violation of the principle of Government and the proceedings of Parliament than has ever occurred since the rejection of Mr. Fox's India Bill. It places India patronage of great value in the hands of the Crown. It takes from the Governor General the power of rewarding good judicial servants, and it transfers all the appointments to England. You may depend upon it that it is impossible great mischief under such circumstances should not follow. The result will be, and I believe the result intended is, that the third body of twenty Judges shall also be barristers of five years' standing, and that, in the first instance, thirty-three barristers will have to be sent to India with £5,000 a year each. Observe what is the present charge of judicial administration in India. In the accounts lately presented it is £4,230,000; but from that charge we may fairly deduct the charge for police, and a small charge of about £90,000 incurred in the year under review—1859-60—on account of the mutiny, making together £1,837,000. So that there remains as now expended on account of the administration of justice £2,393,000. Let us see what is the expense of the Supreme Courts already. The salaries of the seven

Judges amount to £44,000. I have no objection whatever to that; but there are other very large charges for contingent expenses. The contingent charges of the three Courts are £83,500 a year, in addition to £44,000 paid in salaries. And the result of the operation of this measure will be this—there will be added to the present expenditure, great as I have shown it to be, the salaries of thirty-five Judges. Their salaries will amount to £175,000, and of that sum £165,000 will go to barristers of five years' standing. But there will be a charge for contingencies connected with these different Courts, and I venture to say it is a very low calculation to put it at £2,500 for each of the thirty-five Judges. If I were to take the average of the same charge for the present Judges, it would be £12,000 a year each; but taking it at £2,500 a year the total sum which this Bill will cost when carried out is £262,000. I do entreat your Lordships not to proceed further without considering what you are about, and hearing the evidence of competent persons as to the expediency of adopting this particular mode of carrying into effect the amalgamation of the Courts, even if it is right there should be an amalgamation at all. As the Bill stands, it appears nothing more than an enormous job for barristers. What effect it will have in India I know not; but this I know—that, if Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone's opinion be correct, it will produce the greatest discontent and dissatisfaction, and will not further the ends of justice. Recollect that for the first time there is introduced into this measure a provision giving to the Crown, and taking from the Government of India, a very large and most important patronage, the appointment of all the higher officers in the judicial establishment. I cannot consent to that innovation, nor can I consent, without much further information from the most competent authorities, to adopt the principle of the noble Lord's Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE believed that it was the opinion of those who had most experience in hearing Indian appeals in the Privy Council that the Supreme Court at Calcutta had worked in an admirable manner. It was a matter, therefore, of very serious moment to attempt to alter a Court of such a character. Nevertheless, he hoped that the Bill would pass without any great alteration. In one or two points it certainly did require alteration. He objected strongly to the provision at the end of the second clause, that one third of the judges should of necessity be members of the Civil Service. Such a provision was entirely at variance with common sense, and seemed to him equally extraordinary and unconstitutional. He should have thought that the provision should have been just the other way—namely, that not more than one-third should belong to the Civil Service. The whole Civil Service did not number more than 470 members, for notwithstanding the great increase of our Indian territories very immaterial additions had been made to the service. The proviso really enacted that one-third of the Judges should not be trained lawyers, for three years' service in a Zillah Court could not qualify a man to be Judge in a Supreme Court. It was quite right that the courts should be open to the Civil Service, and that members of that service when they showed themselves qualified for high judicial office should be raised to the bench; but he objected to making it imperative that one-third of the Judges should be taken from that service, whether or not it could afford men properly qualified. All the ablest men of the judicial department were taken from it to be placed in political and fiscal posts. He objected also to the clause which provided that the Chief Justice as well as the other Judges should be removable at the pleasure of the Crown. That was a most unconstitutional proposal. It was said that this had always been the case; but India was then governed by the Company, and the Queen's Judges were, therefore, independent of the Indian Government, and stood between the Company and the people. He submitted that it was desirable to perpetuate as far as possible that independence, for there was direct evidence on record that the Indian Government had not unfrequently attempted to influence their judicial officers in the discharge of their duty. The Enam Commission Commissioners had been exchanged two or three times because their decisions were not in accordance with the designs of the Government. He hoped that their Lordships would consider the two points he had mentioned when the Bill was in Committee. In opposition to the opinion of the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough), he believed that sending the Judges on circuit would be of great use, and he repeated that, as far as he could judge, the present Supreme Court was held in high estimation.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) had objected to this Bill, that it would amalgamate two Courts which at the present moment had different modes of procedure. The fact was, however, that at the present moment there was one civil procedure in India applicable to all Courts; there was about to be one single criminal procedure, and after the 1st of January next there would be one penal code applicable to all classes in that country. The noble Earl's analogy, therefore, drawn between the proposal made in this Bill and a proposal to amalgamate the Scotch and English Courts entirely failed. The practice of the two Courts would, in point of fact, be the same even if they were kept separate. Then the noble Earl seemed to suppose that the Government were going to appoint sixty Judges under this Bill. This estimate proceeded upon the supposition, which was really quite preposterous, that it was proposed to appoint at once the whole of the fifteen Judges in these Courts. The words of the clause, however, were "not exceeding fifteen." The noble Earl said that forty out of the sixty might be barristers. Now, he did not think he need seriously answer an insinuation that the Bill was introduced to enable the Government to send out forty barristers from England to be Judges in these Courts. It was not the intention of the Bill that two-thirds of the Judges should be English barristers. One-third of the members of the Court were to be Civil Servants, and for the remaining appointments, besides the English barristers who would be eligible, two other qualifications were specified; so that the noble Earl's charge manifestly had no foundation. At present there was no limit by law to the number of Judges in the Sudder Courts. At Calcutta there were five, and within a recent period there had been ten; but those Judges had been appointed under peculiar circumstances, the amount of business being such as to render their appointment necessary. At that time there were thirteen Judges, ten in the Sudder and three in the Supreme Court. It might thus seriously interfere with the requirements of the public service to impose a limit; but there was not the least intention to appoint sixty Judges, and incur the enormous expense which the noble Earl seemed to fear. Their number would be fixed as at present, according to the requirements of the service, with this difference—that, whereas the number of the Judges in the Sudder Courts might now be increased to any extent by the addition of temporary Judges, a limit would be imposed under this Bill. It should be remembered that these Courts were to exercise jurisdiction throughout the whole of India. The duties of the Judges would be most important and various, and, that being so, it would not be right to impose a narrow limit on the discretion of the Indian Government in this particular.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH would offer a few words in explanation. This Bill amalgamated the Sudder and Supreme Courts, the result of which would be that each would bring all its Judges and all its jurisdiction into partnership. The Sudder Court decided causes which came before it on appeal according to the law which prevailed where those causes were originally heard, which was the Company's law. The Supreme Court decided the causes which came before it according to the Queen's law, which differed materially from that of the Company. Now, when the two Courts were amalgamated they must adjudge the case according to the law of the Court from which the appeal proceeded; and how would the Bill operate in this respect? First of all, the present Chief Justice of the Supreme Court in Calcutta, of whom it was said that a Bill had been introduced specially to put him down, was at his discretion to direct in what manner the Court should be divided on each particular occasion. A division surely meant that there should be a Queen's Judge and a Company's Judge sitting side by side in the different Committees, or else there would be no amalgamation; and if they had an English barrister sitting along with one of the Company's servants, this would practically be analogous to the amalgamation of the English and Scotch Courts, because here would be two Judges, neither of whom was acquainted with the law known to the other, and who would have to decide a case which might involve either kind of law. Another point was the number of barristers who might be appointed Judges under this Bill. When the measure was introduced into the House of Commons there was no limit, no check, to the expenditure that might be made under it on lawyers. But the House of Commons limited the number of Judges to fifteen. There were certain small Courts in India; and there were, besides, persons who acted as pleaders before the Sudder Courts; but he did not believe any person would be selected from these intermediate bodies.

The Bill reminded him of the section of Westminster Hall which he had once seen; the two outside facings of the hall were of fine stone, but the middle was filled up with bad rubble. He thought it quite impossible to come to any conclusion but that the Crown was to appoint the whole sixty Judges, for the Governor General could only nominate when there was a vacancy. He had told their Lordships what might be done under this Bill, and that was a Parliamentary view to take; it was their duty to be suspicious; confidence was not their duty; and he saw nothing in the way in which the Bill was framed to inspire confidence in those who framed it.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, there was one point to which he wished to call attention. The Judges of these Courts were to consist partly of Natives, who might be Hindoos or Mahomedans, and they might, from the way in which this Bill was framed, have to exercise their office of Judges in matters ecclesiastical. The Bill abolished the present Court of Appeal in matters ecclesiastical, which was a Court of delegates consisting of three members of the Civil Service in each of the Presidencies. He thought it was desirable that some change should be made in the Bill before it was passed, in order to prevent Native Judges having to exercise jurisdiction in ecclesiastical matters.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: My Lords, I think it would be a matter of deep regret if anything that has occurred should prove an impediment to the progress of this Bill, which, I think, will distinguish the present Session, by discharging one of the greatest obligations you owe to the people of India. Since I have had the honour of holding a seat in this House, I have listened on several occasions with the pleasure and admiration which all must feel to the speeches of the noble Lord on my left (the Earl of Ellenborough). But I must confess I do not think the speech he has made this evening is distinguished by so much candour or, I will even say, with much respect, by so much knowledge of the subject as generally mark the speeches of the noble Earl. The noble Earl spoke of the Supreme Court in the several Presidencies as if it had not now to administer Native law; but the Supreme Court has an area of jurisdiction within which come the great cities of Calcutta, Madras, and Bombay. Within that area the Judges of the Supreme Court administer not only

English but Native law. One principal topic of the noble Earl's speech has been the ignorance of the English barristers, and their unfitness to administer Native law satisfactorily. Yet the present state of the administration of justice in India is this—there is a Supreme Court within whose jurisdiction come the chief towns of the Presidencies; beyond them there is a local jurisdiction that I may describe as divided into districts, each having a Zillah Judge, who decides both in civil and criminal cases. From these Judges there is an appeal to the Sudder Adawlut, and, with great deference to the noble Earl, I must say that, though in theory this Court may have some original jurisdiction, it is practically confined to matters of appeal. What is the result? That, with regard to the Natives beyond the limits of the towns, there is one Supreme Court to administer the law, and with regard to the Natives within the limits there is another. And with regard to British subjects, if they are within the limits of the Presidency towns they are amenable to the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court; but if they are beyond those limits they are subject to no jurisdiction except the limited powers the 53rd of George III. gives to local magistrates of the Mofussil. The result is there is a most unjust and unreasonable distinction between the Natives on one side and the Europeans on the other; one is placed on a different footing from the other. Can this be satisfactory to the Natives of the country? Have you any greater hold, or ought you to seek to have any greater hold, over the Natives of the country than by an elevated, impartial, and pure administration of justice? Can that be attained while you have one law and one administration for the Native, and another for the European? That defect the Bill is proposed to remedy. The noble Earl says, how can we send out English barristers, of five years' standing, to administer Native law? But the Judges in India—I may appeal to the example of Sir William Jones—have been distinguished by the assiduity with which they have cultivated a knowledge of Native law, as much as by the impartiality and skill with which they have administered it. It is true that the Bill merely provides that the barristers who may be selected for these appointments must be of five years' standing; but the noble Earl will permit me to remind him that this is the minimum qualification. It does not mean that young men are always to be selected, though a barrister of five years' standing may frequently have a great amount of practical experience in his profession. The late Mr. Justice Patterson had practised below the bar, and laid the foundation of his great reputation by attaining great knowledge of the law, so that when he was elevated to the Bench he was only a barrister of a few years' standing. It would be an unwise thing to require such a number of years' standing for an English barrister as would preclude the possibility of selecting a young and talented man. Now, the manner in which these Judges are to administer the law is this:—A certain number of covenanted servants, and a certain number of Natives, are to be nominated as Judges; circuits will be established, and commissions, sometimes of European, sometimes of Native Judges, according to the exigency of circumstances, will be sent into the Mofussil districts to regulate, control, and set right what may be required in the administration of justice. The noble Earl has drawn a striking picture of the good things which this measure will provide for the members of the Bar. The noble Earl, however, has much exaggerated the generosity of the Government to English barristers, and I am quite sure when his speech is read it will make many mouths water in Westminster Hall, the Sessions House, and the Four Courts, in expectation of such good things as fifteen Judgeships, each with £5,000 a year. Then—which is an extravagance that, with my little knowledge of India, I hardly anticipated—the noble Earl says each of these Judges will have £2,500 whenever they go a circuit, or make a journey into the Mofussil. If this is the anticipation of the noble Earl, it is by no means the anticipation of the Government. There are at present eight Judges in each of the Presidencies, five in the Sudder Court, and three in the Supreme Court; and I have yet to learn that the Judges of the Sudder Court each receive £5,000 a year; and I do not find that this Bill will make any alteration in that respect. On the contrary, its language has been studiously selected to avoid any such obligation. But I do not think that is the mode in which a great question of this kind should be considered. We are providing for the administration of justice among many millions of people. Undoubtedly we should not approach that subject by first making an estimate of what it will cost, but we should approach it in order to establish such a staff of Judges as may be required by the exigencies of the case; not, I admit, beyond the exigencies of the case, but such as is absolutely required for the performance of the duties. Such, undoubtedly, we are under obligations to consider, and that obligation, I submit, no consideration of money should induce us to forbear from acting upon. It was said by the noble Earl that a gentleman of great ability and deserved reputation (Mr. Mountstuart Elphinstone) gave an opinion some years ago to the effect that it would not be desirable to attempt to amalgamate the modes of administering the English and Native law. Now, let us consider what was the ground for that opinion. The noble Earl gave us a reason for that opinion, but that reason, I am happy to say, no longer exists. Mr. Elphinstone, who is frequently cited upon this subject, said he should be sorry to carry the English mode of administering justice into the Mofussil, because it would take with it all the technicalities of English procedure. I agree with him that, if the technicalities of English special pleading existed now as they did at that time the opinion was given, administering justice in the English form would inflict those technicalities upon the Natives of India. But the noble Earl forgets that the Government have delayed the propositions contained in this Bill until they had previously prepared the way by the formation of a simple code both of civil and criminal procedure—a code which we have already tried and found to give satisfaction—a code which combines the merits of cheapness and expedition, as well as the means of simplifying the administration of justice. I think, therefore, the mode of dealing with this subject which the Government have adopted is one consistent with their duty and the proper administration of justice in India. I am particularly desirous that this should be done, because I think the Native laws will, under this form of administration, be fully developed, and in a manner consistent with the results of experience and the improved state of the English jurisdiction. There are a variety of cases in which, without altering the Native law, but adhering to it in all respects in regard to possession and the rights of property, yet as to contracts and mercantile usages there are an infinite number of cases in which the Native law would be improved by being administered under an improved system. Of the various points which have been urged in debate there only remains, I think, that mentioned by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde)—the removability of the Judges at the pleasure of the Crown. The noble Marquess will be relieved of a great part of his apprehensions when he is reminded that, although it has been customary to make the offices of colonial Judges dependent upon the pleasure of the Crown, yet, in reality, there is a rule which has been laid down, which practically gives those Judges the same security as the English Judges; and I remember a case in which the removal of a Judge was reversed, because that rule had not been adhered to—which is, that whenever a cause of complaint is raised against a Judge, that cause of complaint should be brought under his notice, in order that he might have an opportunity of being heard in his defence antecedently to any steps being taken to remove him from his office. The position of a colonial Judge is, therefore, nearly correspondent with that of English Judges, who are removable only upon an Address to the Crown by both Houses of Parliament, and I think the rule I have mentioned is quite sufficient to ensure security in the case of Indian Judges. In conclusion, I may advert to the point raised by the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of London), and I would remark that there is no more common mistake than to suppose that the word “ecclesiastical” now involves anything that is spiritual. There is no ecclesiastical jurisdiction existing now in England beyond what is exercised by civil courts. The last blow was struck when I had the honour of carrying through Parliament the Testamentary Jurisdiction Bill and the Matrimonial Causes Bill. The ecclesiastical jurisdiction here referred to is a testamentary jurisdiction and a matrimonial jurisdiction. A spiritual jurisdiction relates to questions between a Bishop and his clergy, or between the clergy themselves. However, in order to prevent the possibility of alarm upon the subject, I can assure the right rev. Prelate that it is the intention of the Government to strike out the word “ecclesiastical” and substitute the word “testamentary.” Having now referred to the various points that have been mooted I have only further to apologize to your Lordships for trespassing at some length upon your patience.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EAST INDIA (CIVIL SERVICE) BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON rose to move the second reading of this Bill, which, he said, was the last of the series of Bills relating to India which the Government had submitted to Parliament this Session. The first object of the Bill was to confirm a number of appointments which had during a long space of time been made by the Government of India, but upon the legality of which great doubts had been cast. By an Act passed in 1793 covenanted Civil Servants alone were to be appointed to posts in India; but, as the limits of our Indian Empire were extended, and the demand upon the covenanted service increased, the number of Civil Servants was found inadequate, and other persons were appointed. Various attempts were made to justify the proceeding. It was held that in non-regulation provinces, which had been added since 1793, the provisions of the Act of that year did not apply. It was also held that, provided an appointment was not eo nomine in existence in 1793, the restrictions of the Act did not apply. To meet the case, it happened frequently that offices were abolished and re-created under a different name, in order to enable uncovenanted servants to be appointed. Thus, an assistant-collector was changed into a deputy-collector. Under the Act of 1793 the postmaster and other officers should be members of the guaranteed service, and even the Military Secretary ought to be not a military man but a covenanted Civil Servant. In consequence of some doubt which arose with regard to an appointment in Bengal, Lord Stanley, who was then at the head of the Indian Administration in this country, caused the opinion of the law officers of the Crown to be taken, and their decision rendered it perfectly clear that under the Act of 1793 not merely the appointment of military men to civil offices, but, likewise, the appointment of Natives to such offices as that of Principal Sudder Ameen was altogether illegal. It was consequently manifest not only that steps ought to be taken to legalize the appointments already made, but that the powers of the Governor General for the future ought to be clearly defined. No one could desire that military men should be excluded from civil and political appointments, which they had filled in various parts of India with the greatest advantage to the public service; or, on the other hand, that certain appointments should be closed against the Natives of India. The object of the Bill, was, consequently, to legalize appointments which had already been made, and to provide that, in future, particular duties might be performed by members either of the covenanted or uncovenanted service. But when such a serious alteration was made in the law of 1793 a question naturally arose as to the position of the Civil Servants. He need not detain their Lordships by dilating on the claims of these public officers, nor by expressing his admiration of the great services which they had rendered since India was first brought under the rule of this country. The Indian Civil Service had produced men of the highest eminence in all the branches of statesmanship, who had done honour not only to India but to England also. It was, consequently, the absolute duty of the Government, when interfering with the law of 1793, to determine the position in which Civil Servants would in future be placed. In deference to representations made by the Civil Servants, the Secretary of State for India had introduced into the Bill a schedule of offices which were to be reserved exclusively for Civil Servants, except in cases where the Governor General, for special reasons, felt it advisable to appoint some person outside their number, and in those instances the appointments were to be only temporary till they obtained the approval of the Secretary of State and the majority of his Council present at a meeting called to consider the appointment. That such an exceptional power ought to exist was shown by the case of Colonel Durand, of whose political experience, and great knowledge of the Natives Lord Canning would have been unable to avail himself under a strict interpretation of the Act of 1793. Sufficient checks were imposed upon those appointments by the fact that a residence of seven years in India was necessary as a qualification, and that the persons selected would be required to possess an acquaintance with the Native languages. The Bill in its present shape had obtained the approval of the representatives of the Civil Service, having been altered in accordance with their suggestions, and received the unanimous support in "another place" of Members of both political parties. He, therefore, trusted their Lordships would not object to its being read a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, every Governor General desired to have the most absolute freedom of selection in filling up the offices at his disposal, and would, no doubt, rather exercise the powers given by the Bill than content himself with those which he possessed under the existing law. But, whatever political advantages might be derived from the measure, he did not think it was just. It was directly in contravention of Parliamentary pledges; it interfered with Parliamentary right, and, unless the Members of the Civil Service were content to waive their privileges, Parliament should continue to extend to them all the advantages they at present possessed. No acts of illegality committed by successive Governors General could in any manner detract from their right to the appointment to those offices. He doubted whether the supposed benefits would result from this Bill, and whether the moment Civil Servants ceased to enjoy the exclusive possession of office in India the same disposition would continue on the part of the people of this country to offer themselves as candidates for that service. If the effect of this new law were materially to diminish the number and to lower the qualifications of persons desirous to fill situations in India, very great mischief would be done. Gentlemen who came off second best at the very strict examinations in this country would set off to India and endeavour to get in at the back door, having failed to get in at the front. Having lived through the prescribed term of years—and with their qualifications they would have no difficulty in obtaining employment in the interval—there was nothing to prevent them from obtaining office, and, perhaps, from distancing in the public service those gentlemen who at the competitive examinations had obtained a greater number of marks. The noble Earl had spoken of the securities provided under the Bill against any impropriety of conduct on the part of the Governor General in appointing persons on special grounds; but he should wish to be informed what security existed against improper appointments in the non-regulation provinces. He looked with extreme regret on what he regarded as steps towards the lowering, if not the extinction and supersession of the Civil Service, in which he points which have been urged in debate there only remains, I think, that mentioned by the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Clanricarde)—the removability of the Judges at the pleasure of the Crown. therefore, trusted their Lordships would not object to its being read a second time.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, every Governor General desired to have the most absolute freedom of selection in filling up the offices at his disposal, and would, no doubt, rather exercise the powers given by the Bill than content himself with those which he possessed under the existing law. But, whatever political advantages might be derived from the measure, he did not think it was just. If the effect of this new law were materially to diminish the number and to lower the qualifications of persons desirous to fill situations in India, very great mischief would be done. Gentlemen who came off second best at the very strict examinations in this country would set off to India and endeavour to get in at the back door, having failed to get in at the front. Having lived through the prescribed term of years—and with their qualifications they would have no difficulty in obtaining employment in the interval—there was nothing to prevent them from obtaining office, and, perhaps, from distancing in the public service those gentlemen who at the competitive examinations had obtained a greater number of marks. The noble Earl had spoken of the securities provided under the Bill against any impropriety of conduct on the part of the Governor General in appointing persons on special grounds; but he should wish to be informed what security existed against improper appointments in the non-regulation provinces. He looked with extreme regret on what he regarded as steps towards the lowering, if not the extinction and supersession of the Civil Service, in which he recognized a body of independent English gentlemen of honour and integrity; and he doubted extremely whether, under any altered system which might be devised, public officers equally distinguished and equally capable of carrying on the government of India would be obtained.

LORD LYVEDEN observed that the explanation which the noble Lord gave of the objects of the Bill to legalize appointments hitherto made of doubtful legality, and to a certain extent to open the service to uncovenanted servants, was a correct description of the measure as it was first introduced; but it had been materially altered in the House of Commons. Objections were urged to the Bill in its original form that the uncovenanted servant was not subjected to the same tests upon entering the service as the covenanted servants, and also that they were not prohibited from receiving bribes and taking presents, which for the sake of the purity and morality of the service ought to be the case, especially if these appointments were thrown open to them. The Secretary of State had some private conference with those who advanced these objections, and the result had been a complete alteration of the Bill, making the covenanted service even closer than it was at present. The schedule which had been inserted was proposed so late in the passage of the Bill that it had not received due attention in the other House, and it required a great deal of examination before it should be permitted to become law. When they came into Committee he should propose to strike out the second clause and the schedule, and he thought that there would be ample protection remaining for the covenanted servants. The Civil Service was, as every one knew, a very eminent body, but he did not think that on that account the Governor General should, in all cases, be bound to appoint persons belonging to that body when a person better fitted for the vacant office was to be found elsewhere. In this Bill there was no sort of sanction or authority given for the appointment of Natives; the consequence of this would be to place them further than ever from employment. If it was intended to exclude them it would be fairer and franker to say so at once. If not, why were not offices selected for competition at Calcutta whereby they might be admitted? they were not even named in it. But what he objected to in the Bill was its complete alteration without any reason being assigned, and he hoped that it would yet be restored to its original shape.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that this Bill was opposed by two noble Lords on opposite and contradictory grounds. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough) alleging that the Bill was unjust because it opened the Civil Service of India, and his noble Friend behind him (Lord Lyveden) objecting that it rendered that service more close. Neither of these objections, however, was well founded. In the first sentence of his speech the noble Earl said that it would be an advantage to the Governor General to be able to appoint any person he pleased to any office which might be vacant. If that were so, then he could not admit that there was in any body of men a vested right which could preclude Parliament from giving to the Governor General as much of that power as it thought it safe to vest in his hands. The original object of making the Civil Service close was to protect the patronage of the Directors against the interference of the Governor General. Now, however, our object was to secure for the Civil Service in India the greatest number of the best men that could be got. The admission to that service was now obtained by competition, and, although he was not prepared to maintain that that system was a perfect one, yet he had always been of opinion that it was much superior to the old plan of patronage. It was surely important that, if the Governor General found one Civil Servant more competent for an office than another, he should be able to appoint him to it; and if there was a gentleman in India not in the public service who was competent to the conduct of public affairs it was certainly for the advantage of the public that he should be placed in an office where his talents might be employed. This Bill was undoubtedly a compromise between the principles of his two noble Friends, one of whom looked upon the Civil Service as a vested interest, and the other thought that the service, to a great extent, should be open. It left the Governor General as free as he was in practice, and more free than he was by law, to appoint to offices persons not belonging to the Civil Service. At present he was not by law entitled to appoint any person not a member of the Civil Service to many offices, but practically he exercised that power. It was now provided that Civil Servants should have the first claim if fit men were to be found in the service, but in default of finding such persons the Governor General was empowered to appoint the fit persons. As to the history of this Bill, it was true that the schedule referred to had been introduced to meet the objections of the Civil Servants in this country; but all that it provided was that the offices mentioned in it the Civil Servants should have the first claim. The Governor General might, however, appoint even to those offices persons not connected with the covenanted service, provided he could show to the Government at home sufficient reasons for the appointments, and the Government approved of them.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE believed that no Governor General could carry on the Government in strict conformity with the Act of 1793, for it was impossible that the members of the covenanted service should fill all the offices under the Government of India. He understood that not only had Lord Dalhousie and Lord Canning applied for military officers to fill what were really civil offices, but the commander of the forces in India had been obliged to refuse the number Lord Canning required. So far, therefore, as the Bill opened up the service he cordially approved of it. He was, however, disposed to move an Amendment in Committee, with the view of restoring the Bill to its original shape, so far as it referred to the duration of residence in India and required to entitle a person to be employed by the Governor General. He would propose that instead of seven years the period of time in India should be five years, which, he thought, would be quite long enough. He had, however, a more serious complaint to make against the insufficiency of the Bill. He thought that they had rather debarred than assisted the Natives entering into the Government service by this measure. There had been Parliamentary as well as Ministerial promises given from time to time to the Natives that they should be advanced to greater employment in the service of the Indian Government. The pledge had never been redeemed. It was mere mockery to tell the Natives that they might come over to this country and undergo an examination for Government offices. He submitted that public examinations should be opened in India for Natives, and that when they had qualified themselves by passing those examinations they should be eligible at once for employment by the Government in almost any office. It was not right, nor safe, nor honourable to palter any further with this question.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a accordingly.

THE EARL OF DERBY asked upon what day it was proposed to go into Committee on the two Bills? There was still a good deal of business before the House. He should certainly think it would be better to refer those Bills to a Select Committee of their Lordships' House; but, at this advanced stage of the Session, there might be some risk of losing the Bills altogether by such a course. At the same time, considering what had passed that night in reference to them, it was obvious that the details required mature consideration. As it was likely that many Amendments would be proposed it was desirable that the Committee should be appointed for such an hour in the evening when the attendance of Members of their Lordships' House would be more numerous than it was at present, rather than to bring on the discussion at such a time when the Ministerial side of the House would be represented by seven or eight Members, and the opposite side by only, perhaps, two or three.

EARL GRANVILLE proposed to take the Committee on both Bills on Thursday.

Bill committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

EDUCATION—SCHOOLS IN SOMERSETSHIRE.

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

THE BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS moved for a Return of the parishes in the county of Somerset, with a population less than 600, which received Government aid for the schools therein. The right rev. Prelate said he was induced to move for this Return in consequence of the statement made the other evening by the noble Duke who presided over the Colonial Department, on the authority of the Report of the Education Commissioners. He did not wish to say anything against that Report. On the contrary, he believed it to be a most able one. That Report, however, referred to certain tables which were drawn up by Mr. Stevenson in 1857, founded upon the authority of the Inspector's Reports in 1856. In that Report he found it stated that there were 71 schools in the county of Somerset under registered or certificated teachers. He had, however, before him a statement fully authenticated, that instead of 71 such schools in that county there were no less than 156. The Report went on to say that there were 282 parishes in the county, with a population of 600 and under, only one of which received Government aid. He had a paper before him, drawn up by Her Majesty's Inspector, which stated that, so far from it being a fact that the number was only 1 in 282 of these small parishes receiving Government aid, the number was really 1 in $9\frac{1}{2}$. He thought that a Report dated so far back as 1856 ought not to have been relied upon. It was also stated that in the county of Dorset the number of schools receiving Government aid was 1 in 17, in Devonshire 1 in 122. Seeing the mistake which had been made in regard to the county of Somerset, he tested the truth as regarded the county of Devon, and he found that the numbers should be 1 in 15. It should, however, be recollected that in many small parishes there were schools established by resident proprietors who neither sought or would receive Government aid. There were also in Somersetshire, a number of very small parishes where the children were educated to a certain point, and were then able to go to neighbouring and larger parishes where there were schools having certificated teachers, and receiving assistance from the Privy Council; and thus these small parishes benefited by Government grants. It was with the view of ascertaining the the real facts of the case he now moved for the Return of which he had given notice.

Moved,—

"That there be laid before the House, Return of the Parishes in the County of Somerset, with a Population of less than 600, which receive Government aid for the Schools therein."

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE assured the right rev. Prelate that in the allusion which he had made to Somerset he had not the slightest intention of throwing any aspersions upon that county. His simple object was to explain why the Commissioners thought that the Privy Council system required some further assistance, and was not as complete as it was generally supposed to be. The inquiry of the Commissioners had extended over two years and a half, and the statistics collected at the commencement of their labours could not be perfectly accurate when they presented their Report; but in the Report it was stated that the Returns had been made two years previously. With regard to Somerset, the figures were made up in 1857; but in the case of three counties, which he quoted, at the close of 1858, the right rev. Prelate had transposed the mode of making the calculation. It was not based on a percentage, but on the number of schools receiving aid in a given number of small parishes. He had inquired at the Privy Council Office what alteration had taken place since the Return he quoted had been made, and he found that in 282 parishes in Somerset, with less than 600 inhabitants, 19 schools were receiving Government aid on the 31st of December, 1860; so that 18 must have been added to the one which was returned in the table and referred to in the Report. He still maintained that there was an enormous deficiency of education in the smaller country parishes. He was aware that there were schools not included in these Returns. Upon many estates schools were supported by landlords, and he had every reason to believe they were well conducted; but it was worthy of consideration whether it was not better to place them under Government inspection. He hoped his explanation would be satisfactory; but if the right rev. Prelate had any wish to have the names of the nineteen schools there would be no objection to give them.

LORD PORTMAN said, that the greatest possible caution should have been exercised by the Privy Council in taking action upon the Report referred to. In Somerset there were a great many small parishes having the farmer and clergyman as the only residents, and no children to go to school; and many parishes where, with excellent schools, no inspector was admitted, because the patrons would not submit to their dictation. The gross number of 282 parishes with less than 600 population was, therefore, capable of a considerable reduction when discussing the general provision made for education in the small parishes of that county. The reason why the landowners in the west of England had been slow to place their schools under Government inspection was that they were very much alarmed at what were called the "management clauses;" but the progress of time has very much lessened their objections, and the regulations have been much mitigated and improved, and he was inclined to think that the time had come when they ought to consider whether Government inspection would not be a very good thing for them. One measure which, no doubt, would very much conduce to more schools being placed under inspection would be for the Government to furnish on a single sheet of paper all the requirements they would exact from those who desired to receive assistance. He must once more protest against the suggestion of the Commissioners to make schools a charge on the county rates nothing could be so injurious to education. He found on inquiry more reasons to doubt the assertions of the Assistant Commissioners who was employed in the western district.

THE BISHOP OF BATH AND WELLS expressed himself satisfied with the noble Duke's explanation.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

House adjourned at a quarter past

SUPPLY—CIVIL [SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £110,098, to complete the sum for the Treasury Chest.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he rose to complain of the manner in which the Government dealt with the Treasury chest. As was known to hon. Members, the amount voted for the Treasury chest formed a fund to meet expenses not otherwise provided for by the Votes of the House. Out of that fund, however, payments had been made for several years past without the knowledge of Parliament, which was contrary to every sound rule of financial policy recognized by this country. Even some of the Native troops in India had been kept up at the expense of the Treasury chest, and the amount which had been laid out, and which had never been refunded, amounted to £118,000. These were matters which required explanation.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he wished to inquire how it was that there had been a loss to the Treasury chest by the exchanges with Hong Kong?

MR. PEEL said, that the commissariat officers abroad drew upon this country for payment of the troops, and generally when specie was sent from this country to places abroad the transaction was attended with profit. Putting the case of China aside, it would be seen by the Estimate that there was a net gain at other stations of £11,000. But in China the dollar was the medium of payment, and the dollar was obliged to be issued to the troops at the rate of 4s. 2d., but as there was an exceptional value attached to the dollar in China, it being in the year 1859-60 equivalent to about 4s. 10d., the rate of exchange was unfavourable to this country to the amount of £101,240. In addition to that a quarter of a million had been more recently sent from this country, and as the dollar was then worth 4s. 5d., there was a loss to the Treasury of £16,860. With reference to what had been stated by the right hon. Baronet (Sir Henry Willoughby), he knew that there were some advances out of the Treasury chest yet to be settled; but the subject had been under the investigation of a Select Committee of that House, and it therefore was unnecessary that he should go into the subject at that time. That Committee, he believed, had reported, but he had not yet seen their Report.

MR. HENLEY inquired what was the amount of the drawing in relation to which there was a loss of over £100,000?

MR. PEEL replied, three quarters of a million.

Vote agreed to, as were also the three following Votes:—

(2.) £5,000, Zambesi Expedition.

(3.) £5,500, to complete the sum for the Niger Expedition.

(4.) £2,000, North-Western Australia Expedition.

(5.) £21,400, Captured Negroes and Liberated Africans.

MR. CAVE called attention to what he considered the extravagant manner which was adopted to carry out what was, no doubt, a very good object. When a vessel of war captured a slaver, she was taken into Sierra Leone or St. Helena. The captured negroes had to be maintained there until a vessel was sent from this country to convey them to the West Indies sometimes for months. He thought the prizes should be sent direct to the West Indies, by which all the expenses they were now put to would be avoided. It had already been decided that when a vessel was taken, as slavers generally were, without papers or colours, she might be dealt with as belonging to no nation, and it could not be said that in any case the negroes exercised any choice in the matter. It was a simple question of economy.

MR. PEELE said, that it was necessary to take the prize to the nearest British island where there was a court to adjudicate upon the capture. In many instances the slaves were not in a condition, when the vessel was seized, to be taken to the distance of the West Indies.

MR. CAVE said, that might be so sometimes; but in many instances the voyage down the Trade winds to the West Indies would be shorter than beating up to Sierra Leone or St. Helena.

Vote agreed to, as was also

(6.) £4,750, Mixed Commissions, Traffic in Slaves.

(7.) Motion made and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £128,143, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of the Consular Establishments Abroad, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. DODSON said, he wished to call attention to the appointment of Consuls at inland towns in Europe. The duties of Consuls were described as of three kinds, "commercial duties," "notarial duties," and "State duties." These duties were more or less in a great measure, if not almost entirely, connected with the affairs of shipping. But when they put Consuls at the inland towns of Europe they were little else than agents for persons who were travelling or for commercial houses at home. If agents, however, were required by commercial houses, they ought to pay for them themselves, and not charge the expense to the State. If such agents were required by the Government to collect statistical or other information, they ought to be called statistical agents or some other name which should not throw dust in the eyes of the country. The Consuls at inland towns in Europe were nine in number. They were at Moscow, Leipsic, Frankfort, Cologne, Ghent, Milan, Seville, Rome, and Warsaw, and only the other day an attempt was made to have one appointed at Pesth. The Committee which had considered the subject under the Administration of the Earl of Derby were of opinion that the consulates at Leipsic, Frankfort, Cologne, Ghent,

Mr. Cave

Seville, were useless, and might well be abolished. Taking the case of Leipsic, for example, he would ask, what was the importance of having a Consul there? The fair was declining, and British goods now found their way by a different route, so that a Consul was less wanted than before. If a Consul was wanted at Leipsic, a Legation at Dresden could not likewise be required. At many places where Consuls were stationed the duty might be transacted by clerks attached to the Embassy, as at Paris. The noble Lord had told them that the greatest economy would be practised in the appointment of Consuls; but he declined to abolish the consulate at Leipsic, and only last autumn a Consul General had been established at Milan at a salary of £800 a year. Since the establishment of the kingdom of Italy a Consul General in that town had become, in his opinion, entirely useless. After being six months in his office that Consul General wrote home that he had no information to give the Government—that he could give no statistics on commercial matters, as all goods came to Milan by way of Genoa, where they paid duty, and it was there the required information could alone be given. In fact, the Consul General referred the Government for information to an article written by the The Times' correspondent at Turin. He hoped also that some information would be given why Consuls were maintained at Moscow, Leipsic, Cologne, and the other places he had named.

MR. W. WILLIAMS complained of the appointment of Vice-Consuls at Venice, Lisbon, and Manilla, as unnecessary, as their offices must be perfect sinecures. Again, there was no necessity for a Vice-Consul at Hamburg. No doubt they carried on an extensive trade with that place, but the duties had hitherto been discharged by a Consul at a salary of £1,500 a year. He found also that there was an addition of £500 a year for a residence for the Consul. Instead of a reduction in the expenditure for Consuls, there had been a large addition, amounting to £5,000 or £6,000 a year. In the United States, with which the country had so large a trade, there were fourteen Consuls, costing £25,000 a year, while in Turkey there were fifty-one, costing £25,000 a year.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, the Committee which sat on the subject had made valuable recommendations, some of which he had endeavoured to carry out. One of the recommendations of the Committee was that allowances should be made to Consuls, and that the fees they received should be paid over to the Treasury. That had been carried out, and in the year 1860 there was remitted to the Treasury a payment in fees of £44,000, and in the year 1861 of £9,000. In consequence allowances had in some instances been given—as at Hamburg, for example, where a Vice-Consul had also been appointed. He had to state generally that he was constantly being importuned to appoint new Consuls in various parts of the world—at Liberia for instance—but his uniform course had been to make no new appointments that were not called for by absolute necessity, and to abolish as far as possible the number now in existence. The hon. Member (Mr. Dodson) thought it was not necessary to have Consuls in the inland towns. But, not to speak of the commercial interests they might have to attend to in those towns, they had political duties, sometimes of an important character, to discharge. At the same time wherever it was thought practicable these consulships would be abolished. It was not intended, for example, to appoint any new Consul at Ghent, and at Paris the duties of the consulship would in future be done by the librarian attached to the Embassy. The hon. Member seemed to think that the Consul at Leipsic ought not to be retained, and he urged, very truly, that the importance of Leipsic as a commercial mart had very much diminished. Looking at the mere claims of Leipsic, a Consul there would perhaps not be necessary, but there were other grounds on which his retention could be advocated; and here he would make a general observation that would apply to many such cases. We had great diplomatic establishments at the various Courts of Europe, by which the relations between our Government and the authorities of those places were kept up. Our diplomatic agents had intercourse with the Ministers for Foreign Affairs connected with the Governments to which they were accredited; but there was a great deal going on in Germany, for example, partly connected with commercial and manufacturing interests and partly connected with political affairs, on which it was desirable to get information, and he found that it was from our consular agents, who were in communication with the middle and other classes of society, that much of this information could be obtained. Much valuable information was from time to time given to the Foreign Office from that source. There were at that moment important questions pending with regard to trade and commerce between France and the Zollverein. The German manufacturers complained that, owing to our commercial treaty with France last year, they were placed at a great disadvantage with regard to the introduction of their manufactures into France, and on that point there was a good deal of discussion going on in Germany. Now, it was important that we should know what was going on with regard to the question. It was our interest to see that our manufacturers were not placed at a disadvantage, and, therefore, any information on the subject that could be communicated to the Foreign Office was useful. With regard to Cologne, a Consul was, perhaps, not of much use there, in so far as trade was concerned; but it was an important central point for conveying messages to different parts of Germany. The attendance of a Consul at Moscow was necessary, in order that our Ambassador at St. Petersburg might be furnished with information of the transactions that take place in Central Russia. At Warsaw the Consul was a military officer, whose services it was important to retain. The Russian Government had never made any objection to our having that officer there, owing, he believed, to the judicious appointments that had always been made. With regard to Milan, he would not say that it was necessary to continue a Consul permanently there. At the same time so great a change had taken place in the affairs of Italy that it was very important we should in the meantime have as much information as possible as to the effect produced by that change. The importance of Lombardy was such that he thought it desirable to have a Consul at Milan to give all the information that might be required, but it was not intended that the appointment should be a permanent one. He had even been pressed to appoint a Consul at Florence, which he did not agree to. The Consul at Seville was not necessary, and the office should be abolished on a vacancy occurring. There were other exceptional cases in which it was thought proper to continue for the present the consular establishments now existing, but these would from time to time be abolished. He could not, however, hold out the expectation that any great reduction of expenditure could be effected; he hoped a reduction would, in course of time, take place, but he did not suppose that it would be very large. With regard to Turkey, he would make this general observation, that all the Powers of Europe had Consuls in numerous places throughout that empire, and that those Consuls exercised political functions to a very great extent. He lamented that the system had gone so far as it had done, but it would be plainly impolitic to leave British interests in those places unprotected, and to have the complaint made that French and Russian and German subjects were protected, but that there was no official to look after the interests of British subjects. If there was to be any change of the system it must be a gradual one, but he hoped it would be made through the increased efficiency and purity of the Turkish Administration, which would render the presence of so many foreign Consuls unnecessary in Turkey.

MR. WHITE said, that he was astonished at the confession made by the noble Lord that our diplomatic agents abroad could not get the information that was desirable from the commercial classes, and that it was necessary to have recourse to Consuls for that purpose. This was a very humiliating confession for a Minister to make, though he could not altogether share in the opinion which it implied, for he was bound to say that some of the most valuable Reports on commercial matters ever published came from aristocratic members of the diplomatic body. As an instance he would refer to the Report on wines by Lord Chelsea. Neither did the justification which had been offered for the maintenance of consulates in the inland towns of Germany appear to him satisfactory. He begged, on the part of the mercantile community, to repudiate the assertion that mercantile men derived benefit from the consular Reports from the interior of Germany—mercantile men were too much alive to their own interests to be dependent upon such information. Nothing could be more absurd than the maintenance of a consulate at Leipsic. Germany, in his opinion, would furnish a field for the diminution not only of the Consular but of the Ambassadorial Service.

LORD HARRY VANE said, that he did not agree with the hon. Member for Brighton that the consulates ought to be abolished in the inland towns of Germany. Information of a valuable character was continually received through their instru-mentality; and without their aid the Government would be often ignorant of important facts necessary to guide their judgment and influence their action. He did not think that any great economy could be effected in the reduction of the Consular Service, but at the same time they should be on their guard against any large increase in those establishments.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he trusted nothing would induce the noble Lord to discontinue the Consular Establishments in the inland towns of the Zollverein. The commercial interests of the country were immensely affected by the negotiations which were now going on between France and the Zollverein, and it was of the highest importance that they should be carefully attended to. He trusted that the result would be the same as that to which he had lately called attention in the case of Belgium, and that our manufactures would be placed in as advantageous a position as those of France.

MR. FREELAND thought that the Committee were much indebted to his hon. Friend the Member for Sussex for having directed their attention to the Consular Service. He was glad that his hon. Friend had not proposed at present any reduction in the Consular Establishment in the Levant. Still, that was a part of the world in which our Consuls were very numerous, and in which Consular interference was regarded with peculiar jealousy. We had sixty-two Consuls in the Levant, and others in Tripoli and Egypt. He hoped, however, that the new Sultan by his reforms and by the introduction of better laws, would render Consular interposition less necessary, and that ultimately the number of Consuls might be reduced. He was sorry that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had not been able to give them more satisfactory reasons for the appointment of a Consul at Leipsic. He thought that our diplomatic staff at Dresden might manage to do all that we required in those parts. There was one point which had not been alluded to, and that was the permission given to some Consuls to trade, which he thought objectionable. No fixed rule appeared to be adopted. At St. Petersburg, where there was much business, the English Consul was allowed to trade, but not at Odessa, where the public business was less. So, too, at Trieste, where there was much business, the Consul was allowed to trade; but not at Venice, where there was less business.

Lord John Russell

He thought that no Consul ought to be allowed to engage in trading operations. The business of a Consul was to facilitate commercial intercourse, and to supply for the benefit of the country appointing him the earliest information on commercial matters. If, however, he were a trader, he might have a private interest in keeping back that information for his own advantage. A trading Consul, too, was more open to suspicion, and less likely than one not engaged in trade to get reliable information. He thought that the employment of foreigners as Consuls was objectionable, and that trained and educated Englishmen should be preferred. He hoped that the Government would look well to the consular establishment, and that ultimately they might reduce the number of Consuls without impairing the efficiency of the service.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought that hon. Gentlemen had scarcely made themselves acquainted with the recommendations of the Committee upon the consular service. It was quite impossible to rearrange a whole establishment such as that which they had in the various countries abroad. If, for instance, a man had received his appointment years ago with liberty to trade, if that liberty was taken away, something must be given to compensate him for the loss. The result of that short discussion convinced him that some of those who had engaged in it had not watched the course of the Foreign Office for some years; for its policy of late, whether the Earl of Clarendon, the Earl of Malmesbury, or the noble Lord opposite had been at its head, had been marked by a desire to sweep away every unnecessary appointment in the consular service. The number of appointments abolished within the last ten or twenty years would surprise any hon. Member who would call for a return. The House, however, would entertain a wrong impression if it supposed that the sweeping away of all unnecessary consulates necessarily implied any large reduction in the Estimates. The great increase in the cost of living that had taken place of late years in every part of the world had rendered the consular service one of the worst paid that could be named, and in some cases men of education had found it impossible to discharge the duties required of them without falling into debt. There could be no worse principle followed than that of underpaying their public servants, as it had the effect of excluding those who were not possessed of ample means and admitting only those who had. He was afraid that, notwithstanding the sanguine expectations of the noble Lord, the expense of our consular establishments would rather be increased than otherwise.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he agreed with the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Forster) as to the importance of maintaining Consuls for the purpose of transmitting statistics upon commercial matters. Leipsic, being a central place, appeared to him to be a point from which the commercial transactions of Germany could most readily be watched. It should, however, be a great object with the Foreign Office to observe the changes which were daily taking place in the relative importance of towns, owing to railway and other causes, and to make the necessary alterations in the service which those changes might require.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, he was much afraid that the maintenance of Consuls at Leipsic and other similar places in Germany would not affect the object which the hon. Member for Bradford had in view—the maintenance of our commercial interests. He objected strongly to the appointment of a Consul at Réunion, where our trade was very insignificant. He also objected to a Consul at Frankfort, and he should, therefore, move for a reduction of the Vote by £2,300, being the sum appropriated for Consuls at Réunion, Frankfort, and other places.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £125,843, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of the Consular Establishments Abroad, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

CAPTAIN JERVIS observed that it was very difficult for a diplomatic agent to obtain that commercial information which, in many cases, it was very essential the country should have. Nor had they the same opportunities of gaining that intimate knowledge of the commercial feelings of a people which Consuls had. He expressed his conviction that the noble Lord in two late appointments at Leipsic and Japan had been influenced solely by a desire to benefit the public service.

MR. TURNER said, he should vote against the Amendment. He did not think it desirable that economy in the matter should be carried to too great an extent, and he did not think it would be prudent to put an end to the consulates to which he referred. He did not think Consuls should be prevented from trading, unless they were paid such salaries as would support them creditably without it. At the present moment it was of the utmost importance that we should have consular agents in every part of Germany.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that there were two points on which he felt bound to give some explanation. One had been raised by the hon. Member for Truro (Mr. A. Smith) with regard to the appointment of a Consul at Réunion. He would admit that as regards the trade between the country and Réunion, it would be quite unnecessary to appoint a Consul. He was afraid, however, that the hon. Member had not attended to what had been going on recently, especially with reference to a decree of the Emperor of the French, or he would not have called in question the propriety of appointing a Consul for Réunion. The system of contracts by which the French colonists procured labourers from Africa; it was found tended to produce great abuses in the interior and on the coast of Africa, and the result was the late decree of the Emperor of the French on the subject. There had been a great many communications between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of France on the subject, the result of which was that there should be extended to Réunion the same advantages that were enjoyed by the Mauritius—namely, that coolies who were engaged as labourers should be permitted to go to Réunion on the same terms on which they were sent to the Mauritius. But at the Mauritius there was a proper instituted authority to see that no abuses took place, and the Government of India naturally wished that at Réunion the interests of the coolies should be protected in the same way, and that their contracts should be fairly carried out, and that they should have liberty to return home when the period of their contracts expired, or in the event of the terms to which they agreed not being fulfilled. The course which appeared to Her Majesty's Government the best to secure those objects was that there should be a British Consul at Réunion to whom the coolies might make known any complaints that they might have to make. It was for the purposes of humanity that the Consul was appointed, and he thought they might congratulate themselves upon having arranged a convention of that nature with the French Government. An hon. Gentleman had asked what was the principle upon which they proceeded in saying that certain Consuls should be allowed to trade and others should not. The general principle was a very simple one. It was supposed that where there was a considerable amount of British trade it justified the appointment of a Consul, at a salary that would enable him to live in the place. Where, however, there was very little trade, the question was whether they should appoint a Consul who should be allowed to trade, or have no Consul at all? For instance, if he were to propose to that House that in every place where they had a Consul there should be a salary attached that would enable the person to live without trade, the increase of the consular estimates would be very great. The Government, therefore, laid it down as a rule that where there was sufficient trade to support a Consul he should not be allowed to trade, but where the amount of trade was not considerable there should be a Consul appointed at a small salary who should be allowed to trade. There was at present a Consul at Frankfort, but whenever it should be vacant it was intended that no new Consul should be appointed.

MR. G. W. HOPE remarked that he should support the appointment of a Consul at Réunion as necessary for the security of the coolies.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that as the coolies were sent from India for the advancement of French interests in Réunion, he did not think the people of this country ought to be saddled with the cost of looking after them. He would not, however, divide the Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

(8.) £64,646, Establishments in China, Japan, and Siam.

COLONEL SYKES complained of the disparity of the allowances for the diplomatic services in China and at Japan. In China, where the work of the embassy might be regarded as very small, in consequence of the recent treaty, the allowance was £8,500, with a numerous staff, while at Japan, where the duty was one of great difficulty and risk, the allowance was only £2,500, and the appointment only that of a Secretary of Legation. He recommended a general revision of the whole of the Diplomatic and Consular Establishments in China.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he could only say that, in fixing the comparative amounts proposed to be taken for China and Japan, regard had been had to the numbers, size, and importance of the two places, rather than to the merits of the individual. He was happy to say that accounts had been received on the previous day from Mr. Bruce, at Peking, of a most satisfactory nature. He stated that the officers of our mission at that city were received and treated there without any of that strangeness and wonder which had hitherto been exhibited, and there was every prospect that the commercial relations of this country with China would be established on a better footing than they had ever been before.

In reply to Mr. WHITE,

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he was responsible for the appointment of Mr. Oliphant. He (Lord John Russell) had formed his judgment of Mr. Oliphant, not from any private knowledge of him, but entirely from the accounts he received at different times from Lord Elgin in regard to his qualifications; and his published works showed him to be a man of no common talent and ability.

Vote agreed to, as was also

(9.) £30,000, to complete the sum for Ministers at Foreign Courts).

(10.) Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum, not exceeding £40,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Special Missions, Diplomatic Outfits, and Conveyance of Colonial Officers and others, to the 31st day of March, 1862.”

MR. W. WILLIAMS drew attention to the expenditure under this head, and said that he could not conceive what we wanted with seven Diplomatic Establishments in Germany.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would ask for an explanation of the large charge for brokerage.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that it very often happened that information which was not given at Vienna or Berlin was obtained at the minor courts. They were all separate and independent States, in friendly relations with this country, and it was a great advantage to keep up the missions at these Courts. The contingent expenses in Turkey had, no doubt, been very large; but that arose from the anomalous state of that country. With regard to the item for commission, he had not the explanation immediately before him, but he had no doubt it arose from the difficulty of obtaining money.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD explained that the charge was mainly occasioned by the difference in the rates of exchange.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that they had paid over £500,000 for the Diplomatic and Consular Service. That was a monstrous expenditure. Yet when anything really important had to be transacted a special agent had to be sent for the purpose. Whether it was a commercial treaty or something to be done at Vienna, an extraordinary minister or agent was appointed. He should move that the Vote be reduced by £20,000.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the Vote was important as it was the introduction of a new principle, having for its object to get rid of the Vote for civil contingencies. The Committee was asked, however, to vote a lump sum, and he wanted to know how the account of the expenditure was to be stated?

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he expected that the Vote was for the payment of expenses already incurred. If not, he thought they should have some explanation of it.

MR. PEEL said, that the Vote had been taken out of the Vote for Civil Service contingencies, on the recommendation of the Committee on Miscellaneous Expenditure. It was impossible to give the precise items of expense which might be incurred, but if the Committee wished, there could be no objection to a statement of the expenditure being prepared at the end of the year. Of course, the Vote for Civil Service contingencies had been reduced by the amount of the Vote.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he thought the explanation unsatisfactory.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to point out that the expenses of the last three years, averaging between £66,000 and £67,000 a year, were printed in the Estimates as a foundation for the present Vote, which was only £50,000. That was curious, as well as satisfactory, unless there should be “a little bill,” showing itself by-and-by in another place.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL pointed out that it would be impossible to give an estimate of the expenditure under this Vote. It was impossible for him to say that a Special Mission would not be necessary in September or November. What had been done in the Estimates, therefore, —namely, taking an average—seemed to him the fairest way of putting the Vote.

With regard to the salaries of the diplomatic body it was true they were scarcely under the control of the House. But there had been hardly any increase in them since they were fixed thirty years ago. He noticed that when the House had taken similar things under its charge they had materially increased.

Motion made, and Question,

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(11.) £60,000, North American Boundary Commission.

MR. W. WILLIAMS observed that the amount was very large, and that he wished for some explanation.

MR. PEEL said, it was incurred for the settlement of the territorial boundary of the possessions of Great Britain and the United States west of the Rocky Mountains, in accordance with the agreed extension on the forty-ninth parallel of latitude. An expedition had been sent out, consisting of Colonel Hawkins and fifty men of the Sappers and Miners. Colonel Hawkins had £1,200 a year, and the men 6s. a day. He believed that the large expenditure had principally been caused by the great cost of provisions and the difficulty of communications. The Treasury had, however, written to Colonel Hawkins to know whether the work had not been carried far enough to allow of the return of the expedition. He understood that two-thirds of the distance had been accomplished.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked, if the right hon. Gentleman could state the entire sum that would be required?

MR. PEEL said, that Colonel Hawkins had expressed his belief that the bulk of the expenditure had been incurred.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that he believed the Commissioners were agreed as to the line they were to draw, but they entertained considerable doubt how far they ought to go to in expense in the erection of permanent works in connection with impassable forests and morasses. The Government could only recommend them to observe the utmost possible economy.

Vote agreed to.

£145,140, to complete the sum for Superannuation and Retired Allowances.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he would submit that barrack-masters, many of whom had been distinguished officers, should be entitled to receive a higher amount of retiring allowances.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought that the claims of those officers should be dealt with by the Secretary of War, and not by the Treasury.

MR. PEEL said, that the retiring allowances of the barrack-masters were in the Army Estimates, and not in the Civil Estimates, and he was not aware that they were under the control of the Treasury.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.
Committee to sit again this day.

OPERATIONS IN CHINA—ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF THANKS.

MR. SPEAKER acquainted the House, that he had this day received from Vice Admiral Sir James Hope, Knight Commander of the Bath, Commander in Chief of Her Majesty's Naval Forces in the East Indies and China; and from Major General Sir John Michel, Knight Commander of the Bath, commanding Her Majesty's Troops in China, the following Letter in respect to the Thanks of this House, which were communicated to the Officers in command of Her Majesty's Naval and Land Forces in China, in obedience to the commands of this House of the 14th day of February last.

Letters read, as follow :—

*" Impêricuse, Hong Kong,
" 24th May, 1861.*

" SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter transmitting the Resolutions of the Honourable the House of Commons conveying their Thanks to the Flag Officers, Officers, Seamen, and Marines belonging to the Naval Force employed in the recent operations in the North of China, and you will be pleased to acquaint the House, that I have ordered the same to be read publicly by the Commanding Officers of the respective Ships of the Squadron, to their Officers and Ships' Companies assembled on the quarter deck.

" I have the honor to be, Sir,
Your most obedient, humble Servant,
J. HOPE,
Vice Admiral and Commander in Chief.

" To the Right Honorable, the Speaker of the House of Commons."

*" Head Quarters, Hong Kong,
" 25 May, 1861.*

" SIR,—I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your Letter, and the accompanying Resolutions of the Honourable the House of Commons, agreed to on the 14th February last.

" Having communicated to the Army in China these Resolutions, whilst returning their thanks, in the name of that Army, I solicit that you will express to the Honourable House the sense entertained by them of the distinguished honor thus conferred.

"I have the honor to be Sir,
Your obedient Servant,
J. MICHAEL, Maj. General,
Comd. H. B. M's. Troops in China.

"To the Right Honorable the Speaker of the Honourable the House of Commons."

TRADE MARKS BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, the President of the Board of Trade, whether he intends to proceed with this Bill?

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that the Trade Marks Bill had given rise to a good deal of discussion, and the measure was not at all likely to be carried during the present Session. The Government were of opinion that some legislation was necessary to prevent the use of forged Trade Marks, but there was great difference of opinion among the traders as to the precise form of the provisions of the Bill. The subject had never been inquired into by a Select Committee of that House; and it had been suggested that the present measure should be withdrawn, and that a Bill should be brought in the first thing next Session, and that it should be referred to a Select Committee in order that all interests might be fairly heard and discussed. He thought, therefore, the proper course to pursue would be to move that the Order for Committing the Bill be now discharged.

Committee put off for three months.

INDIAN MEDICAL OFFICERS.

QUESTION.

MR. BAZLEY said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When his promise to place the Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army upon a perfect footing of equality with Medical Officers of Her Majesty's British Army will be carried into effect; and to inquire the reason why the Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army are deprived of Commissions according to their relative rank, which are granted to Medical Officers of Her Majesty's British Army; and, if it is the intention of Government to adopt any measures to prevent Medical Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Army being superseded by the Medical Officers of Her Majesty's British Army of equal standing in the service?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was not aware of any promise he had made on the subject; but what he had done was that a Queen's warrant was sent out to India, putting these Officers on a footing of perfect equality in point of rank with the other Officers. He apprehended that what his hon. Friend referred to was their being placed below Officers of the Queen's Army of the same standing. That whole subject of the medical service in India had been referred to the consideration of the Governor General, and he was waiting for his noble Friend's opinion.

EDINBURGH POST OFFICE.—QUESTION.

MR. BLACK said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, If he has received any Tender for building the General Post Office at Edinburgh, and if he has any objection to state what has been the cause of the delay in proceeding with the execution of the plan, and if there is any prospect of its being speedily commenced?

MR. COWPER replied that about a fortnight ago he had employed an authorized surveyor to take out quantities and make specifications. When that process was completed tenders would be called for. The delay that had arisen was from a desire to combine handsomeness in building with convenience and economy, and he believed the delay had contributed to both objects.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS.

QUESTION.

MR. COLLINS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, On what day he intends to introduce the usual Continuance Bill relating to the prevention of Corrupt Practices at Elections?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would state on Monday whether it was possible to proceed with the Bill on this subject now on the Paper. If not, it would then be necessary to introduce a Continuance Bill.

STATUES OF BRITISH SOVEREIGNS.

QUESTION.

MR. GREGORY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is true that the four Statues to be erected in the Royal Gallery, for which £3,200 have been voted, are to be the Statues of William IV., George IV., James I., and Charles I.; and, if so, whether such selection is in accordance with the pledge given to the House by the Commissioner of Works, August 3, 1860?

MR. COWPER: Sir, I cannot plead guilty to having been so sanguine as to give what my hon. Friend has called a pledge on such a subject. When a Member of the Government obtains a Vote from Parliament any explanation he may give in reference to that Vote may fairly be considered a pledge, which ought to be rigorously and scrupulously observed. And I trust I shall never be open to the charge of having swerved by one hair's breadth from any pledge that I may give. I must remind my hon. Friend that the case to which he has alluded is the opposite of this. No Vote of money was obtained from the House, and I made no explanation with reference to an expenditure that was not voted. All I did was to explain why I withdrew the Vote, and did not ask the House to come to any decision on the subject. This is a matter that rather concerns my personal reputation, and I may, therefore, be allowed to state a few words in explanation. Last year the Estimates contained an item for a series of statues of British Sovereigns to be placed in various parts of the Palace of Westminster, and reference was made in that item to the Report of the Fine Arts Commission of 1845. The House was rather alarmed at agreeing to this item, for fear of being considered to adopt all the recommendations of that Commission, and of pledging itself to the erection of forty of these statues. That objection on the part of the House was felt to be valid. The Government did not wish to pledge the House to carry into effect the whole scheme of the recommendation of the Fine Arts Commission, and the Vote was withdrawn. It was considered desirable that a portion of the whole number should be selected, and I withdrew the Vote, with the view of considering whether it would be possible that a selection could be made that would be generally acceptable to the House. When the Fine Arts Commission met I called their attention to the subject, and they considered whether such a selection could be made as would be generally acceptable to the House. I never pledged myself that such a selection would be made, but only that I would consider "whether a selection could not be made that would be acceptable to the House." That pledge was redeemed. That selection was considered, and the Commission were of opinion that it was inadmissible. Therefore, I kept my pledge, which was to have a selection considered, for I never was rash enough to pledge myself that a selection would be made that should be generally acceptable to the House. Indeed, I could not have answered for the Commission to that extent. The Fine Arts Commission met. They had first to decide on what principles any selection should be made. Was it to be founded upon the personal qualities of various Sovereigns, or the greatness of the events that occurred during their reigns, or their political tendencies? The personal qualities of the Sovereigns were not, in the opinion of the Commission, the cause of their being represented in this building. The original intention of decorating this House and of encouraging artists could be appropriately attained by statues of Sovereigns, as illustrative of the history of the country. All persons of education, required to know the names of the Sovereigns and the period of their reigns, and it seemed to the Commission of Fine Arts that the right view was not to select any Sovereign who had more admirers than another, but to take them in chronological order as illustrative of the history of the country. This view was taken in the Report of the Fine Arts Commission, which lay upon the Table when this Vote was on the paper. I remember I stated that the view I took was that the Commission had made their selection according to chronological order, and not in regard to the personal qualities of the Sovereigns. The completion of the series was left open to future consideration. The House determined that a certain sum should be given under the direction of the Fine Arts Commission for the erection of statues of four British Sovereigns. The House can in future either increase the number or leave the series incomplete.

MR. GREGORY said, he had another question to put. He would beg to ask, Whether, when the Government the other night refused to give any information as to the names of the Sovereigns selected by the Fine Arts Commission, the right hon. Gentleman had not at the time in his possession the Report of the Fine Arts Commission, which stated that they had given two of these statues to Mr. Theed and two to Mr. Thornycroft; and whether the statues are not those he had mentioned?

Mr. Gregory

MR. COWPER: I had in my possession what every hon Member of this House also had in his possession—the Report of the Commission of Fine Arts, which I now hold in my hand. I thought the House understood that the money would be spent under the direction of the Commission of Fine Arts, and this Report enabled them to judge how far the Commission of Fine Arts had decided upon the statues.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished also to ask the right hon. Gentleman a question. ["Order, order!"] It bore directly upon the question before the House. Was it intended that Cromwell should have a statue?

MR. COWPER: I can only refer the hon. Gentleman to the Report of the Fine Arts Commission. If he will read that Report, and it is not very long, he will know as much about the matter as I do.

OUDE—THE INDIAN ARTILLERY. QUESTION.

MR. TORRENS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether any Reply has been received from the Governor General of India to the fifth paragraph of the Secretary of State's Letter of the 22nd of December, 1860, relating to certain claims on the late State of Oude; and, if not, whether he has any objection peremptorily to call the Governor General's early attention to the subject? He would also beg to ask, whether it is intended to place the Officers of Her Majesty's Indian Artillery Regiments, who are now on Staff and Civil employ, on the seconded list, as is the case with the Officers of the Royal Artillery when so employed?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, no information had yet been received from India on the subject of the hon. Gentleman's first question. With respect to the second, he might state that the Officers of the Indian Artillery now employed on the Staff would be placed in the same position as all the other Officers of the Indian Army—that was to say, they would have the option of rejoining their corps or retaining their present employments. The Officers not on the Staff would be placed the same as other Officers.

THE DUKE OF MODENA—PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I have to ask the favour of the House to grant me their attention for a few moments, while I make an explanation of a statement contained in a speech I delivered some time ago, not so much on my own account as because it concerns the feelings and character of a person of eminent station, and who also has been unfortunate—I mean the late Duke of Modena, now expelled from his dominions. There was a debate in the beginning of the month of March, in which much was stated on the subject of the conduct of the Italian Governments; and it has only been within a few days—the last ten days, I think—that I received a representation from the Marquess of Normanby to the effect that he was prepared to contradict, and wished me to withdraw a certain charge—one of several—and which he regarded as the principal that had been made by me against the administration of the Duke of Modena. Sir, the substance of that charge as I intended to give it, was this—that while the Duke of Modena had refused the benefit of ex post facto mitigations of the criminal law to persons who might have profited by them, he had applied ex post facto aggravations of the penalties awarded by the criminal law to those who had incurred them. The case I quoted in particular was this—that whereas the law of Modena forbade the application of capital punishment to persons under twenty years of age charged with homicide, the Duke of Modena issued an edict altering that law in the case of a certain person named Granaj. Now, in what I said with regard to Granaj I did not intend to convey to the House the meaning that that person was executed. I have no knowledge on the subject. What I intended to convey was that he was brought within the scope of the law awarding capital punishment, but I had no knowledge on the question whether he was executed or not. What I wish to state to the House at present—and that is my explanation—is that I believe that person was not executed, for so far as the evidence in my possession goes, what appears to be the case is that this young person, for so he was described, was sentenced to the galleys for life. I should be extremely sorry if I had said a word that could be construed to mean that the young man was actually executed, because I entirely admit that the most rigorous accuracy ought to be observed in matters of this kind, and in the statement I then made I did no more than quote from evidence in published documents which were accessible to every Member of this House. Sir, the Marquess of Normanby has also expressed a desire that I would withdraw what I regard as the principal part of the charges—namely, that capital punishment was made applicable by the Duke of Modena to young persons charged with homicide through the means of an ex post facto law. I am sorry it is not in my power to withdraw that charge, for although I certainly think that I put on the particular document that I quoted a construction stronger than it necessarily or naturally bore, yet the evidence in support of that charge is abundant, and it is to be found in two pages of the document I quoted. In the month of November, 1857, the Duke of Modena issued a decree establishing in his dominions or capital, I forget which, a state of siege, which, as hon. Gentlemen know, answers the same purpose.

MR. DISRAELI: I rise to order with great regret. I understood the right hon. Gentleman rose to make some statement with respect to some previous expression in a speech which he made in this House. There is no question before the House. The right hon. Gentleman is now getting into matters that probably may lead to controversy, and it would be much more convenient for him to take advantage of this opportunity of giving notice for tomorrow, and then he can enter into any statement he likes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: I have taken this course after consulting authority. I am not about to enter into any argument whatever, but I am simply stating facts which are explanatory as to what has fallen from me on a previous occasion.

MR. DISRAELI: The explanation of the right hon. Gentleman referred to certain documents which he said were in everybody's possession. They are not in my possession, and I understand that the documents are inaccessible, therefore, it is inconvenient for the right hon. Gentleman to found an argumentative statement on documents that are not in our possession. There were many other facts to which we might refer, as, for instance, the right hon. Gentleman referred to an edict, and that might lead to considerable controversy. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that it is with pain I interpose. At the same time I think the House will feel that when explanations are made it is desirable that the question should be fairly entered into.

The Chancellor of the Exchequer

MR. SPEAKER said, that when the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke to him on the subject, he had stated that if the object was simply a matter of personal explanation the course which he had pursued was the most convenient. If, however, the House objected that it might lead to discussion, it would be more convenient to defer the explanation till the next day.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that it had occurred to him that it would be highly irregular to raise a discussion on a speech of his own on the Motion for going into Committee of Supply. He bowed, of course, to the authority of the Speaker, though he was afraid that to adopt the suggestion of the right hon. Member for Bucks would tend considerably to widen the field. He would, however, with the permission of the House, complete the statement on going into Committee of Supply the next day.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for Consideration read.

Amendment in page 1, line 7, to leave out "Judges and"

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, the first Amendment, upon which he should ask the House to offer an opinion, was that which would have the effect of striking out from the Bill the clauses relating to the Chief Judge; and, whether for good or for evil, materially affecting the character and scope of the measure. He proposed to take the sense of the House on this important point, at the very first part of the Bill in reference to which it was possible to raise a debate upon it. The Bill under discussion had been introduced into the House by his predecessor in office, who had, since, received at the hands of his Sovereign the highest distinction of his profession, and who was then discharging the exalted functions of his new position to the great advantage and satisfaction of the country. It was a measure differing essentially from that which had been brought forward in the previous Session, which had for its end the consolidation of the whole law relating to Bankruptcy and Insolvency; whereas the Bill of the present Session was simply directed to the object of so amending the existing law, as to make it more conformable to the wishes and wants of the community. Having passed through the House of Commons with singular unani-mity—only one or two divisions, he believed, having been taken upon its provisions—it was introduced into the Upper House; and he was confident there was scarcely a lawyer, or a representative of the views of the mercantile world, who did not believe that the Bill as it then stood effected great amendments in our bankrupt law; while it would, if passed in that shape, have given, he felt assured, the utmost satisfaction to the great majority of the public. The measure, however, had been materially altered in its passage through the House of Lords, and it was with the Amendments there introduced into it that he was about to deal. Those Amendments were several; but it was to two of them, that which related to the office of a Chief Judge, and that which referred to the creditors' assignees, that he desired in a special manner to invite attention. To the former he would for the present confine his observations. Hon. Members were aware that clauses providing for the appointment of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy, equal in station to his brethren in Westminster Hall, defining his duties, and settling the amount of his salary, were embodied in the Bill as it went up to the other House of Parliament. Those clauses, however, that House had thought proper to strike out; on the ground, he believed, that if passed into a law they would saddle the country—for the salary of the new Judge was to be paid out of the Consolidated Fund—with an expensive functionary, for whom no duties adequate to his station and salary would remain to be discharged. Now, his own opinion was that the Bill, deprived of those clauses would be—he would not say absolutely useless, but devoid of a machinery which was essential to its satisfactory working; while he was strongly of opinion that there was no good foundation for the assumption, that the new Judge would not find, in the performance of the duties of his office, as much work as the most competent and able man could satisfactorily discharge. In dealing with the point in the House of Lords, reference had been made to the appellate jurisdiction which the Bill proposed to confer on the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy; and it was said, in support of the views of those who objected to the creation of a Chief Judge, that the Lords Justices, who constituted at present the Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy, had been occupied, during the whole of the last year, only fifteen days in disposing of the business which came before them in that capacity, while the number of appeals was only forty-five. From those facts the inference was drawn that, under the present Bill, no larger amount of appellate business would have to be dealt with, and that the Chief Judge would, therefore, have very little to do in that respect. But nothing could be more fallacious than such a view of the case. It was very easy to keep down the number of appeals. If they made the appellate tribunal sufficiently costly, and if they interposed a sufficient amount of delay in the hearing of cases on appeal, they might keep the number of appeals within very moderate limits. He thought, however, that the House would not think of keeping down the number of appeals by having recourse either to costliness or to delay. There could be no doubt that the present Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy was both costly and dilatory. Somewhere about £60 was either the smallest or the average expense, which must be incurred in carrying an appeal before the Lords Justices; and, considering that the Lords Justices, although appellate Judges in Bankruptcy, had very extensive and important judicial functions of another class to discharge, it could not be expected that they would at once and summarily address themselves to appeals in bankruptcy, to the neglect of their more ordinary business. It was to be expected, therefore, that time, more or less considerable, must elapse before an appeal could be brought on for hearing; and he was informed by those who were practically conversant with the matter that, as an ordinary occurrence, months elapsed between the lodging of the complaint against the decision appealed against, and the final adjudication by the Lords Justices. But a great part of the business of the Chief Judge would consist of appeals: and the whole of his business would be bankruptcy business. There would be nothing, as in the case of the present appellate court, to delay the hearing of appeals: and he had no hesitation in saying that a slight glance at the Bill would satisfy any one that, in future, appeals in bankruptcy would be not only without delay, but also without unnecessary expense. There was another important observation on this point. It would be admitted that the number of appeals must bear some proportion to the gross number of cases brought before the various tribunals from which the appeal lay; and he thought he could satisfy the House that the general business in bankruptcy, out of which the appeals must proceed, would in future be largely increased. In the first place, a portion of the Bill with which no fault was found in the other House was directed to putting an end to the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, by abolishing the distinction between trader and non-trader. The effect of that would be that the business affecting insolvent debtors, which had heretofore been transacted by the Insolvency Court, would be transferred to the Court of Bankruptcy, more than doubling the ordinary number of applications to that Court. In 1860 about 2,820 petitions were filed in the Insolvency Court by imprisoned debtors; and of these 820 were within the exclusive jurisdiction of the court in London, which extended from Norfolk on the one side to Hampshire on the other. These 820 cases would now fall within the jurisdiction of the court of the metropolitan district, over which the Chief Judge was to have a general control. Of the prisoners who appeared in the same year, 833 appeared in the London Court, and 1,883 in the different courts throughout the country; and of the estates which were realized, 129 were realized in the London Court and 119 in the country. The proceeds whereon dividends were declared amounted, in the London Court, to £20,247, and in the County Courts in the country to £15,790. The amount of scheduled debts in the London district was £365,760, and in the County Courts it was £169,845. The debts satisfied by payment or otherwise amounted to £24,431 in the London Court, and to £12,876 in the provinces. These figures made it manifest that the destruction of the Insolvency Court, and the transfer of its jurisdiction to the Court of Bankruptcy, would of necessity lead to a very considerable increase in the business of the latter, the number of insolvencies being very much larger in the course of a year than the number of bankruptcies. In 1860 there were cases of bankruptcy and petitions for private arrangement to the number of 1,336; but the cases of insolvency were more than double that number. The addition to the business of the Court being thus considerable, the number of appeals might be expected very largely to increase. In addition to the business that would arise from the destruction of the Court for the Relief of Insolvent Debtors, a variety of business was provided for the Chief Judge by the Bill, which would find him tolerably sufficient employment. For instance, there was the duty assigned to him of transacting business at chambers, under the 59th section. He had no doubt the result would be a most useful employment of a considerable portion of the Chief Judge's time. Every lawyer was aware how very important was the business transacted by the Judges at chambers. If the Judge were created, it would be found that, apart from his appellate jurisdiction and his business in Court, there would be a great amount of business that might be advantageously disposed of by him at Chambers, and which could not in any other manner be so conveniently despatched; and there was provided by this Bill the means of having recourse to the Chief Judge for his advice, assistance, and control, inexpensive in the last degree to the suitor and the insolvent estate. Clause 61 enabled any party to take the opinion of the Judge on any matter that might arise in the course of the proceedings, or on the result of the proceedings. It would be a great advantage conferred both on debtors and creditors, on the occurrence of any legal difficulty or impediment, to have the opportunity of prompt recourse to a competent tribunal, and to obtain the benefit of a deliberate adjudication from a Judge of distinguished position and character. This, therefore, would be another source of a very considerable addition to the ordinary business of a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy. Again, under Clause 67, the Chief Judge might direct any question of fact to be tried before a special or common jury, and he was to preside over their deliberations. Although, in conducting an estate of any considerable amount through bankruptcy, it was found that questions of legal nicety did from time to time arise, it was equally well known that very often the most important questions of fact also arose, and at present the mode of disposing of them was highly inconvenient. It could not be doubted that it would be of great advantage, with reference to questions of fact, to have an opportunity afforded, at an early stage in the proceedings in bankruptcy, for a competent Judge to summon a jury and preside over their deliberations, and thus be the means at once and for ever, to the satisfaction of all parties, of disposing of such questions. But that was not all. Still further demands would be made on the time of the Chief Judge, for the purpose of determining questions that might arise on deeds of arrangement.

The Attorney General

The number of deeds of arrangement being already exceedingly large, it might be expected that they would still continue to be considerable, and many disputed questions of law or fact, arising out of their doubtful construction or confused language, would necessarily have to be determined. As against the 1,000 bankruptcies in the course of a year no less than 14,900 deeds of arrangement between debtor and creditor were found to be executed. A formidable multiplication of business might, therefore, be anticipated from that source. The Bill required all such deeds of arrangement to be registered, so as to be brought, as it were, under the notice of the Court, whose opinion and direction in respect to them the parties interested would have full opportunities of obtaining. It might be said, indeed, that the Lords had left these provisions practically untouched; but it should be remembered that they had struck out that part of the measure which created that tribunal and that Judge by whom, and by whom alone, these very extensive and novel powers could be beneficially exercised. Nor was that all. There were yet higher functions and duties which it was proposed the chief Judge should perform. Of course it was impossible to make men moral or honest by Act of Parliament. All that could be done was to express disapprobation of certain acts, as being unfair or immoral, or at all events illegal, and then to attach to those acts adequate and appropriate punishments. This course had been followed in the original framing of the Bill; and by it it had been sought to introduce important changes into what he might call the code of commercial morality. In England various acts of delinquency were made misdemeanours and rendered punishable as such, while other acts, less grave indeed, but still highly culpable, would be visited with punishments of considerable severity. It had been originally proposed by the measure, and assented to by the House, that that new and important criminal jurisdiction should be to a great extent vested in the Chief Judge. It was well known that a very large portion of the contested business in bankruptcy arose in connection with the applications for orders of discharge; and a very considerable amount of the cases which found their way, under the existing state of things, into the present Court of Appeal turned upon questions of that description. Having regard, then, to the enlarged and novel jurisdiction which this Bill would create, having regard also to the success, so much to be desired, of the experiment it contemplated for the improvement of the commercial morality of the country, it was of the last importance that the Judge who would be called upon prominently to wield these extensive and stringent powers should be a Judge of the highest rank and competency. His authority was one which, unhappily, they must expect would be frequently invoked; and that authority, without intending any reproach whatever to the present Commissioners in Bankruptcy—could not be safely confided, except to an officer of the first judicial station and attainments. It was of great importance to secure uniformity of decision, and this would be accomplished by the appointment of a Chief Judge. He believed that, as far as might be among lawyers, there was unanimity among the members of his own profession on the clause providing that there should be a Chief Judge; and, without any disrespect to those hon. Members of the House who did not belong to the legal profession, he must be excused for saying that the subject was better understood by those who were lawyers than by hon. Gentlemen whose habits and associations were commercial. At the same time there appeared to be a very general concurrence on the part of the mercantile community in favour of that provision of the Bill being restored. A petition on the subject had been, within the previous few days, presented to that House by one of the hon. Members of the City of London. The signatures to that petition were great in number, and included the names of bankers and merchants of the highest eminence in this, the commercial metropolis of the world. The petition had 200 signatures attached to it, and of these twenty-six were the signatures of banking firms in the Metropolis; the remaining 174 were those of merchants whose names were a guarantee that they were fully competent to understand the provisions of the Bill. The petition stated that since the Bill had left that House several of the most valuable portions of it had been removed. It then went on to pray that provision might be made for several amendments in the law; and it especially prayed for the appointment of the Chief Judge, stating—decisions, thereby involving great uncertainty, while the only appellate jurisdiction,—namely, that of the Lords Justices, was one of a most expensive character."

He believed that there was no good foundation for the presumption on which the clause for the appointment of the Chief Judge had been struck out in the other House. The argument mainly relied on was that there would be but scant employment for a Chief Judge; but, as under this Bill every County Court would be a Court of Bankruptcy, and as there were about sixty County Court Judges who heard cases at some 400 or 500 places, if there was only one appeal in each year from each of the County Courts, the Chief Judge would not be left in want of occupation; were he to hear appeals only. Believing, on the whole, that the Bill would not work satisfactorily if there was not a Chief Judge, he ventured to move that the House disagree to the Amendment of the Lords relative to a Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House doth disagree with the Lords in the said Amendment."

MR. BOVILL said, that, if there was that great unanimity of the lawyers and of the mercantile community in favour of the appointment of a Chief Judge which the Attorney General seemed to suppose, the hon. and learned Gentleman would have no difficulty in procuring the restoration of the clause. He could, however, assure his hon. and learned Friend that there were lawyers both in and out of that House of some distinction who entertained an opinion on the subject exactly contrary to that which he had just expressed. There were lawyers of great eminence in the country who had pronounced an all but unanimous opinion in condemnation of the clause which his hon. and learned Friend so strongly supported, for when this question was under discussion in the Select Committee of the House of Lords there were present:—the late Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, Lord St. Leonards, Lord Wensleydale, Lord Chelmsford, and Lord Kingsdown—no mean authorities on a question of judicial appointments, no mean exponents of the opinion of the most eminent lawyers of the day—and, if he was rightly informed, the omission of the clause for the Chief Judge was proposed by Lord Cranworth, and agreed to by the other noble and learned Lords, the late Lord Chancellor being the only dissentient. That was the unanimity that prevailed among those who had no interest except in the due administration of justice. His hon. and learned Friend was not more fortunate in regard to the opinions of the mercantile community. On the Committee to which he had referred there was one name that stood high as an authority among the commercial classes—he meant Lord Overstone—and the rejection of the clause appointing a Chief Judge met with the approbation of Lord Overstone. Indeed, among all the Members of that Committee, including noble and learned Lords of all sides in politics, there was an unanimity of opinion for the rejection of this clause, with the exception of the Lord Chancellor. But his hon. and learned Friend referred to a memorial which had been addressed to the House by a body of merchants in the City of London, who objected to the present system, and preferred a Chief Judge because of the expense attending the present system of appeals. But the expense of the appeals had no reference to the question at issue, for nothing would be more easy than to transfer the simple and inexpensive mode of appeal provided in the Bill to the present system of appeals to the Lords Justices. These petitioners had evidently been misled on the supposed difference of the expense. Other opinions altogether in favour of striking out the Chief Judge clause had been expressed by the mercantile community. The Liverpool Chamber of Commerce had carefully considered the matter, and he would refer the House to the petition which his hon. Friend the Member for Liverpool had presented to-night from them. They objected to certain alterations that had been made by the Lords, but they did not object to the striking out of the clause for appointing a Chief Judge. There was also an important petition from Manchester, signed by forty-eight of the principal firms in that city. They not only did not object, but they stated their opinion that the appointment of a Chief Judge would be an useless expenditure of the public money, as the Lords Justices disposed of the appeals in a perfectly satisfactory manner, and they had ample time at their disposal for the purpose. There was also a standing Committee representing various chambers of commerce—he would not read all the names, but the list comprised those of Belfast, Birmingham, Bristol, Glasgow, Leeds, Hull, and Sheffield, besides the comparatively minor towns of Wolverhampton, Coventry, and other places; they stated certain objections to the Lords' Amendments, but they did not object to the rejection of the Chief Judge. He had listened with great attention to what he might call the laboured exposition which his hon. and learned Friend had given of the duties which the Chief Judge would have to perform. But his hon. and learned Friend forgot that there was another important body beside the Judge. There were the Commissioners in Bankruptcy, and when his hon. and learned Friend argued that the House of Lords had struck out the clause relative to the Judge, and that there was now no one able to exercise jurisdiction in regard to these deeds of arrangement, he was greatly mistaken. The clause set forth that "the Court" might do such and such things. That Court existed and exercised its functions by the Commissioners of the Court. What was the origin of the appointment of this Judge? In the Session of 1860 a Bankruptcy Bill was introduced as a measure of consolidation. On that occasion it was proposed to appoint a Judge, but to abolish the Commissioners; while the objection to the present measure was that it kept both the Judge and the Commissioners to perform their functions at the double expense to the country. All the arguments used by his hon. and learned Friend as to the duties of the Judge and the extent of his business were addressed to the Legislature in 1831, when Lord Brougham proposed to pass his great Bill appointing permanent Commissioners and a superior Court of Bankruptcy, to consist of four Judges. It was then asserted that it was necessary to have a Court so constituted as to command respect. It was said then, as it was said now, that the business was so large that it was necessary to have a new court. There were, then, to be Commissioners and a superior Court of appeal, consisting, not as was now proposed, of a single Judge, but of a regular court of four Judges, in order that their decisions might command the respect of the country. The experiment was tried, and the four Judges were appointed; but in the course of a few years several of the Judges were pensioned off, a single Judge was found sufficient to do the whole work, and soon afterwards the single Judge was abolished also. The Commissioners were found to perform their duties so satisfactorily—the appeals from their judgments were so few—that from sheer want of business the Court was actually and entirely abolished. But if a Court of Appeal was necessary why need they have recourse to a new court? The Legislature had already selected for its Court of Appeal one of the best courts that could be provided—a court that was presided over by two of the ablest lawyers in the country—who had ample time, opportunity, and ability to decide all cases that came before them—he referred to the Lords Justices, who were now constituted the Court of Appeal in Bankruptcy. Was there any one bold enough to say that that was not a satisfactory Court of Appeal? Had there been a single complaint as to the mode in which the appeal business had been administered by the Lords Justices, or had they delayed the decision in any cases that had come before them? Why, the appeal business had given them fifteen days' occupation out of the whole year, and the number of appeals had been forty-two. Did that show any ground why a new Judge should be constituted? Did his hon. and learned Friend know the position of some of the Courts of Chancery? Did he know that some of the Vice-Chancellors and the Master of the Rolls had sometimes to close their Courts for want of business? Did he know that the Vice-Chancellors had the power to act as Judges of the Court if necessary? The fact was that there was abundance of judicial power to deal with these cases. If they wanted a new Judge, let them give an additional Judge to those Common Law Courts which were so overwhelmed with arrears that two Courts would scarcely be sufficient to perform the duties now thrown upon one. The Government were now proposing to put the country to the expense of £5,000 for the Judge, together with the salary of the registrar of the Judge, in order to perform those duties which up to the present moment had been amply and satisfactorily performed by the tribunal of the Lords Justices. But, putting the Lords Justices aside for the moment, he would ask this question—what opinion would be entertained throughout the country of the decision of any gentleman who was raised from the ranks of the Bar, if that decision were given in opposition to the judgment of such men as Mr. Commissioner Holroyd, for instance, who had acted for the last thirty years in his capacity of Commissioner in Bankruptcy, and who had made the study of that branch of the profession the business of his life? Would such an opinion command the respect of the country?

Then his hon. and learned Friend went very laboriously through a vast mass of duties which he said the Judge would have to perform. He would not attempt to follow him through them all. He would content himself with one or two instances. He would remind the House that the Bill as it went to the House of Lords not only provided for an appeal from the Commissioners to this new Judge, but further, for an appeal from the Judge to the Lords Justices. So that if he differed both from the Commissioners and from the Lords Justices he would have no power of control, for the Lords Justices would overrule his decision. His appointment would be useless at the best, for if he agreed in opinion with the Commissioners his judgment would add no weight; if he disagreed, and his judgment was appealed against—as in such a case it would surely be—his interposition would only add to the expence and delay. The scheme of the present Bill was founded on the Bill of 1860, and transferred to gentlemen who held the office of registrars the greater part of the business in bankruptcy now transacted by the Commissioners, and he should like to know what the Commissioners would have to do. The 59th Clause of the original Bill provided that the Chief Judge and Commissioners should respectively sit at chambers, and what the House of Lords said was that if the Commissioners were fit for that duty let them perform it without the Chief Judge. His learned Friend had spoken of the probable increase in the number of appeals, and referred to the insolvency jurisdiction and to the number of cases likely to arise from deeds of arrangement. But who could say beforehand that there would be this increased number of appeals? And with respect to the insolvency cases, in a great many instances the assets were very small and insignificant, and the House might depend on it that, however numerous the bankruptcies and insolvencies might be, there would not be found, unless the estates were worth fighting for, any great number of appeals. The House was called on to sanction a new Judge with £5,000 a year, on the mere allegation that there might be an increase of appeals, though in the Divorce Court, where the necessity for further judicial power had been actually felt, the Government did not propose to supply that want. He thought that, in respect to the Bankruptcy Court, it would be ample time to appoint a new

Judge when the necessity for one was by experience rendered manifest. If this increased number of appeals should arise the Lords Justices would be found able to go through them, and, if necessary, they could have the assistance of one or two of the Vice-Chancellors or of the Master of the Rolls. The next matter touched on by his learned Friend had reference to the trials by jury; but it should be borne in mind that the Lords Justices, and the Commissioners also, had power to try by jury, just as much as the Judge; and that many important questions constantly arose out of bankruptcy cases, which the Judge in bankruptcy would have no power to try. Such, for instance, were the cases in which persons, being neither creditors or debtors, and over whom the Bankruptcy Court had no jurisdiction, complained of the seizure of their property, and brought their actions in the ordinary Courts. The advantages of uniformity had been much dwelt on, but they might have both uniformity of decision and sound judgment from the Lords Justices. He contended that the Commissioners in Bankruptcy formed a perfectly fit tribunal for the cases which would come before the Court. Not a word of complaint had been made against them personally, although it had been said that they had no sufficient occupation, and that their duties were for the most part mere routine. However, when any important case requiring decision came on, they were there to hear it, and they had discharged their duties with satisfaction to everybody. It was now proposed to substitute a Court of Appeal, which would be worse than that now existing, composed of the Lords Justices. Moreover, the cost of appealing would be the same, whether the Court consisted of two Judges or of one. He, therefore, submitted to the House that there was no sufficient reason for restoring this clause. The decision of the Lords had been all but unanimous, five ex-Chancellors being of opinion that the appointment of a new Judge was unnecessary. Their opinion was confirmed by the petitions from Manchester and Liverpool, and he trusted that the House would agree to the Lords' Amendments.

Mr. COLLIER said, he did not think that the House would be much influenced in its decision by the opinion of lawyers on either side. The question was whether reasons had been given to induce the House to alter its unanimous opinion on this subject, and he certainly thought, after careful consideration, that no sufficient reasons had been given. The changes proposed in the law could not be carried satisfactorily into operation unless the Court of Bankruptcy were presided over by a superior Judge. It was absolutely necessary that the Court should have a head, or it would break down under the new labours imposed upon it. Even at present the Court was not remarkable for uniformity of decision, or for the order which prevailed there; and under the new jurisdiction it would become confusion worse confounded, unless a Chief Judge were appointed. Parliament was about to enact changes in the law of bankruptcy as important and extensive as those effected in the law of probate and divorce. There those changes had been eminently successful, mainly because they had been carried into effect by a Judge of the first class, who, by the exercise of great judicial ability and great patience and labour, had established a new system harmonious in itself and in harmony with the rest of our jurisprudence. If, however, the administration of the new law of divorce had been intrusted to a set of inferior officials, accustomed only to the old law, and whose decisions differed from each other, there would have been confusion instead of harmony, and instead of public satisfaction murmurs of discontent. The application of the bankrupt law to non-traders might, it was thought, be harsh and injurious, and an attempt had been made to guard against that danger; but the safeguards which the House could invent were comparatively valueless without the most important of all safeguards—the administration of the law by a Judge of the highest ability and learning. He doubted whether, if the House had believed that the law would be administered by Commissioners, they would ever have abolished the distinction between traders and non-traders. He had no wish to speak in disparagement of the Commissioners, but neither their position at the Bar before appointment, nor the mode in which they had transacted their business since, marked them in the estimation of the profession or of the public as first-rate Judges. Their decisions had been notoriously conflicting, and those decisions had never carried any weight or authority in Westminster Hall. After the passing of the Bill most important questions would speedily arise upon the interpretation of the new law, and it was essential that they should be so decided as to prevent future litigation. It was said that the Commissioners had long experience of the old system; but he doubted whether this would be the best possible qualification in the working of the new. They would have to learn and to unlearn much, and the latter was a very difficult process. He was far from saying that they would not be useful under the guidance and superintendence of a first-rate Judge, but it would not be prudent or safe to leave it to them to carry out the great and important changes now effected. Again, it was desirable to appoint a Judge now rather than when confusion should have arisen; to use a sporting figure, there ought to be a first-rate whip to start the new team. With regard to the trials by jury which had been proposed, the Commissioners had never charged a jury in their lives, and some, possibly, had never seen one. The House of Lords, therefore, feeling that it would be improper to confide these functions to the Commissioners, had struck out the trial by jury altogether. It was true that the Lords Justices were empowered to call a jury; but would that provision work? An attempt had lately been made to transplant trial by jury into the Court of Chancery, but the exotic did not flourish there; it withered and died; and he had heard that the last jury-box had been removed from the last Vice Chancellor's Court on the motion of a learned friend of his that it was a nuisance, and ought to be taken away. Much could not be hoped for, then, from trial by jury before the Lords Justices. As to the new criminal jurisdiction created in bankruptcy, and the power of obtaining the opinion of the Court upon the statement of a special case, the Commissioners could not be properly instructed with such functions. Commissioner A might give one opinion on a special case, Commissioner B another; and, if there was a tertium quid, Commissioner C might give a third. The uniformity of decision which would be secured by a first-rate Judge would here be wholly wanting. Then, again, an important jurisdiction would arise—that of determining all disputes under deeds of arrangement. If all these functions were intrusted to the Commissioners, the change in the law, instead of being a success, would turn out a disastrous failure. It had been said, to his surprise, in “another place” that a new Judge would not have enough to do, and that he would only have appeals to occupy him for fifteen days in the year, the appeals before the Lords Justices only occupying that time; but his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had shown conclusively that the number of appeals would double and quadruple under the new system. Increased efficiency in the tribunal would create increased business; and, for his own part, he should not be surprised if the number of appeals increased tenfold. But the new Judge would not only hear appeals; he would have an extensive original jurisdiction. In the first place, he would have to hear all the opposed orders for the discharge of bankrupts within the London district. That business alone would occupy him a great portion of the year, and in such cases it would be very desirable to have uniform decisions. Besides that trials by jury would give an original jurisdiction, which it was most important to encourage. Every tribunal should have the power to deal completely justice between the suitors. It was not right to hand suitors over from one jurisdiction to another, and the Court of Bankruptcy ought itself to determine, as far as it might be, every disputed question which arose in the cases before it. Then there was the criminal jurisdiction, and the opinions upon special cases, besides which the Chief Judge would also have to sit in chambers for the purpose of superintending and controlling the administration of the law. It appeared to him that, in order to secure the beneficial object of the Bill, it was necessary to have a new Judge of the first class, whose time would be fully occupied by the business that would come before him as any Judge in Westminster Hall. Nay, it was probable that in a year or two he would require assistance. He hoped that House would adhere to its original opinion, and if they thought it was right to vote £5,000 a year for the administration of public justice the House of Lords, notwithstanding its new-born zeal to protect the national finances, would not venture to resist an improvement in the administration of the law, which, however unimportant to themselves, materially concerned the great middle class of the country.

MR. MALINS said, he had not, like some of his hon. Friends, changed his opinion upon this subject, and, therefore, thought that a Chief Judge ought to be appointed, and that without such an officer the Bill would be worse than useless. The bankruptcy laws had for a long time worked badly, and there had been a great outcry against the system. In 1856 he called attention to the evils, and he then suggested that the only way by which they could be removed would be to entirely abolish the Commissioners, and to begin with a new system, and appoint a Chief Judge in bankruptcy, with the rank and emoluments of a Judge in Westminster Hall. In the Bill which his noble and learned Friend, the Lord Chancellor, introduced last year, that suggestion was carried out; and it was proposed to abolish the office of the Commissioners, giving them a retiring allowance of full pay, and appointing a Chief Judge. That plan would have cost £10,000 a year for the Commissioners and £5,000 for the Judge. On that occasion no opposition was raised to the appointment of the Chief Judge by the hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill), or the hon. and learned Member for Belfast (Sir Hugh Cairns). The clauses passed the House without a dissentient voice. How was it, then, there had been such a sudden change in the opinions of the hon. and learned Member for Guildford and the hon. and learned Member for Belfast? The hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir FitzRoy Kelly) and himself adhered to their opinions. They were not made of such changeable materials. Nor could the unanimity of opinion of five noble and learned Lords, who had for years withdrawn from the practice of their profession, induce him to depart from conclusions which were founded on his daily experience. He had the utmost respect for the learned Commissioners by whom the law, as it at present stood, was administered, but then he quite concurred with those who said that their decisions did not constitute an authoritative exposition of our commercial law, and it would, he contended, be impossible to secure the services of a person of the requisite judicial weight if only a small salary were given. The same course ought to be adopted with regard to the Court of Bankruptcy that was adopted with regard to the Court of Chancery in 1852. Before that time the Court of Chancery was a disgrace to any civilized community. In 1852 the entire system was changed, and now the Court of Chancery was a credit to the country. He repeated that unless the Court was removed to Westminster Hall, to the other Courts of law, and placed under a Chief Judge, instead of the existing five Commissioners, the Bill would be a failure. He would rather see the Bill withdrawn altogether than assent to an arrangement by which they should continue the Commissioners for the present, and consider hereafter the expediency of appointing a Chief Judge. In two successive years the Bill had passed through the House with the clause appointing a Chief Judge without any opposition, and he was at a loss to understand why it should be opposed by any hon. Member upon that occasion. It was supported, moreover, not only by the merchants and bankers of the city of London, but also by the great mass of mercantile authority throughout the country. The Chief Judge would have plenty to do. As the Bill abolished the Insolvency Court, and transferred its jurisdiction to the Court of Bankruptcy, there would of necessity be many more appeals than heretofore, and from that source alone the Chief Judge would get abundance of employment. It was absurd to suggest that the Vice Chancellors could assist the Lords Justices in hearing appeals in bankruptcy. The Courts of the Vice Chancellors were overwhelmed with business, and neither they nor the Master of the Rolls could undertake any other duties. He thought that the Commissioners ought to have been allowed to retire; but their retention would not interfere with the duties assigned to the Chief Judge, and the Bill provided for the reduction of their number from five to three. For these reasons, and because he believed the Bill would not work without a Chief Judge, he hoped the House would disagree with the Lords' Amendments.

MR. ROLT said, he wished to state, very briefly, the reasons which induced him to think that it would be wise in the House to agree to the Lords' Amendments. Nothing could be more unwise than to tamper year after year with the constitution of the tribunals of the country, and to make changes which those who proposed them represented as not final, which were introduced for a temporary purpose, which were adopted with a view to expediency, and which did not carry into effect the views of their authors. Last Session the Bankruptcy Bill was introduced with a distinct statement by the hon. and learned Attorney General that his object was to place the ordinary and original jurisdiction in bankruptcy, as far as the metropolitan district was concerned, in the hands of a Chief Judge, putting an end to the Commissioners. To that measure there could be no reasonable objection, but to retain the original jurisdiction in bankruptcy with the Commissioners, and at the same time to appoint a Chief Judge was a proposal to which he, for one, could not assent. It was only necessary to refer to the changes which had been made in the constitution of the Court of Bankruptcy to see that it was now proposed to go back to a system which had been already tried and had failed, and to be satisfied that we shall have to tamper again with the constitution of the Court in the course of a few years. What were the changes which had been made during recent years in the constitution of the Court? At the beginning of the reign of William IV. the Court of Bankruptcy was instituted with one chief Judge, three other Judges, six Commissioners in London, and a certain number of Commissioners throughout the country. By the 10th and 11th of the Queen the Court of Review was abolished, and the powers were to be exercised by one of the Vice Chancellors. After that, a Consolidation Act was passed, and the London Commissioners were reduced to four. By the 14th and 15th of the Queen the jurisdiction of the Vice Chancellor in bankruptcy was transferred to the Lords Justices of Appeal. All these various changes had taken place in the constitution of one tribunal, and they were again going back to that system which had been the first in the series of changes. The whole had been a tentative proceeding, and hitherto had not succeeded. The system of a single Judge, not having Commissioners with him, had not yet been tried, and had much to recommend it. He entirely agreed with many of the arguments which had been urged in its favour. The system of bankruptcy might be consolidated, having regard to what was done in the Court of Probate, with great advantage. Instead of having Commissioners all over the country the formal business might be done by registrars with a Chief Judge in London, with whom they might communicate, and the experiment of such a system might judiciously be first tried in the London district. This was the Government scheme of last year. But if they went on tampering with the constitution of the Court, by merely going now backwards and now forwards, there could be no hope of real progress; they never would get at a trial of that system which it was evidently the desire of the Government to promote. It would be far better and wiser to continue the present system a little longer, in order to see what new business would be introduced by the new measure. The extent of that new business, he believed, had been greatly exaggerated by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier). The change was comparatively small and unimportant, as far as the duties of the heads of the Court were concerned. It would not so add to the duties of the Court that it would be impossible it should continue for a reasonable time to see what machinery might be wanted to carry into execution the changes in the law now effected. Nothing could be more easy or natural. There was a tribunal already consisting of Commissioners and a Court of Appeal. As far as the Court of Appeal was concerned every one admitted that it was a competent Court, and since the Government though approving of the abolition of Commissioners were not willing now to press such a measure, the obvious course was to continue for the present the existing judicial machinery. It was a mere hallucination on the part of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to speak as he did of the delays before the Lords Justices. If parties were not ready with their appeals delay must of course intervene; but when parties were ready their cases might be always put on the Bankrupt paper for hearing and be heard within a week. The cases were always put in the paper and disposed of on the second day appointed for hearing, if not on the first. But, said his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General, here was another dreadful abuse, an appeal cost £60, and, therefore, they must have a Chief Judge. There was no logical connection whatever between the two, nor did his hon. and learned Friend say for how much less than £60 he supposed important questions could be brought before an appellate Court for decision. The question was reduced simply to this—Should they when introducing changes in the law of bankruptcy be governed in deciding on the requisite judicial machinery, by the extent to which these changes would introduce new work? Let them, first of all, see how the new work could be disposed of under the existing machinery, and, having ascertained the extent of the new duties, then let them come forward with a measure to constitute the Court once for all, if a reconstitution shall be necessary. But do not let them tamper with the Court on the present occasion, admitting as they must that the alterations is not to be final. Constant appeals to what he or any other Member had said or thought in regard to that measure were wholly beside the question. He had, however, always been disposed to support the original view of the Government for a Chief Judge without Commissioners as an experiment in the London district, and he still believed that when the present measure had been fairly tried, the time would arrive for having a Chief Judge, and for remodelling the constitution of the Commissioners and Registrars.

Mr. CRAWFORD said, the House had hitherto had very much of a legal discussion on this question, and he trusted it would now give him, as the representative of a commercial community which took a great interest in bankruptcy reform, a few moments' attention while he stated the views entertained by his constituents. The hon. and learned Member who spoke last advocated a Micawber-like mode of dealing with the subject, thinking that they should wait a year or two until they saw what might turn up. That would not be a very expedient course. If they waited a year or two, they would be told that the question was settled as lately as 1861, and that it was too soon to interfere with it. His constituents were not favourable to that suggestion. On the contrary, they desired him to state that any alteration of the law of bankruptcy which did not embrace the appointment of a Chief Judge would be wholly unsatisfactory to the mercantile community, and they would far rather the Bill should be altogether lost than passed into law without that provision. There was almost perfect unanimity of opinion on that matter in the City, as indicated by the petition he had recently presented, to which 800 signatures had been appended, and amongst them those of twenty-five of the principal bankers. Sentiments nearly identical to those of his constituents had been expressed, by petition and otherwise, in all other parts of the country, with the single exception of Manchester, and, perhaps, also, of Birmingham. At the late meeting of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, held to discuss this subject, and which arrived at conclusions favourable to the measure as approved by that House, among the principal towns represented were Belfast, Bristol, Coventry, Dundee, Glasgow, Hull, Leeds, Liverpool, Norwich, Wolverhampton, &c. With respect to the opinion of Manchester, he wished to draw attention to certain facts connected with the expression of that opinion. In February last certain mercantile firms in Manchester addressed a memorial to the hon. and learned Attorney General on the question. In April they also addressed a petition to the other House, complaining of the uncertainty, expense, and delay at present attendant on proceedings in bankruptcy, asking for increased facilities for arrangements, and declaring that the standing and character of the Courts ought to be improved, and that uniformity in the administration of the law ought to be secured. But how could such uniformity be secured while the law was administered by five or more different persons? The existing Commissioners were not responsible for the defective state of the law; but the creditors of a bankrupt did not know into whose court they were going; they said that if they only knew that, they could form some idea of how the case was likely to be settled; and, in short, the whole matter was now a perfect lottery. Besides that, there was an utter want of dignity about the existing tribunals, which deprived them of that public respect which ought to be secured for any court of justice. To return to the petitions from Manchester. Attached to the first of those petitions there were 62 signatures; to the second only 48. He had a memorial from a gentleman representing one of the large mercantile bodies at Manchester; and, although that and another body had about 1,500 or 1,600 firms belonging to them, only 48 out of that number prayed that House to agree to the Lords' Amendments. These 48 firms, he understood, represented property to the amount of £14,000,000; but he was assured that £200,000,000 more nearly represented the property held by the 800 firms whose signatures were appended to the petition in favour of the Bill; and he earnestly prayed the House to give due weight to the opinion so forcibly expressed by that petition.

Mr. HORSFALL observed, that he would not have said a word on that occasion had the hon. Gentleman confined his remarks to his own constituents; but the hon. Gentleman had spoken also for Birmingham and Liverpool. And in justice to the hon. Gentleman he must state that he thought he had been somewhat deceived by the circular he had received from the deputation of the Associated Chambers of Commerce. He had himself received a similar circular, and he found, on inquiry, that Liverpool was not represented in it at all. The Chamber of Commerce of Liverpool had spoken for itself; its petition to the House was in reference to one clause only of the Lords' Amendments, the clause which referred to creditors' assignees. As to that clause, the petition affirmed the principle laid down in the Bill, but on the question of the appointment of a Chief Judge it expressed no opinion whatever. On that point he believed that opinions in Liverpool, Manchester, and Birmingham were very much divided. Had he himself felt any doubt on the subject, the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Guildford would have satisfied him that the appointment of a Chief Judge would be neither more nor less than a waste of the public money.

Mr. HADFIELD said, he believed that the trading classes in Manchester were not opposed to a Chief Judge, though there was, no doubt, great division of opinion upon the matter. He had been urged on various occasions by his constituents to support the Bill, and he had acted in accordance with their wish. Still, he thought that no one section of the community ought to decide the question, but the great and disproportionate cost of the distribution of bankrupts' assets under the existing system was an unanswerable argument in favour of the Bill. Of all the plans proposed for the distribution of bankrupts' estates the plan embodied in the Bill was the best. If they were to go on spending 50 per cent of a bankrupt's estate for distributing it, they had better, like the Americans, have no bankruptcy law at all, but let the creditors scramble for it.

Mr. TURNER said, he had felt for some little time, owing to the number of questions which had been addressed to him, as if he were upon the hustings in the face of his constituents. It certainly was not very flattering to the ability of hon. and learned Gentlemen at the other side to hear them all referring to a petition from forty-eight individuals, as if it contained rules which ought to guide the conduct of the House. The forty-eight firms which had signed the petition in question were all of the highest respectability, and doubtless represented, as they stated, £14,000,000 of credit given, though he hoped for their own sake they would never be obliged to collect them in the Bankrupt Court. But he must be excused for saying that such an amount, large as it undoubtedly was, by no means represented the entire wealth of Manchester. In common with the hon. Member for Liverpool he could state that great diversity of opinion existed on the subject among his constituents. For a long time serious complaints had been made of the delay and expense of proceedings in the present Courts of Bankruptcy, and the attention of the Chambers of Commerce had frequently been directed to the fact that but a small percentage of the sums collected under that system found their way into the pockets of the creditors. One of the forty-eight gentlemen to whom reference had been so freely made told him that his objections to the appointment of the Chief Judge would be greatly lessened if that dignitary were really efficient, and if arrangements could be made by which he would go circuit through the different provinces, like the other Judges. He should give his vote in favour of the Bill in its original shape.

Mr. HENLEY said, the debate rendered it evident that diversity of opinion did not merely exist out of doors on the question, for arguments more conflicting and contradictory he had never listened to. He certainly had been surprised at the speech of his hon. Friend the Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford), for, not content with putting forward his own views, he set to work to dissect the opinions of others. That did not show a very great confidence in his own arguments; and, moreover, when central bodies met in London and petitions were presented nearly in the same words, those who were acquainted with the way such things were managed did not attach as much weight to their decision as if the petitions had been the result of spontaneous action. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) said it was most important for the non-traders that there should be an efficient Chief Judge. But the question immediately presented itself who was that Chief Judge to be? Were the judgments of any barrister of twelve years' standing likely to be received with more confidence than those of the Lords Justices? Such a Judge would be an unknown quantity against two good ones; and, as far he was concerned, he should be very willing to trust any interest he might have in the hands of the Lords Justices, who, he believed, formed a very safe tribunal. Then the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) thought the Bill entirely wrong, but it was not possible to understand the force of his reasoning. The hon. and learned Member said that five years ago he had declared that the Commissioners, who had little to do, and did that little badly, ought to be abolished. But now he declared his willingness, not only to retain those Commissioners, but to employ a Chief Judge to assist them. The hon. and learned Member contended that those who had not before opposed the clause were now precluded from doing so. But he maintained that on a subject where such great diversity of opinion existed, both in and out of the House, and where the measure had come down from "another place," supported by such a weight of authority, those hon. Members who previously had no very strong opinion on the subject, but were now forced to look at all the arguments on both sides, might not unreasonably exercise an independent judgment. The strongest argument, however, in favour of the appointment was that of the hon. and learned Attorney General—that he would have plenty to do; and he (Mr. Henley) wished to call the attention of the Attorney General and the hon. Member for Manchester to this point. The Attorney General had argued that it was a mistake to suppose the Chief Judge would have nothing to do, and, referring to the jurisdiction which was to be given to the County Courts, had calculated that if there was one appeal from every place at which a County Court Judge held his sittings they would amount in number to not less than 500 per annum. That must be a great consolation to the country districts, but if there was to be no delay in disposing of these cases they would want more than one Judge. The real question at issue was, had they now sufficient judicial power to dispose of the appellate jurisdiction in bankruptcy? If it was sufficient, all parties were agreed that the existing tribunal was a good one. Until it was tried we could not tell whether it was sufficient or not. If it was found to be insufficient it would be easy to add a Judge, but if a Judge was once appointed he could not be got rid of without a superannuation allowance. That process had been gone through once within thirty years, and those who recollected that occurrence were naturally rather shy of appointing a high judicial officer until it was clear that his services were required. As far as his information went he believed that the existing judicial power was sufficient, and before appointing another Judge he should like to see it tried. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) had referred to the jury trials for the various misdemeanours which were created by the Bill. As the measure left that House the Judge who was to direct the prosecution of the bankrupt was also to preside at his trial. For his own part he approved the change which had been made by the House of Lords, and thought that it was more consistent with justice that a man charged with a crime should be sent to be tried by a perfectly independent tribunal. For these reasons he thought that the alteration which had been made in the Bill was a good one, and should vote in favour of the Amendment of the Lords.

MR. MOFFATT said, the existing system had been weighed in the balance during the last twenty years, and had been found essentially wanting. It was said that insolvency in the country had decreased, but he asserted, without fear of contradiction, that it had enormously increased, and chiefly in consequence of the defective state of the law on the subject. In almost every case of insolvency the party called his creditors together, and offered a larger sum in the pound than they knew they could get through the Court of Bankruptcy; and although they might consider in many instances that it was less than it ought to be, it generally happened that they accepted the offer. Every creditor knew that the moment an estate got into bankruptcy he lost all practical control over the assets of the insolvent. The Commissioners were excellent and worthy men, but the public had not faith in their surveillance and control over the official assignees, and the result was that a very small proportion of the cases of insolvency went into the Bankruptcy Court. Under the Bill as it passed that House he believed there would be a general resort by creditors to the Bankruptcy Court; and for himself, he thought that if they did not introduce a Chief Judge who would obtain the confidence of the mercantile community they had better abandon the Bill altogether.

MR. WALPOLE: I think it is a great misfortune that the debate on this subject should not have been taken in Committee. It is a still greater misfortune that we should now have to argue the question on an Amendment which has been introduced in a Select Committee of the House of Lords, and which has never been fully discussed in either House, instead of considering it in Committee with a view to ascertain whether we have made the best provisions for carrying into effect a new law of great importance. The consequence has been that neither the mind of this nor the other House, nor the mind of the country, has been called to the matter. The question, therefore, is one of first impression, and has never been discussed. Treating it as such, I am bound to look at it without regard to anything which has passed before, since nothing has passed in Parliament before, and to consider whether we really require a new Judge, with a salary for £5,000, to superintend the administration of this law when it is first set on foot. From all I have heard in the course of the debate this appears to be clear, that to introduce the great alterations which you are attempting with regard to the assimilation of Insolvency and Bankruptcy and the practical abolition of imprisonment for debt without a superintending Judge would be very disadvantageous. To that extent, therefore, I am in favour of the measure as originally sent up to the House of Lords. I am bound, however, to ask myself the question which my right hon. Friend has so forcibly put to the House—whether, this measure being purely tentative and experimental, and not a final settlement of this great and difficult question, is it right to saddle the country with the expense of a new Judge, unless we are absolutely certain that a new Judge will be required? My own opinion, unquestionably, is that the necessary superintendence may be obtained in the same way which was once adopted before, of grafting the Judgeship in Bankruptcy on one of the Vice Chancellors for the time being. I think we had better do that in the meantime, and thus secure all the advantages of an able superintending Judge to keep the law uniform, without committing ourselves to a new appointment, which we might afterwards have to recall. Whatever may happen with regard to this particular Motion, the course I shall think it right to take will be clear. If the question should be negatived I shall be content to leave the matter for one year under the superintendence of two of the ablest Judges on the Bench, the Lords Justices of Appeal, trusting that after that experiment you will see whether it is necessary to appoint an independent Judge for the future. If, on the other hand, the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General should be carried, I think it will be very questionable whether, when we come to Clause 3, we ought not to amend it by omitting the words creating a new Judgeship, and inserting words to the effect that one of the Vice Chancellors for the time being shall be the Chief Judge in the Court of Bankruptcy. I am aware that some doubt has been entertained whether an Amendment of that kind can be proposed after the Lords have rejected the clause; but I believe that precedents have been discovered which show that it is in the power of the House to adopt it.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, I entirely agree with my right hon. and learned Friend who has just spoken in thinking that it is very much to be regretted that this subject was not discussed in this House on a former stage by those who are the opponents of the proposition made by the Government. But I cannot admit that the mind either of Parliament or of the country has not been addressed to the principle. All was done which it was possible to do on the part of the Government to impress on the mind of the House that this was an important part of the Bill. Its policy and object were clearly explained by my noble Friend the present Lord Chancellor. Nor was it introduced suddenly. It was contained in several former propositions on the subject, it has been years under discussion, and not a single voice has been seriously raised against it. The mind of the House has been as far addressed to the subject as is possible without opposition from hon. Gentlemen on the other side of the House. Still further from the truth is it that the mind of the country has not been called to the question. For years the country has been knocking at the door of the House, proclaiming the failure of the old system, and demanding a reform. The whole mercantile community were urgent in their demand for a change, and insisted that no time was to be lost. Nay, so urgent were they that they even complained of the unavoidable delay which occurred in giving the measure proper consideration. That demand was not an idle one. It was supported by the remarkable fact that for a series of years the business in bankruptcy had been declining, and that by the side of the system was growing up, in enormous proportions, a substituted system of private arrangements, which withdrew the liquidation of insolvent estates altogether from the cognizance of the law. Such a state of things spoke volumes as to the absolute necessity of reorganization and reform. What was the cause of that state of things? I will appeal to the most unfavourable witnesses we can discover—to those forty-eight Manchester firms whose single voice in the whole mercantile community of the kingdom is now raised in favour of the Lords' Amendments. These firms tell us now that the Lords Justice do the business perfectly, and that no other Judge is required. But on a previous occasion, when these petitioners had to unfold the tale of their grievances and describe the remedy they sought, they complained of the uncertainty of decisions, and submitted that among the great desiderata of a just reform were uniformity of decision and standing, character, and dignity of the Courts. What did that mean? What could it mean, except that there should be a Judge to preside over the administration of this branch of justice, in order to reduce incoherence and inconsistency to order and uniformity? The rest of the mercantile community have taken that view of the matter, and to no point has the attention of the country been more fully directed.

In approaching this subject with a view of repairing the evils of which the petitioners complain, we should endeavour to prune away all the abuses we could discern, and to meet the reasonable wishes of the mercantile community as far as possible. At all events, we should aim at removing any impediments which prevent the whole business of bankruptcy and insolvency from being brought within the scope of one law, and at giving unity, consistency, and authority to the administration of this department of justice. To effect this it is necessary to have a head, a centre, a presidency, a ruling genius to control the operation of the system, and such a head the Government propose in the person of the Chief Judge. To strike him out of the scheme is to reduce it to the same disorder and confusion which you find in the existing arrangements, and which it is your object to put an end to. The way in which this House—I will not say has proceeded, but is asked to proceed, by those who support the Lords' Amendment, is most singular. Last year a Bill was introduced which proposed to abolish the Commissioners, and to put them on pensions, and have a Judge. No one objected to that abolition, or to the Judge, only you would not pension the Commissioners. This year the Government is not departing from that principle, but, deferring to the views of the House, by an arrangement which after all is only of a temporary character, they propose a transition of a more gradual character in lieu of the more abrupt transition provided by the Bill of last year. They do not depart from the principle of authority—from the principle of unanimity; but they say, "Since the House does not like pensions we will retain the Commissioners, and make use of them as long as they will give their services to the public. The transition shall be gradual, but the Commissioners shall no longer be independent units, each revolving in his own orbit, and all utterly ignoring each other. All shall be subordinate under one chief, who shall reduce to order that system of which he is the head." The Bill provides for the reduction of the number of Commissioners as vacancies may happen. Power is taken in the Bill to retain a maximum number of three Commissioners, but the Bill does not stop there, for Clause 23 gives an elastic discretion to reduce the number below that maximum, if it be shown by practice that the business can be conveniently discharged by less than the three; and in order to facilitate the reduction, and to pave the way, if it may be found convenient, to the ultimate abolition of the Commissioners altogether, there is a machinery for employing the registrars in all ministerial, and not properly judicial, business which can be discharged by them. The Bill, therefore, contains within itself the elements of a self-regulated system, which will, in the course of nature and necessary events, bring you to the point to which you would have been brought by the Bill of last year. Last year the House would not have a Judge with the Commissioners pensioned off. Now some hon. Gentlemen will not have a Judge with the Commissioners working till they die off, or until they are by other means gradually reduced. Is that because they like Commissioners? I have not heard that stated. Of course, as regards the Commissioners themselves there is no voice raised against them. The faults with which we are endeavouring to deal are faults of the system, and those learned gentlemen are not to be held responsible for them; but no one has held that it is desirable to maintain the present system of Commissioners. I have not heard a word which would indicate that. I must express my concurrence with my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge, that it is a misfortune that we do not know on what principle the Lords proceeded. I cannot help thinking that this part of the case did not receive the consideration to which it was entitled; and to this we may, in a great measure, attribute the alteration which we now ask the House to remove, and which I venture to think was hastily and unadvisedly introduced. But my right hon. and learned Friend who last addressed the House said that this was an experimental measure, and was accordingly to be treated in an experimental way. I deny it. This is not an experimental measure in any sense but that in which every measure of reform is experimental. In the working every reform may be found to have weak points and strong points; and in that sense every measure of reform is experimental; but in no other sense is the scheme now before the House experimental. It is the result of long and matured consideration. I entirely protest against the notion of dealing with this, the cardinal point in the system, as if we were merely throwing it loose on the world to see how it would work, and then, in the next Session of Parliament introducing another and a different plan. It was not with that view the Government introduced this measure. I believe it was not with that view the mercantile community in general approved it, and I venture to state that it was not with that view it was passed through this House. I have been greatly puzzled by some things which have fallen from those speakers who have upheld this Amendment. They have not said expressly, "We agree with the Lords. We do not like the Judge. We wish for another system." Not at all. There is hardly one of them who, if in a year or two he found himself an occupant of the bench on which I have now the honour to sit, might not say, "I thought all along that the Judge was the right thing, but at the same time I considered it more prudent to wait till some experience had been had under the new Bill." Those hon. Gentlemen seem to bear in mind the maxim of an ancient master of politics as well as of rhetoric, who recommends us always to hate as if we knew that some day we would have occasion to love. Those hon. Gentlemen, if in a few years they find themselves in the position in which we now are, and if they find the country knocking at their doors and saying, "This system won't work without the head which you cut off from it," may reply, "We never seriously doubted that from the beginning, and now that experience has proved that we were right we are willing to appoint a Judge." I venture to say that the present is the time, that the necessity is now as clear as it will be then. We are now dealing with the subject, and I think the country will have a right to cry shame if we do not deal with it in a manner that will give our new system the best chance of success.

The hon. and learned Member for Guildford (Mr. Bovill) says, "What are you doing? You are appointing over again the old Judge in Bankruptcy whom you appointed in 1831, and who worked so ill that you had to abolish him a few years afterwards. You are giving him the same functions." Now, is that a fact? For the argument is good for nothing if it is not the fact. It is not a fact. The functions are as different as any functions can be. I will enumerate very shortly the more important duties of this Judge. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley) seemed to forget some of them. He spoke as if this functionary would have nothing to dispose of but appeals; but this Bill provides for a very large amount of original jurisdiction of a most important character which is to be discharged by this Chief Judge. I will take first what is, perhaps, the most important point—the clause with reference to the discharge of bankrupts, who will hereafter include non-traders and insolvents as well as traders. Every case of a contested discharge falling within the London district will be of necessity referred to and tried by the Chief Judge, and also if the Commissioner who shall have the administration of the case shall find that there are any special circumstances which, though there may be no opposition, appear to form a well-founded objection to an immediate discharge, it will be his duty to report those circumstances, and reserve the question for the determination of the Chief Judge. What is the existing system with respect to certificates? There are five Commissioners, and there may be, and practically there are five different rules as to the principle upon which certificates shall be given. If there is any question more difficult than another it is the question of conduct which arises on granting a certificate. One Commissioner will give a first class certificate in thirteen cases out of which another would give such a certificate in only one. Such is the want of method, unanimity, and uniformity which now prevails. And yet the branch of the administration of justice with which we are now dealing is one on which it is not too much to say commercial morality depends in a very high degree. The object of the bankruptcy law is to give a free and full discharge to any honest bankrupt; and, in order to prevent the operation of that law being a premium on dishonesty, it is necessary that its administration should be very carefully and ably conducted. What more important function can be imagined than that which occupies so considerably the time of the Commissioners at present? And I know that very many of the cases of Bankruptcy which come before the Lords Justices are questions of certificate, which are singularly ill-adapted for appeal, on account of their peculiar nature. This original jurisdiction of a most important character, affecting the reputation of every one brought under it, and the whole commercial morality of the kingdom, is by this Bill brought primarily in contested cases, and in uncontested cases, by the report of the Commissioners to the Chief Judge. The effect of the Lords' Amendment is to throw it back on the five Commissioners, not sitting as a Court, but each applying one-fifth of a principle or one-fifth of a rule, or five different principles and five different rules; so that it will be a toss up, a game of chance, of haphazard, whether a man who has conducted himself in a questionable manner shall get off free, or be punished leniently or severely, if punished at all. If upon any one point it is necessary to concentrate the power of a single mind of high ability, and possessing the confidence of the public, it is upon this point; and this seems to have been entirely lost sight of in the Lords. It seems to have been lost sight of in the debates which have taken place here; and, if anything could add weight to this consideration, it is that you not merely abolish by the present Bill the classification of certificates, but substitute for it a system of penal process. Not only is there a clause which provides for the trial of a bankrupt if he stands accused of any offence against the law as it at present stands, but there is an independent particular enactment against new offences, for which, with his consent, he may be tried by the Chief Judge, according to the proposal of the Government; or by the Commissioners, according to the proposal of the Lords; and, if he do not consent, for which he may be sent to be tried in other courts of the realm. Rules and principles are for the first time embodied, so to say, in the penal laws, by which the conduct of a trader is to be tried and determined in this court : not offences for which he may be tried anywhere else, but mercantile offences, for which he may be tried there, and for which he may be punished expressly on a penal principle, not by qualifying the certificate or for a time suspending protection. The Lords have sent back that clause, leaving that also to each and every one of the five independent Commissioners. But I think the House of Commons will be of opinion that this is a jurisdiction which ought to be intrusted to the hands of a Judge of the highest standing, of the highest character, and of the highest authority, who shall administer justice in a manner calculated to give satisfaction to the people at large.

The other duties are very important, though not so important as this, and I only pause to advert to them for the purpose of correcting the notion that the Lords Justices will do whatever the Chief Judge would have done, and which is left now unprovided for by the Amendments. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General has pointed out the different special matters upon which the attention of the Chief Judge would be employed otherwise than by way of appeal. Under the 61st Clause he was to have particular points of law upon the administration of the estate referred to him. That is not to be done by the Lords Justices. It is now to be done by each of the five Commissioners, who may certify five different ways, and bring the law into greater confusion than at present, instead of giving it greater clearness. The trial of issues is left otherwise. That is to take place before the Lords Justices. But I have not heard my hon. and learned Friends who are acquainted with the administration of justice in the Court of Chancery express an opinion that the Lords Justices are likely to devote much time to the trial of issues of fact with juries. They have shown no disposition, at all events, to avail themselves in other cases of the power to summon juries which they possess, and I do not think that without great interference with their business they could do so. Special cases are also to go to the Commissioners, if there is no Chief Judge. With regard to appeal business, you enlarge the number of courts from which those appeals will come ; and I will here make a few observations to bring clearly under the view of the House the various sources of increased business which seem to be left entirely out of sight when it is supposed that there will be only the same business to discharge as formerly, and that it is sufficient to rely on the same staff. There is the transfer of insolvency in the first place, in which there is no appeal at present. Some hon. Gentlemen seem to think that it works very well. Perhaps they think that you may very well abolish appeals. No doubt if there are no appeals you will not have the trouble of providing for them. But I cannot help thinking that, now you let in the non-traders, and include the whole property of the country, from the highest Peer to the lowest peasant, it will be a startling thing if you contend that no appeal is necessary, or that no appeals may be expected. You must bear in mind that the effect of the non-trader clauses is entirely new, and that previous experience in matters of insolvency cannot be applied either to the number of cases, or the importance of the question, or the amount of the property. Then there are all the composition deeds, amounting, upon an average of ten years, to 10,000 a year. These, in addition to the 1,000 or 1,100 cases of bankruptcy, are all to be swept in and made subject to the jurisdiction of the Court. In every deed you may deal with matter for a whole host of Chancery suits ; and can it be supposed that this will not be a source of important business, for which provision must be made, and with respect to which the appointment of a Chief Judge is essential ? Take into account besides the increase of bankruptcy business in general which must arise from the beneficial effect of these improvements, and the facilities which will be given to the public to come into bankruptcy in one shape or another, and who can possibly doubt that the machinery of the Bill will and must bring under cognizance all the business of insolvency throughout the kingdom ? When these things are considered, surely the policy of having a Chief Judge, as originally proposed, is more than amply justified. Surely I have shown that in striking out the Chief Judge you strike out the regulator of the whole system. The argument against it assumes the failure of the Bill. But why it should fail I do not know. It is a Bill the substantive provisions of which have passed both Houses. If anything causes it to fail it will, undoubtedly, be striking out the regulator. But, unless you assume that the Bill will fail to bring business and to satisfy the wants of the community, it is clear you are strangling it, crippling it, destroying its chance of success, by leaving out those means which are provided to secure a consistent, uniform, dignified, and authoritative administration. I wish the Lords Justices were here to speak for themselves. I am very sure that their Lordships would be surprised to hear that they are to do all which you call on the Chief Judge to do. Not a word which can be said of the manner in which their Lordships have discharged these duties hitherto can exceed their deserts. But their bankruptcy business is of a different character, and has reference to matters of far less importance and magnitude than those which you throw upon the Chief Judge. They have discharged no part of the original jurisdiction in bankruptcy, nor is it proposed to give it to them. But I venture to say, if the increase of business takes place, which it is impossible to doubt will take place, unless the Bill is a total failure, and if there is a proportionate increase of appeals, those appeals will absorb the whole time of the Lords Justices, and turn them into a Court of Bankruptcy. They were not established by Act of Parliament to be a Court of Bankruptcy. They were established to assist the Lord Chancellor, and any attempt to overload them with bankruptcy business will, in truth, be simply destroying the valuable machinery which the Legislature has created for a different purpose, and throwing the business of the Court of Chancery into confusion, merely to avoid giving a head to the Court of Bankruptcy. And I take the liberty of saying one thing, which is consistent with the most profound respect for the Lords Justices personally, and for the manner in which they have discharged their duties:—You never can expect from a Court which has other functions the same efficiency in the particular duty of superintending the general administration of such a system as bankruptcy, as you may expect, and doubtless will find, from a Judge whose office makes it his duty to attend exclusively to that particular thing. Bankruptcy before the Lords Justices is a secondary object, and so must be. When it comes before them in the way of appeals, doubtless they give precisely the same attention to it as they give to other business; but the duty of general superintendence, the duty of being the head of a system, cannot with any prospect of beneficial results be appended to another system entirely alien from bankruptcy. The other proposal made by my right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge is, I take the liberty of saying it, even more objectionable than to rely on the Lords Justices. His proposal is that one Vice Chancellor or the Master of the Rolls shall have united to his present jurisdiction the duty of discharging all the functions which this Bill proposes to throw on the Chief Judge in Bankruptcy.

MR. WALPOLE: I did not propose all the functions as proposed by the original Bill, but as amended by the Lords, which is a totally different thing.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: I understand my right hon. Friend to mean exclusively the appellate functions. To give the appeal business to one Judge in the Court of Chancery would not in the least degree promote either the speedy or efficient administration of the business, while it would most materially interfere with the proper business of the Court of Chancery. So far from adding to the bankruptcy jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery, it would rather be convenient to remove from it a class of business akin to bankruptcy—namely, the winding-up of insolvent joint-stock companies—a species of business which would be better discharged by the Court of Bankruptcy. It is a great mistake to imagine that because in any given year some particular Court for a short time may not be fully occupied, that, therefore, the Court of Chancery has too much strength for its business. It is true that in the early part of this year business was slack in the Rolls' Court; but that was not owing to any permanent cause. The Judge of that Court, a man worthy of the name he bears, who for a long period has discharged his duties in a manner combining perhaps in a degree not exceeded by any other Judge, despatch, accuracy, and safety of decision, transacted the business with such despatch and efficiency, that the incoming business did not equal the outgoing. But such a state of things in a short time tends to alter itself. Nature abhors a vacuum, and this vacuum soon filled itself up. The suitors soon find out where their business will be rapidly transacted; and this state of things very shortly ceased to exist. Nor is it at all consistent with experience that the permanent feeders of the business of the Court of Chancery will so far fall off as to make it probable that one of the Judges who for the last ten years has been fully occupied will hereafter be found to be insufficiently occupied.

Let me ask, in conclusion, whether the House wishes to deal in a merely experimental spirit with this important matter? If a Chief Judge be necessary this is undoubtedly the time to appoint him. When you are launching a new and important reform, which must increase the business, and which must require concentrated administration, that is the time to apply this remedy. No course that I can imagine would be more unwise than to wait till the success of the measure has been imperilled by leaving out the condition under which alone it is likely to have eminent success, and when the public are discontented and the whole matter is at sea again, then to say we will consider whether we cannot patch the system up by appointing this Chief Judge. I find no reason or principle, nor do I find any authority in favour of such a course. But one single mercantile body has said a word in favour of such a proposal, and that body testified against it before it became a matter of political controversy in the House of Lords. The other mercantile bodies are against it. It is clear that the London district is most interested in the matter, and one is not surprised, therefore, to find the London merchants confident in favour of a Chief Judge. I am justified, therefore, in saying that there is no trace of an adverse opinion existing in any part of the country. You have no single reason against the proposal except the authority of those eminent names which in the House of Lords appear to have given their sanction to this Amendment. For those learned persons I entertain so profound a respect that I am not inclined in any way to under-estimate the weight due to them. But when we have their opinions without their reasons, when we are not aware how far the subject was considered by them, or how far they were led to suppose that the opinion of Manchester and Lancashire was adverse to the Government proposal, I cannot think that the mere authority of those eminent names ought to overrule the weight of experience, of principle, and of necessity, and of the long and deliberate consideration which the subject received before the Bill was sent up to the other House of Parliament. This House, at all events, having sanctioned the proposal for reasons which have not yet been answered, would, I think, do very far from well if it were not now to express its adherence to its original decision.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS: Sir, I will begin the very few observations I have to address to the House by welcoming back to our councils the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, the advantage of whose advice we have enjoyed before, and may now congratulate ourselves on again possessing. In order to narrow the discussion as much as possible it will be desirable to consider what the precise question before us is, for I have observed in the debate a tendency to go wide of the point—though certainly not on the part of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just addressed us—and to travel into a general disquisition on the imperfections of the bankruptcy laws. The only question before us on this Motion I take to be this—whether, having already in the London district five Commissioners of bankruptcy with salaries of £2,000 a year, it is wise and expedient, by way of experiment, to add a Chief Judge whose jurisdiction for by far the greater part of the time will be co-ordinate with that of the five Commissioners, and who will, in fact, simply be, so far as the greater part of his duties are concerned, a sixth Commissioner for the London district? The view of the mercantile bodies on this question of a Chief Judge is, of course, of great importance, and I am free to confess that the greatest attention ought to be paid to their opinion on the matter in which, after all, they are the most deeply interested. But most of those who have observed on those expressions of opinion of the mercantile community have fallen into a great error. Take, for instance, the petition from the City of London. They ask that the Lord's Amendment as to a Chief Judge may be disagreed with; but for what reason? They say that there are already five different Commissioners, coming constantly to conflicting decisions, and, therefore, they want a Chief Judge. But did these petitioners know the real state of the case? Were they informed that the very thing to which they object is the very thing which will exist a week after this Bill passes? Were they informed that if this Bill passes without the Lords' Amendment there will be not only five Commissioners, but a Chief Judge in addition—six Commissioners in all, with co-ordinate jurisdiction within the London district, who may, if they please, come to six different decisions—with this addition, that the Chief Judge, when he is tired of sitting a co-ordinate Commissioner, may sit to rectify by way of appeal those things which have hitherto been rectified by a tribunal which at least has given as much satisfaction as the new Judge can expect to give? The petitioners evidently conceive that if they get a Chief Judge they will get rid of the Commissioners. But that is by no means the case. The Commissioners will be like the old man of the mountain, in the story, sticking fast to their shoulders. My hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General went too far in suggesting that this Bill was a transition Bill, gradually getting rid of the Commissioners, for it gives power, when the Commissioners have sunk down to three in number, to make new appointments to keep them up to that number. Therefore, when that time arrives the merchants of the City of London will have three Commissioners coming to different decisions instead of five. The hon. Member for the City of London (Mr. Crawford) says he finds a great want of dignity in these Courts at present; but the same objection will apply to them when this Bill passes. This Bill gives them increased jurisdiction, and, if that increased jurisdiction does not increase their dignity, the hon. Member's objection will remain all the same. The hon. and learned Solicitor General says that the petition of the forty-eight Manchester firms is the only voice that has been raised on the part of the mercantile community in favour of the Lords' Amendment. The hon. Member for the City of London, too, surprised me when he spoke of the Associated Chambers of Commerce coinciding with the traders of the City of London. I hold in my hand a petition agreed to at a special meeting of the Standing Committees of Associated Chambers of Commerce. The first of these bodies is the Chamber of Commerce of Belfast, not on account of its importance, but as a matter of alphabetical arrangement. Then comes the Chambers of Birmingham, Bristol, Glasgow, Hull, Leeds, Liverpool, Sheffield, Southampton, Wolverhampton, and a number of other places. What does this petition of the Associated Chambers of Commerce say? It takes up all the Amendments of the House of Lords, and objects to some of them, but does not say one word against the Amendment striking out the clause relative to the Chief Judge, leaving it to be assumed—and it must be assumed—that they are quite satisfied with the Amendment of the other House, and that they have not one word to say against it. But the matter does not rest there. The hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Horsfall) says that the town of Liverpool and the traders of Liverpool are very much divided on this subject. Nor is there a clear and unequivocal voice from Manchester, for that town also is divided on this question. Inasmuch, then, as the petition of the traders of London is founded on a misconception, as the petition of the Associated Chambers of Commerce indicates no objection to the Amendment, and as the towns of Manchester and Liverpool are divided in opinion, we must conclude that either a large portion of the mercantile community look with satisfaction on the rejection of the Chief Judge clause, or else that they are entirely indifferent on the subject.

My hon. and learned Friend says that some of those who objected to this Bill did so on grounds inconsistent with the course taken by them last year on the Attorney General's Bill. I beg to correct my hon. and learned Friend on this point. What seemed to me an undoubted benefit was that the Bill of last year swept away these Commissioners, and gave one uniform and unvarying tribunal for the London district. By this means the co-ordinate jurisdiction was got rid of, and on this ground expressly I and others approved this Bill. But in the Bill of this year several hon. Members on this side of the House disapproved that part of the Bill which combined the Chief Judge with the five continuing Commissioners. As to the appellate authority of the Chief Judge we have evidence that proves almost to demonstration the amount of his duties. I will take, for example, the appellate jurisdiction of the Lords Justices, and ask—can anything be more of a mockery than to appoint a Chief Judge for the sort of appellate jurisdiction I am going to describe? The Appellate Court in Bankruptcy sat last year fifteen days and heard forty-two cases. That was the whole of the appellate business. The hon. and learned Attorney General says that the number is probably few, either because the cost is great, or the delay is considerable. I challenge both statements. I do not know the cost of an appeal in bankruptcy, but will the hon. and learned Attorney General point out one sentence in the present Bill that lessens the cost of appeal? There is not one word that deals with the question of cost, or that makes an appeal a shilling cheaper than before the present appellate tribunal. If such a clause were introduced, the only result would be that if appeals could be made less expensive before the Chief Judge

they could be made less expensive also before the Lords Justices; and if the hon. and learned Attorney General should apply such a clause to the reduction of the cost of an appeal to the Lords Justices, he would be taking a step in the right direction. The hon. and learned Gentleman is also under an error when he speaks of the delay in the Appellate Court of the Lords Justices. The fact is that whether an appeal be put down on Monday, Tuesday, or any other day, if the parties are ready to have it heard it will be heard on the following Friday. There is, therefore, no delay before the Lord Justices. All the Judges that might be created could not expedite matters more, for the state of business is such that when an appeal is ready to be heard, it is heard at once and disposed of. But the hon. and learned Attorney General suggests that there is going to be a great increase of business, and it is, therefore, assumed that there will be more appeals. The hon. and learned Gentleman reminds us that the Chief Judge will have jurisdiction over appeals from sixty County Courts. I hope that by increasing the tribunals we are not about to increase the number of appeals, because that would be an ill compliment to your tribunals. I will assume, with the hon. and learned Attorney General, that the business will increase so as to be double what it is at present—that there will be eighty cases instead of forty, occupying thirty days instead of fifteen. But is not the Court of the Lords Justices perfectly able to give thirty days and dispose of eighty cases with the same satisfaction as forty cases? [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: I did not say there will be double the amount of business merely, but that there will be a very largely increased amount of business.] I took down the hon. and learned Gentleman's words, and I understood him to say that the "business might be taken as at least double." But if the matter is thrown loose again I am at liberty to speculate that the business will be double, and that the appeals will be double in number; and I say that if that is all the appellate tribunal will have to do you do not want a Chief Judge with £5,000 a year, and all the costs of a new Judge to do it. The hon. and learned Solicitor General says it is an evil to have five different Commissioners, because they have five different standards as to the conditions on which certificates ought to be granted. The certificates are of different classes, and each of the Commissioners took a different view of the merits of the bankrupt, one Commissioner giving one class of certificates and another Commissioner another class for similar cases. But that clause of the former Bankruptcy Bill is abolished by this Bill, and that removes the difficulty about the Commissioners granting certificates of various classes. But the matter does not rest there. The hon. and learned Solicitor General says that uniformity will be attained by the one Judge, and that a general system of discharge for bankrupts will prevail. But by the Bill the original jurisdiction of the Chief Judge in granting certificates is confined to the London district. What, then, is the bankrupt to do at Liverpool, Manchester, and other towns; and what uniformity do you secure with regard to certificates in all those towns? It is a delusion, and we are asked to pay £5000 a year for that which does not exist. There may, indeed, be some uniformity with respect to four or five Commissioners in London, but with respect to the sixty County Court Judges, and the six or seven country Commissioners, the Chief Judge will not have the slightest original jurisdiction over the grant of these certificates. It is said that, as any one will be at liberty to consult the Judge on a point of law, the result will be that great uniformity will be produced, as there will not exist the varying opinions at present given by a number of different Commissioners. But is the House aware that the meaning of this consultation is simply this, that any person during the proceedings is to be at liberty to take the opinion either of the Judge or of a Commissioner? Will that arrangement produce uniformity or that identity of decision which the hon. and learned Solicitor General says is likely to arise from it? The next point dwelt on by the hon. and learned Solicitor General has reference to the trial by jury; and the House has been told that a new system is about to be introduced, analogous to the system in the Divorce and Probate Court, by which a great deal of business is to be done by trials by jury. It is contended that for the satisfactory despatch of this branch of the business it is necessary to have a Judge at the head of the Court. Now, is the House aware of the whole extent to which trials by jury were applied in bankruptcy? The Court of Bankruptcy has no jurisdiction a all except over the bankrupt, the bankrupt's assignees, and any persons who choose to come in and submit to its jurisdiction; and it is the rarest possible thing for people voluntarily to submit to the jurisdiction. The facts in dispute in bankruptcy generally relate to fraudulent preference or the real ownership of certain property, and these questions are never tried in the Bankruptcy Court, but are tried by actions at law. It is not in the nature of bankruptcy that there should be once in a month, I may almost say once in a year, any question of fact relating to the bankrupt which can be susceptible of being tried by a jury. So much for this point about the trial by jury, which is almost a delusion, but the greatest delusion of all is involved in the proposition respecting the punishment of bankrupts for misdemeanour. I admit that if the facts warrant the statement which has been made there would be a case for a Chief Judge, because it is said that a new principle is to be introduced into the system of bankruptcy—namely, that the bankrupt is to be punishable for offences for which he was not punishable before, and the Court of Bankruptcy is to have a criminal jurisdiction it never before possessed. The hon. and learned Solicitor General says that the House will not trust these extensive powers to any one but a Judge of the first standing. How stands the fact? Is the House aware that all over the country, excepting only in that one spot characterized as the London district, these great powers so pompously paraded as a reason for a Chief Judge are given by the Bill, as prepared by the Government, to the sixty County Court Judges and the country Commissioners, without any original jurisdiction in the Chief Judge to control any one of them? Therefore, the idea that, as great powers are handed over to the tribunal for the first time, the tribunal must be a first-class one is altogether fallacious, as may be seen by reference to the end of the 164th Clause. In these cases there can be no appeal to the Chief Judge, for the Government surely do not mean to say that they intend to introduce appeals in criminal cases, after a decision by a jury. It is idle, therefore, to say that a Chief Judge is wanted for that business. Is there anything else for which the Chief Judge is required? The House has been told that there are to be a great number of deeds of arrangement; that the parties to those deeds will require to consult the Judge from time to time; that questions will arise which will have to be decided; and that it is highly desirable, for the sake of uniformity, that the Chief Judge should have original jurisdiction over them. But the Bill does not affect this. The sixty County Court Judges and the Country Commissioners have exactly the same power in this respect as the Chief Judge, and not one iota of uniformity is secured by the appointment of the Chief Judge, as far as regards original jurisdiction. As to the appellate jurisdiction, uniformity can be secured through any appellate jurisdiction, and I think I have satisfied the House that the present appellate tribunal is able to do its business efficiently. Therefore, I charge the Government with being experimental. I do not desire to appeal to great names; but, I ask, what was the course pursued in the other House with respect to the Amendment under consideration? It is said that this has been made a political question; who has made it so? Who proposed the Amendment in the other House? It was a noble and learned Lord of great learning and experience in bankruptcy jurisdiction, whose eminent judicial talents and abilities will always cause him to be regarded with the greatest possible respect. That noble and learned Lord, acting in political concert, not with those who sit on the Opposition side of the House, but with the Government, proposed the Amendment, which was supported by the most eminent legal authorities who adorn the Senate, sitting in the other House. There was no division on it, and with the exception of the late Lord Chancellor, who, if he had had the opportunity of expressing his opinion by a vote, would probably have voted in favour of the Government Bill, all the members of their Lordships' Committee appear to be unanimous in supporting the Amendment. Therefore, if authority and freedom from political motive can commend any change, this change comes down to the House of Commons with the full weight of such recommendation. We are now at the end of the Session. Next year a consolidation of the law of bankruptcy is promised. If the Government then bring in a Bill abolishing the power of the Commissioners they shall have my hearty support; but I do protest against throwing the whole administration of the bankrupt law into confusion by creating a sort of unmeaning, undefined, co-ordinate jurisdiction, which will be the result if the present proposal be carried.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he objected to the principle of the Bill. The Durham University, which with its large endowments ought to present great advantages to the youth of the North of England had become, as it was prophesied by the late Lord Durham it would become if not conducted in a liberal spirit—a mere manufactory of the lower order of clergy. During the thirty years of its existence the number of students had been gradually decreasing. He contended the University had been a total failure, as he believed the inquiry proposed by the Bill would prove a complete sham. The present Bill was actually less liberal than the Act of 1832, which professed to constitute a University for the advancement of learning generally, while this Bill had for its first object the promotion of religious teaching. He thought a much wider inquiry than that proposed should be instituted, and, therefore, he should move that the House resolve itself into Committee that day three months.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee,'"—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the powers given by the Bill were necessary for its object. But if it could be shown that it could receive Amendments in Committee, the hon. Gentleman could then propose them. If the Motion succeeded the only result would be, that a practical proposition to reform the University of Durham, in the same manner as Oxford and Cambridge, would be rejected.

MR. DEEDS said, he should move that the debate be adjourned. The Bill ought to have been introduced three months ago.

MR. MOWBRAY said, he should oppose the adjournment.

MR. FENWICK said, he thought the discussion of the Bill must be a long one. He hoped the House would consent to adjourn the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that practically, those who refused to continue the debate for an hour must wish the House to sit three months longer.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he did not wish to continue the debate if the House consented to the Motion that the Speaker leave the Chair.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Debate be now adjourned."

The House divided:—Ayes 21; Noes 116: Majority 95.

MR. FENWICK said, he would take that occasion to state that while the endowments of the University of Durham amounted at the present moment to upwards of £12,000 a year, the number of students did not exceed forty, an educational result which he could not but characterize as extremely unsatisfactory. The cause of so great a failure in that respect he attributed to the connection of the University with an ecclesiastical body. The Bishop of Durham, who had extensive duties in the administration of the affairs of his diocese to attend to, possessed the power of appointment in the case of the Professors of Divinity and Greek, the former of whom, it appeared, had an income of £4,700 a year, irrespective of the amount derived from tuitions. The question for the House to consider was how could the endowments of Durham University be made most available for the purposes of education. Some of the Commissioners named in the Bill were men of great learning and of practical wisdom, but surely the Bishop of the diocese could not be expected to strip himself of valuable patronage for the purpose of reforming the University. Unless the University were made subservient to the material interests of the district; unless it were thrown open to all classes instead of being confined to one, it would be vain to attempt passing a Bill like the present. The only effect of such a measure would be to make Durham University a bad imitation of Oxford and Cambridge, and in a few years fresh legislation would be necessary. The Bill, in short, was a sham, and in its present shape could do no good. It would be far better, in the first instance, to appoint a Commission simply to inquire and report.

MR. MOWBRAY said, that if Durham University had proved a failure, as alleged by the hon. Member for Sunderland, that was a reason why the House should go into Committee on the present Bill. He had no doubt that a Commission of inquiry would have been acceptable to the University authorities, but the Government had come to the wise conclusion that the returns already before the House afforded sufficient grounds for immediate legislation. The hon. Member for Sunderland had greatly overstated the revenues of the University; nor was it correct to say that the cause of the failure of the University was its connection with an ecclesiastical body. It should be recollected that the University was founded by the Dean and Chapter out of their own funds. Of late years it was true that there had been a falling off in the number of students, but the University had connected itself with a distinguished medical school at Newcastle, and the students there, sixty-five in number, ought to be reckoned as belonging to the University. There was no religious test, as had been asserted, on the admission of students to that University. He hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Bill considered in Committee.

House resumed.

POLAND—PRINCE CZARTORYSKI.

PETITIONS. OBSERVATIONS.

LORD BROUGHAM presented a Petition from inhabitants of Stockport, praying for the publication of Correspondence with regard to the partition of Poland, which had passed between England, France, and other countries in 1831, 1832, and subsequent years. The petition most justly describes the partition of 1772 as the greatest of public crimes, and destructive of all public law and national rights. The crime was completed twenty years later, and the conduct held towards Poland after the treaties of 1814 and 1815, and in flagrant breach of the engagements then entered into, had increased the claims of that country to the sympathy, and, as far as possible, the support of other nations. It was impossible to utter the name of Poland without reflecting on the irreparable loss which that country had sustained since the noble Earl (the Earl of Harrowby) gave notice of the Motion standing in his name upon the paper for that evening, or without expressing the sorrow which men of all parties, even of that most adverse to Poland, must feel at the death of that great and good man Prince Czartoryski. Having known him for half a century, and been ever on the most intimate terms with him, he would venture to assert that a man of more pure character or of greater virtue, public and private, never breathed. Born to an immense fortune, he had been content of late years to live on the very moderate income which he accidentally possessed independent of the confiscation by the three Powers. In early life he occupied the highest place in the Government of Russia, and was the prime favourite at Court, but never for an hour forgot his duty or abated his affection for his native country. Afterwards he threw himself into the contest which unhappily had no good results for Poland; but he (Lord Brougham) could not help remembering that Mr. Burke pronounced a panegyric on the constitution of Poland which was established after the elective monarchy—the worst form of government in Europe—had been put an end to, and declared that it was the best and most workable of the free constitutions which had ever been established in Europe. Prince Czartoryski, when he lived in Paris, not alone upheld the spirit of Poland, but was the friend and adviser of all who bore relationship or interest to that country. In no particular was the loss of this eminent, accomplished, and virtuous man more to be lamented than on account of the sound and moderate advice which he had constantly given to Polish emigrants, counselling them always to take the course which would most benefit Poland without giving offence to the country in which they had taken refuge. The only consolation remaining to his friends was that, although at an unusually advanced age, he retained to the last his faculties unimpaired, his feelings as warm as ever, the love of his country and hopes for her restoration as strong. This closing scene affords the only consolation of his countrymen and his friends.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, he had been requested to present two petitions on the same subject with regard to which his noble Friend had expressed himself with so much eloquence.

STATUES OF BRUNEL AND LOCKE.

QUESTION.

LORD TAUNTON rose to ask his noble Friend the Lord President, Whether it was the intention of the Government to authorize the erection of the Statues of two late eminent Civil Engineers, Mr. Brunel and Mr. Locke, in St. Margaret's Square, close to the statue of Mr. Canning? He did not desire to disparage the services of those eminent men, or the noble profession to which they belonged, but he doubted the propriety of the juxta-position. The immediate vicinity of the Houses of Parliament might, he thought, be more appropriately reserved for those eminent men who had distinguished themselves in that or the other House, and our experience in Trafalgar Square had shown that the grouping of statues, unless it was carried out in accordance with the architecture of the surrounding buildings, was by no means generally fortunate.

EARL GRANVILLE said, he had been informed by his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Works that he intended to reserve the side of St. Margaret's Square, facing the Houses of Parliament, for the reception of the statues of eminent statesmen; but that it was his intention to permit the statues referred to to be erected on the side facing the Institution of Civil Engineers.

LORD TAUNTON asked whether a plan or report would be laid before either House of Parliament, or whether any money Vote would be required?

EARL GRANVILLE thought that there would be no necessity for any Vote of money, but he was sure that his right hon. Friend would not carry out this plan if it was opposed to the general wish.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL—INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

REFERRED TO A SELECT COMMITTEE.

THE EARL OF DERBY wished to make a suggestion which, he thought, would promote the convenience of the House and facilitate the progress of public business.

There were two Bills standing upon the paper for Committees—namely, the Industrial Schools Bill and the Industrial Schools (Scotland) Bill. From their position upon the paper it was quite possible that neither of them would come on at an early hour of the evening, when they could be discussed satisfactorily. Although both Bills were for precisely similar objects, yet they were not identical as to details. He trusted, under the circumstances, that his noble Friend would see no objection to refer both measures to a Select Committee, when the details could be much better discussed, and would probably not occupy the Committee more than two or three hours of a morning.

EARL GRANVILLE acquiesced in the suggestion of the noble Earl, considering that the Bills were likely to undergo several Amendments in Committee.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into Committee, read, and discharged; and Bill referred to a Select Committee.

The Lords following were named of the Committee:—

Ld. President.	E. Carnarvon.
Ld. Privy Seal.	L. Petre.
E. Derby.	L. Rossie.
E. Devon.	L. Portman.
E. Doncaster.	L. Egerton.
E. Airlie.

ENDOWED CHAPELRIES.—QUESTION.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON rose—

“To call Attention to the Cases of Endowed Chapelries to which Cure of Souls have been annexed from portions of different adjoining Parishes, under the 8th and 9th Vict., c. 70, s. 9, and the 14th and 15th Vict., c. 97, s. 19 and 20, where there at present exist no Means of raising any Rate for the Maintenance of the Fabric or the Services of the Church; and to inquire whether the Government contemplate introducing any short Bill for the Remedy of the same, or to refer it to the Consideration of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners?”

As an instance of the necessity for some legislation upon this subject he would state that there was in the county of Salop, in the diocese of St. Asaph, a chapel called Morton Chapel, which was erected about 130 years ago, and was endowed with lands in Warwickshire. Those lands were found to contain large quantities of minerals, and were sold for a considerable sum under an Act of Parliament, the interest of which formed the endowment of the chapel. Up to the death of the last incumbent Morton Chapel had no cure of souls annexed to it, but attached simply a burial ground. Since then a portion of the parishes of Oswestry and Llanycwdvel had been annexed to it as a cure of souls; it had thus assumed the character of a parish church, and marriages were solemnized in it. There was, however, no provision for the maintenance of the services or the repair of the fabric. Legal opinions had been taken on the subject, and were to the effect that the parishes of Oswestry and Llany-clwdvel were responsible for those expenses. Those parishes, however, demurred, and refused to contribute. There were, no doubt, many similar cases throughout the country, and the present state of things was a source of great misunderstanding and ill-feeling. The law in such circumstances ought to be clearly and uniformly laid down in a comprehensive measure. He begged to ask the noble Lord, the President of Council, Whether the Government contemplated the introduction of any Bill on the subject, or whether they would refer the matter to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners?

EARL GRANVILLE said, that it was not the present intention of the Government to introduce any Bill for the removal of the grievances complained of by the noble Viscount. Before any steps were taken in a matter of this kind it was expedient that the Government should consult the right rev. Bench as to the best course to pursue.

POLAND.—MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY rose to move—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for, Copies or Extracts of all Correspondence which passed in the Years 1831 and 1832 between the Government of Great Britain and those of Russia and of other Countries on the Subject of Poland.”

The noble Earl proceeded to say that the interest of England in the state of Poland, which had long slumbered, had been awakened by recent events, and people had begun to ask whether the present position of affairs in that country is such as was contemplated by the great Powers who were parties to the Treaty of Vienna. All were aware that at that time the restoration of Poland as a part of the great European system was considered as a matter of the utmost importance by the statesmen of the day. The question was not one of sentiment actuating persons who sympathized with outraged rights and nationalities; but persons who were the last to be suspected of enthusiasm—such statesmen as Lord Castlereagh and Prince Metternich —considered the Polish nation as a most important element in the European system on the practical ground that it was essential that there should be a sufficient barrier between Russia on the one hand and Germany on the other. The feeling on this subject was so intense that, as their Lordships were, no doubt, aware at one time England, France and Austria were so much alarmed at the prospect of Poland falling into the hands of Russia that they bound themselves by a treaty to declare war against Russia in order to prevent such an occurrence. It was only the arrival of Napoleon from Elba that put an end to the discussions of the Powers, and for the time suspended proceedings on the question of Poland. Afterwards, when the Powers saw that it was impossible to establish Poland as an united and independent State, they took the next best means of forming a barrier against Russian aggression by dividing the country between three of the Powers, under peculiar and stringent obligations, which were intended to prevent them from absorbing any of the territory confided to them, and to keep together the severed nationality. It was stipulated that there should be facilities for intercourse and commerce between the various parts of Poland, and provisions were also introduced for the purpose of maintaining national feeling and the enjoyment of national liberty. In one of the treaties on the subject it was specially provided that the Duchy of Warsaw which was to be made over to Russia and erected into a kingdom was to receive a representative and national constitution. The 14th Article of the General Treaty recognized the same principles. Their Lordships would see that this was not a common case of partition, but a case of partition necessitated by the circumstances of Europe, and guaranteed by the other Powers in Congress by special precautions to prevent it from having the effect of destroying Polish nationality. Looking to the provisions which were made by treaty for preserving their nationality, and securing them good government and liberal institutions, and to the assurances which were given at the time that those provisions should be observed, the present condition of Poland could not be the natural and intended result of such a treaty. It might well be asked—where was the constitution? where were the restriction of appointments to natives, the freedom of commerce and navigation, the enjoyment of political liberty and representation which were guaranteed, and upon the faith of which Europe handed over to those Powers their several portions of Poland? The grievances under which the Poles had suffered were inconsistent with the conditions made on their behalf in the Congress of Vienna, and might well excuse or even justify the insurrection of 1830 and 1831. The breaches of engagement of which their rulers had been guilty deprived them of any right to make the insurrection a ground for depriving the Poles of their stipulated liberties, and he, moreover, maintained that the engagements of Vienna was not between the Poles and Russia, so much as between Russia and all the Powers of Europe. The preservation of those liberties was not only an object of interest to the Poles themselves, but of European importance; and, in 1831, when Russia pleaded the insurrection as a discharge from the solemn compact which had been made, England, through her Government, as he had reason to believe, held the same language which he was using now, and said that the guarantees were not to the Poles alone but to Europe, and that Russia was still under obligation to fulfil them. The petitions which he had presented was one evidence of that sympathy that the English people were accustomed to express with any people who were suffering oppression. The burst of national feeling could never be forgotten when the people of this country saw that there was a prospect of the Italians achieving their liberty, even though in the pursuit of it they had to overthrow treaties, instead of appealing to treaties in their behalf. But in the case of Poland these sympathies were not only excited on behalf of a free nation struggling for its natural rights, but they were additionally excited because liberties, which were the natural rights of all men, had been specially chartered to the Poles by Europe, and were, in fact, the title deeds by which alone the country was held in subjection. Poland was not held in subjection by the consent of the inhabitants, or by conquest, or by ancient inheritance, but by treaty; and by treaty alone all other rights were superseded, were abrogated by that transaction. The conditions of that treaty had been violated. All title to continued possession had been fortified. The only remaining title—if title that could be called—was the sword of the stronger. The correspondence which he called for was that which had taken place on the subject of the effect which the insurrection of 1831 had or ought to have upon the rights guaranteed by that treaty to Poland. He did not wish to call upon the English Government to renew the protest which he had reason to believe had then been made against the doctrine advanced by Russia, that these rights had been forfeited by the insurrection. But he wished that that protest should now be placed on public record, which it had not been at the time, and that the Russian Government, which had of late shown no inconsiderable sensitiveness to the action of public opinion, and a desire to earn a character for itself among the civilized nations of the West, should have an opportunity of learning by the expression of feeling from Members of your Lordships' House the right in which their proceedings in regard to Poland was looked upon by those whom that Government could not but esteem as no mean exponents of the general sentiment. He could not but hope for some good to arise from such an opportunity. The Russian Government would see that these sentiments were entertained not merely by men whom it could afford to treat as revolutionists and enthusiasts, but by experienced statesmen, who felt no interest in revolutions, who were no enthusiasts for nationalities, but who had regard for the common interests of humanity, for the maintenance of treaties, and the stability of the European system. He could not but hope for the expression of such opinions for at least some mitigation of the present tyranny. For himself he should, whatever his interest in the subject might be, have, perhaps, hardly broken through the rule still impressed upon him by prudence against taking a part in their Lordships' discussions, but in his desire to gratify the dying wishes of that distinguished man, that venerable patriot, Prince Czartoryski, who had, indeed, since the notice of this Motion had been given, closed a life far protracted beyond the ordinary limits of human existence, a life of the greatest private virtue, of the highest devotion to his country's service, which even the historic rolls of Poland can display, leaving behind him a name upon which the enemies of his country could never affix a stain, but which would remain as a standard, and he (Lord Harrowby) hoped a model, by its moderation as well as by its constancy, to his admiring countrymen. If his spirit be still conscious of human transactions it will be soothed and gratified by their Lordships' interest in the welfare of his country. The noble Earl concluded by moving for the papers.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, that nothing could be more natural than that the noble Earl, who had always taken an interest in the Polish people, should have brought this subject before their Lordships, particularly at this moment, when the attention of Europe had been especially directed to Poland by the events which had lately taken place at Warsaw. Though he could not add anything to the statement of the opinions of the Government which had been made in "another place," he felt personally extremely glad to have the opportunity of saying a few words on a subject in which he took a great interest. The destiny of Poland must always be a matter of interest to all Europe, not merely on account of the sympathy excited by her misfortunes and the gallant efforts of her people to recover their independence; but, also, because it was intimately connected with considerations of the greatest importance to the welfare of Europe. The extinction of Poland as an independent Power had perhaps had a greater effect on the general position of the European nations than any other event which had taken place in modern times. On the position of Germany, in particular, it had had a very great effect; because, as any one would immediately perceive by looking at a map, that portion—by far the greatest portion of Poland—which was in the position of Russia, lay like a wedge between the two great German Powers, and what would otherwise have been an outwork of Germany and a bulwark to Western civilization had become an outwork of Russia and a dangerous menace to Germany. This danger was increased by the construction of a system of fortresses in Russian Poland, which in strength and extent was only equalled by the famous Quadrilateral. Practically speaking, he could not but feel that we must regard the resuscitation of Polish independence as impossible, because, whatever might be in store for that nation in future times, at present this was not a question of practical politics. Poland was divided among three very strong States, and whatever efforts the Poles might make to recover their liberty they could scarcely be expected to succeed against such overwhelming force as might be brought against them. For this reason it was a matter of great congratulation to those who felt an interest in Poland to remark the calmness and moderation shown to the Poles during the late events at Warsaw. Their attitude, while it showed that the whole patriotic spirit was yet alive, and as strong as ever, also proved that the events of past years had not failed to teach them political wisdom. He could not help thinking that there was some reason to hope for a better day for Poland from the events which were taking place in Russia itself. His period of service in that country had naturally led him to pay special attention to what was taking place, and it was only due to the Emperor of Russia to say that the measures which he had adopted, and which were likely to lead to a new era in that country, proceeded primarily and principally from himself. The great measure of the emancipation of the serfs—a change in those relations which lay at the bottom of the whole social system of Russia—could not fail to produce great results hereafter. As more liberal ideas spread themselves through that country—and that such would be the case no intelligent Russian would deny—the Russians themselves would find it would be for their interest to allow the Poles greater freedom of action, and to give them those institutions to which they were undoubtedly entitled under the Treaty of Vienna—as the noble Earl would see the English Government maintained in the correspondence to which he had referred, and which there would be no objection to produce as regarded Russia, the other countries being omitted as in the papers moved for in the House of Commons. The vital importance of the Polish question to Russia had, perhaps, scarcely been sufficiently estimated, for we were apt to look upon Poland as merely what was known as the Kingdom of Poland, whereas the Polish provinces belonging to Russia constituted a very large and important part of the Russian Empire. Any one looking at the map would see that if Russia were to part with all the Polish provinces belonging to her she would be reduced to a position of great inferiority in the European system. The old Polish feeling existed—as he had been told by Russians themselves—not merely in Poland, but in those provinces of Russia which had formerly been Polish. While this must make any Russian statesman careful in dealing with this question, no doubt it would be found, when the time came for the Poles to receive those institutions to which they were entitled, that occupying so large a space of territory they would have a great influence on the destinies of the whole empire. Then, though there might be no practical possibility of the restoration of the independence of Poland—a consummation which Russian statesmen would naturally do their best to prevent—yet the day might come when Russian statesmen would find in the Poles themselves a great aid in the increase of civilization, and in the establishment of institutions more in conformity with the general system of Western nations. The question as regarded that portion of Poland which belonged to Prussia was very much affected by the number of Germans in those provinces. He had been told that the increase of the German population in these provinces had been much more rapid since 1815 than that of the Polish population, and that the Germans, including the Jews, were not far from equal to the whole Polish population. He had not the slightest fear that the discussion raised by the noble Earl would lead to any inconvenience; on the contrary, such discussions would do good, as showing that, while there was no wish to disturb existing arrangements, we still felt that interest and sympathy for the Poles which their position must naturally excite.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH: My Lords, it is but natural that the noble Earl, who for so long a time has taken so deep an interest in the condition of Poland, should have availed himself of this opportunity of bringing the subject under your Lordships' consideration, and it is a matter of much satisfaction to me that your Lordships should have an opportunity of expressing your opinions upon the question.

Undoubtedly the present position of affairs in what was once the Duchy of Warsaw is one of deep interest, and likely to affect materially the state of Europe. I have always entertained—as, indeed, I apprehend all those who have the least regard for freedom must entertain—a very strong sympathy with the people of Poland. They have been suffering now for a period of sixty-five years under the wrong inflicted upon their ancestors, and during the whole of that time they have shown grandeur of mind under great adversity. They have at all times under their misfortunes maintained the dignity of their national character. They have made themselves respected even by those who trod them under foot, and, above all, on all occasions, on every field and in every service to which they have been drawn, either by voluntary disposition or compelled by force, they have maintained and extended their military reputation, and have placed it on a par with that of any nation in the world. It is impossible not to respect so great and noble a people. It is to me a subject of astonishment that every Sovereign of Russia should not have laid himself out in endeavours to conciliate them, that he should not have esteemed it amongst his highest privileges to draw his sword at the head of their noble chivalry.

I speak not merely as the friend of the Poles, but as the friend of Russia. I discard from my mind altogether the memory of our recent misunderstanding. I look only to that long friendship, now happily re-established, which has prevailed between Russia and England for so many years to their mutual advantage. I am old enough, unfortunately, to recollect as if it were yesterday the invasion of Russia by the French in 1812. I recollect the noble self-devotion with which the Russians repelled the invasion of their territory, and the great service which they performed to Europe in the re-establishment of the liberty of nations. I entertain personally for the Emperor, as we all must, the greatest respect, when I consider that he has bestowed upon his people the greatest boon which is recorded in history as bestowed upon subjects by their Sovereign, and I cannot but entertain the hope that the Sovereign who has shown such benevolence for slaves will not be insensible to the claims which freemen have upon his consideration.

My Lords, the situation of Russia at the present moment is one calculated, I think, to excite anxiety in the mind of every statesman who takes a fair view of the state of Europe. The opposition to the Russian Government, unaccompanied though it may be by violence, which now exists in Poland practically prevents the forward action of Russia—prevents her advance under any circumstances beyond the Vistula—and would make it extremely difficult for her, if attacked, to maintain her position upon that river; while all the country behind her would be in flames and occupied by a hostile force. Practically the action of Russia in Central Europe is paralyzed by her position in reference to Poland. Such a state of things cannot exist without causing very great anxiety. The balance of power in Europe is so extremely delicate that no one of the great States can be temporarily disabled without affecting the position of all. We may view with jealousy the power of France, and perhaps distrust her policy; but if at any time, owing to any unfortunate circumstances, by means of civil commotion and internal disturbances, the action or influence of France were temporarily paralyzed, the injury which would result to the several States of Europe would be greater than any which might be expected to be derived from her aggression in the pursuit of her ambition.

My Lords, in what manner can Russia re-establish her position and again obtain the means of action? I know no mode in which that can be accomplished save by a frank reconciliation with the Polish people. Nor will I despair of that happy result being attained. I do not despair of it when I look to history and see that great States have had similar dependencies, and have maintained, with mutual satisfaction and advantage, the connection existing between them. I see that in distant times Naples, Lombardy, and Flanders gave their troops, their Generals, their most cordial co-operation, and their most devoted loyalty to the Emperor Charles V. And why? Because they enjoyed self-government—because they were happy under his administration—because he loved them as he loved the rest of his subjects—and because when he went among them he appeared as one of themselves. I see that at a more recent period the Hungarians, not only during the early times of Maria Teresa, but down to a late date, supported with devotion the House of Hapsburgh. Why? Because they, too, had then a separate self-government, and their position was rather that of an allied State than of a dependency. The Hungarians contributed to Austria for offensive operations 66,000 men, whose expenses they defrayed. Further assistance was always forthcoming in case of need, and when the enemy approached the frontiers of Hungary every man rushed to arms. Again, I see in the history of this country that the English Sovereigns of Hanover, though generally absent from that kingdom, and though absent altogether during the last sixty years of their reign, could always count on the loyalty of the people, because Hanover was well governed and was treated as an independent country.

I cannot but think that the application of the same principles to the connection between Russia and Poland would produce the same results. Nations do not change their character—individuals may; and it is the change in the chaacter of individuals which, I fear, has effected the difference in the Government of these countries, and has produced the present feelings of the Poles, so different from those existing in the other countries I have mentioned towards their Sovereigns. I do trust, however, that the time will come when Russia will desire to act in a totally different spirit, and that when so acting her advances will be frankly received by the Poles.

We know that the Romans always considered that their most powerful enemies were those who became their best allies, and why? because those enemies when subdued were well treated. It would be well that Russia should remember this in her treatment of the Poles. Nor let her suppose that a poor people must on account of their poverty be easily kept quiet. It is quite the reverse. There is no position more perilous than that of a Sovereign in the midst of a people which has nothing left to lose but its honour. Poverty is always dangerous. Poverty always desires a change. Poverty conspires. Wealth is quiet. Wealth never conspires. Wealth only requires that things should continue as they are, and that it should retain the advantages which it possesses; and if Russia gives to Poland self-government and the wealth which follows it, I cannot but hope that perfect tranquillity will reign there.

My Lords, I have said that I hope there will be on the part of the Emperor of Russia a frank offer of friendship to the Polish people. I am sure that in no other manner is it possible for his authority to be re-established amongst them. Generosity emanating from superior power is of all qualities the most influential in the government of a subject people, and never could generosity have a greater effect than when displayed towards this, one of the bravest and most generous of nations.

In the event of conciliatory propositions being made to the People of Poland, I do trust that they will be received in the spirit in which they are made. The Poles must bear in mind that that which they desire, and which we, too, may desire—the re-establishment of the Polish monarchy,—is an object which it is impossible to attain otherwise than through the disruption of all the States of Europe. A disruption of that character more than fifty years ago brought the first Napoleon to the Vistula. He held out promises to the Poles. He used them. He drew from them their hearts' blood. And he deceived them. Do they hope that under any circumstances which may convulse Europe the France of the present day would act with greater candour and with greater fidelity than the Napoleon who then behaved so faithlessly?

Had I the opportunity of approaching the Emperor of Russia I should most earnestly counsel him to adopt a policy of clemency and generosity towards the Poles. I should with equal earnestness entreat the Polish people to meet his advances frankly and fairly. But I would caution both that, in whatever engagements may take place between them, the most absolute fidelity must be observed by both. Insincerity is the one crime which can never be forgiven in a Sovereign. Ingratitude in a people is a crime of no less magnitude—it is one which, committed by the Poles, would deprive them of all the sympathy which they now possess throughout Europe.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: My Lords, although I feel the disadvantage under which every one must labour who follows the noble Earl, I cannot help saying a few words on this subject, even if their only effect is to show your Lordships that the feeling which has been evinced in favour of the Poles on the other side of the House is equally sincere on this. Having been for some time concerned in the management of foreign affairs, I should have thought I was hardly discharging my duty if I were not to say how entirely I concur with what has been said on the other side of the House, and more especially with the valuable advice which has just been given by the noble Earl. With regard to the Poles, I would say that, although this is a moment in which they may be grieved, it is not one in which they need be disheartened. I would ask them to consider fairly and generously in what a different position they now stand as compared with their position seven or eight years ago. Then they had an absolute Sovereign, whose only idea of maintaining his power was to curb the liberties of his people by the employment of military force. They are now ruled by an Emperor who has done great things for the promotion of liberty—greater than have been attempted by any contemporary Sovereign. Sufficient justice has hardly been done by the public to the Emperor of Russia for the great boon which he has conferred, or is in the course of conferring, to his empire by the liberation of the serfs. It is impossible to suppose that such a man has not a sense of the advantages of a milder system. And, indeed, I have information on which I believe I may entirely rely, that such are the sentiments of the Emperor of Russia. And he has near him men, in whom he himself places confidence, who are urging him to take the very course on which your Lordships have to-night expressed your opinion. But, as a matter of course, like every other Sovereign in his position, he has also advisers who urge him in the contrary direction. Still, when we know the natural turn of his own mind, and know that some of the most influential councillors around him are disposed to give him the only advice that can tend to strengthen his throne, I think the time is not far removed when a milder rule will be adopted in that country. I should be sorry if anything should be said in this or the other House of Parliament—and nothing has been said—that could encourage the Poles to take a course fatal to their own welfare. There are parties among them who look on the subject in different ways. There is the moderate party, the leader of which was that most respected nobleman Prince Czartoryski, who has just died at Paris, who look only at the improvement of the condition of Poland under the sovereignty of Russia; there is another party whose patriotism goes to the extent of wishing to re-establish an impossible monarchy—a monarchy which was crushed out of existence seventy years ago. But in neither House of Parliament, as far as I have observed what has passed in “another place,” has anything been said to encourage any section of the Poles to attempt impossibilities that can only result in bringing them under a more stringent tyranny than that to which they are at present subjected. But there is one thing that no statesman in this country need be afraid boldly to state. It is, that the present rule of the Polish nation is a breach of the Treaty of Vienna. No one can deny, though some may excuse it. But I cannot accept the excuses, because I believe the Polish rebellion of 1830 and 1831 was entirely the result of the most flagrant violation of that treaty, carried out in a most cruel and inexcusable manner. Therefore, while I say nothing can excuse the breach of that treaty by the Emperor Nicholas, neither can anything excuse the present Emperor for continuing to violate it by imposing on the Poles a rule from which the Treaty of Vienna protects them. But I would entreat them to consider at this moment only how they can obtain what that treaty promised them—how they can obtain a constitutional Government such as their fellow-countrymen possess in Prussia, and at once to dismiss from their minds any dreams of reconstructing the Polish monarchy. The attempt would convulse Europe, and could only end in retarding still longer the attainment of those liberties to which they are justly entitled.

THE MARQUESS OF BREADALBANE was surprised the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough) should have expressed the sentiment that “wealth never conspires.” Was there ever manifested to the world a greater conspiracy of wealth and power than the spoliation of Poland? Was there ever a greater crime committed by power against right than had been committed against that unfortunate country? He believed that wealth conspired as well as poverty; and he should be sorry if, on this occasion, he did not protest in his place in that House against the great political crime of which Poland had been made the victim.

VISCOUNT STRATFORD DE REDCLIFFE said, that he entirely concurred in the opinion which had been expressed upon this subject by those noble Lords who had preceded him, and it was not his intention to go at any length over the ground which they had traversed; but having from an early period of his public life felt an interest in this question, he should be sorry to allow the discussion to close without expressing his sentiments. Everybody who was interested in the subject must have been gratified to find that justice had been done on both sides of the House to the character of the Polish nation, and more particularly to the character of that illustrious man who had lately been taken away from the world after a life spent in devotion to the interests of his country under the most adverse circumstances. He had himself had an opportunity in the course of last year of conversing with that illustrious Prince, and all that he had heard from him convinced him of the justice of the view which had been taken of his character and conduct in the course of that discussion. He was very glad to hear his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Malmesbury) state frankly and fairly his opinion with regard to the breach of the Treaty of Vienna. He believed no one could look at that treaty and compare with its provisions the conduct which had since been pursued towards Poland without feeling that a very serious violation of public law had been effected by the events of 1834, and that those who had been immediately concerned in that transaction owed more to the forbearance of Europe than to the justice and moderation of their own conduct. One result was, that that small but interesting city (Cracow) which was the last refuge of the nationality of Poland, and which the treaty guaranteed should have a free and independent constitution, had become a part of the Austrian Empire. He should say that if the convenience of nations, if the interests of this country and the prudence of the British Parliament, did not permit our taking a more serious notice of those questions, and impose upon us the necessity of adopting corresponding measures, it was, at least, a satisfaction to know that the voice of Europe could be heard in the British Parliament, and that those who had so far succeeded in carrying out their ambitious designs had, at all events, to encounter the reprobation of the British Parliament—a body which more than any other in Europe was entitled to express the opinion of England and of the civilized world.

LORD TALBOT DE MALAHIDE said, that with what had been said in favour of the rights of Poland he entirely agreed; but he thought some points in the condition of that country had been omitted by the previous speakers. One of the greatest grievances under which the Poles at present suffered had not been at all alluded to—it was the great religious grievance. He had been assured that at the present moment there were nearly 5,000,000 Poles who had been forced to abjure their religion, and adopt—of course, only in appearance—the Greek form of worship. Statesmen must be ill observers of the feeling of the present time if they expected to produce a reformation of public opinion by such means as this. He had also heard that within the last few years there had been attempts to convert all Jewish children to the Christian faith; hundreds and thousands of children had been carried away by force to be baptized and educated in the principles of the Greek Church. Their Lordships had heard a great deal of the Mortara case—a case which, indeed, fully called for their sympathies—many of the Governments of Europe interfered in that case—he should like to know whether the Emperor of Russia interfered also—but for that one instance of this greatest grievance there were hundreds, if not thousands, in Poland. Every one must feel deep sympathy in the great experiment that was now taking place in Russia—one of the most arduous, dangerous, but beneficial changes ever contemplated. He could not suppose that there was any idea of stifling the aspirations of Russian Poland for the acquisition of representative institutions. While wishing well to the Emperor of Russia in the great experiment he was now making, they could not but feel that he would derive the greatest assistance in carrying it to a successful result from having the support of those Polish provinces where serfage had been abolished since 1791. He trusted that they should not hear of papers being circulated by the police among the Polish peasants urging them to rise against their landlords, for such a course would lead to the greatest danger, not only to Russia but also to Europe. Such a ruse had been practised before with the most fatal results. Apprehensions had frequently been felt at the danger that would arise to Europe from a too powerful despotic monarch, but dangers would also arise from an extended system of jacquerie such as they were told had arisen in some Russian provinces. If the Polish provinces were well organized and fairly treated they would feel no sympathy with such a movement, but they would act as a great breakwater to preserve Europe from the flood of dangers arising from the domination of an ignorant and savage peasantry. He was gratified to find on both sides of the House so unanimous a feeling of sympathy with the just claims of Poland.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY said, he would adopt the suggestion of the noble Lord the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, and confine his Motion to the Correspondence between Great Britain and Russia.

Address for Papers, &c., agreed to.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE expressed a hope that the opposition which had been threatened on a former occasion would not be persevered in. He had received various communications from different parts of Ireland, urging the importance of such a measure, and the benefits which it was calculated to confer. It was alleged that the Bill did not contain proper securities as regarded property; but the fact was that under it securities greater than those affecting railway legislation were given, as landowners who might be unwilling or unable to incur the cost of a Parliamentary Opposition would find a sympathizing tribunal in a grand jury, while the whole expense of opposition, including an ultimate appeal to the Privy Council, would not necessitate one twentieth part of the outlay indispensable to attendance before a Parliamentary Committee. The resolution which had been come to to omit a clause in the Bill giving the power to take land would do great injury to the agricultural interest, by preventing the construction of tramways in localities where they would be of advantage to the cultivators of land. Out of that House he had not heard a single objection to the Bill, and he, therefore, recommended their Lordships to reconsider the decision which they had come to.

VISCOUNT DE VESCI objected to the measure because it had the effect of diminishing the securities contained in the Bill of last year. If the scheme for a tramway happened to enlist the support of the High Sheriff, by whom grand juries were convened, it might be passed in spite of remonstrances and arguments, however reasonable.

LORD REDESDALE said, that the clause which the noble Marquess complained had been struck out on a former occasion was a clause which enabled parties to take land by compulsion anywhere they pleased, instead of being subject to the limits provided in the former Act. The limitation was inserted in the former Act upon this principle, that if land was allowed to be taken anywhere through the medium of grand juries for tramways, why should not the same principle be applied in the case of railways—a far preferable and much more important mode of communication? He did not say that Parliament was the best tribunal for railway companies to go to in order to obtain the powers required for the making of their lines, and he should be glad if a better could be found; but, what he contended was that they ought not to give in a Bill like this powers which were denied for other and more desirable purposes. He considered that the provisions of the Bill were opposed to the interest of the country and objectionable in every respect, but he hoped that alterations might be suggested which would make it a working measure.

THE EARL OF LUCAN hoped that in legislating for Ireland in this matter their Lordships would act upon the same principles that they acted upon in regard to England, and if they did that, he felt confident that the greater part, if not the whole, of these clauses would be materially altered.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD thought that the institution of turnpike roads might have been opposed 200 or 300 years ago upon the same ground as this Bill was now opposed, and he hoped that their Lordships would not object to allow of the formation of a few tramways in Ireland. The Bill asked no more than the same power for making tramways as was given to grand juries for the making of ordinary roads.

THE MARQUESS OF BATH said, it appeared to him that this was a cheap way to obtain a railway. He should not oppose going into Committee, but he hoped that their Lordships would seriously consider the provisions of the measure.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW said, though the Bill was intended to give power to make tramways, nevertheless, it provided that in the event of any person having a locus standi, coming to Parliament against a particular tramway, it would be necessary to have a special Act of Parliament to establish such tramway. He did not think there was any objectionable feature in the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (One Approval by Grand Jury to be sufficient).

THE EARL OF LUCAN moved the omission of the clause, as it did not give the securities which he deemed requisite.

On Question, whether the said Clause shall stand part of the Bill?

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 20; Not-Contents 16: Majority 4.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 6 agreed to.

Clause 7 (Inquiry before Board of Works to be confined to Engineering Questions).

VISCOUNT DE VESCI moved the rejection of the clause, on the ground that it limited the inquiry to the Board of Works, instead of carrying it before jurors.

On Question, whether the said clause shall stand part of the Bill?

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 24; Not-Contents 14: Majority 10.

TRAMWAYS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

THE MARQUESS OF BATH wished to draw attention to the difference between this and the last Bill. The present was wholly permissive, and did not contain a single clause giving power to take land.

VISCOUNT DUNANNON was also struck with the contrast between the two measures. The Irish one he regarded as a most injurious and, indeed, iniquitous Bill.

Amendments made; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next.

COUNTY SURVEYORS, &c., (IRELAND)

BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 6 (Grand Jury may, on Increase of Salary to County Surveyor, require that he shall not engage in private Practice).

VISCOUNT LIFFORD suggested that the words "having his usual residence in such county," ought to be inserted.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, that he had consulted with his right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary on this point, and that it was not considered necessary to insert such a provision.

THE EARL OF BELMORE: I wish to call the attention of the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of St. Germans) to one point in this clause. The clause provides that in case a grand jury shall have decided to increase the salary of a county surveyor, they may stipulate that he shall not engage in any private professional practice. Now, with regard to private practice, I do not wish to say anything; but I think it very undesirable that a county surveyor should, as happened in case which came under my own notice, attach himself as engineer to a railway running through the county, and thus bring the duties which devolve on him, as relating to the public roads, to clash with other duties relating to the railway which crosses those roads.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S: If the noble Earl will look into the Bill he will find that the grand jury are enabled for the future to make any stipulation they may think necessary with the county surveyor.

THE EARL OF BELMORE : Yes, if they have decided on increasing his salary.

THE EARL OF ST. GERMAN'S said, that the Bill provided that an increase of pay, or on the occasion of any future appointment of a county surveyor, the grand jury would be empowered to fix the amount of his salary and make any conditions with him they pleased.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON was understood to say that he was able to state that county surveyors did largely engage in private professional practice, both in connection with railways and otherwise.

Amendments made ; the Report thereof to be received on Tuesday next.

House adjourned at Half-past Eight o'clock till Monday next, Twelve o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 19, 1861.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Selkirkshire, v. Allen Elliott Lockhart, esquire, Chiltern Hundreds.

PUBLIC BILL.—2^o Pensions (British Forces), India.

INLAND REVENUE BILL.

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. P. W. MARTIN moved, as an Instruction to the Committee, that they should have power to divide the Bill into two or more Bills.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he considered the Bill to be a sequel to the Supply Bill ; and on a former occasion he objected to the Supply Bill because it embodied in one Bill provisions relating to the income tax, to the Customs, and to the Excise. He then endeavoured to show that the intent with which that Bill was framed was ostensibly to annul the power of the House of Lords to deal with taxation, although their assent to taxation was necessary to give it the form of law. But another consequence arose from that Bill, that the opportunities for an expression of the opinion of the House of Commons, and also for discussion, were greatly curtailed. He also endeavoured to show the House that according to ordinary practice the Bill ought to have been divided into three Bills, and that the fact of its not being so divided rendered it impossible for the House to discuss sufficiently the principle involved in the changes under the several heads of taxation, and, therefore, limited the opportunity for discussion and consideration in Supply. Now, the House would observe why the Bill before them was the sequel to that Bill. One objection to a Consolidated Supply Bill was that if the whole of the propositions relating to extensive changes were included in one Bill, it would run to such an enormous length that the House would have considerable difficulty in dealing with it, besides which it would attract an amount of attention out of doors which he did not think the Chancellor of the Exchequer would find to increase the popularity of the measure. What had the right hon. Gentleman done? In his Consolidated Supply Bill, he pursued a course, equivalent in every respect to the old practice of "tacking," in order to conceal the inconvenience thus inflicted upon the House, he forced through the several principles of the changes he proposed in taxation in his Supply Bill, but it was desirable to lighten his craft, and, therefore, he reserved for the Bill under consideration the details which were necessary to give effect to the taxation decided upon in the Supply Bill previously in the Session. Direct taxation was necessarily odious in its character ; but the odium did not become so apparent until they began to deal with its incidence and enforce it. It was, therefore, a very prudent and ingenious measure to induce the House hastily to adopt the substance of his proposals, leaving it to the fag-end of the Session, when the House was wearied, and public attention flagged, to require legislative means for the imposition of those taxes, for the decision of their incidence, and for the resort to those means of coercion and inquisitorial interference which were the necessary characteristics of that form of taxation. The old form of Parliamentary proceedings was to treat each alteration of taxation by itself. But the right hon. Gentleman had adopted the mode of leaving to the fag-end of the Session the consideration of the means for enforcing taxation. The Bill was one mass of vexatious detail ; and he did not believe that many of those provisions were necessary, for the taxation could be collected as the law now stood. He hoped the House would enter its protest against further proceeding with the Bill. The greater portion of it might be conveniently postponed till another Session, when it might be considered in Committee as a preliminary step. The Bill was the second financial statement of the Session, and its provisions ought to be carefully considered. The Motion before the House was for the division of the Bill. He would be glad to hear what objection could be urged against that proposition. There might be a necessity for some of the clauses. He denied, however, that there was a necessity for all of them; and he objected to going, in the dog-days, into the details of a Bill which were not absolutely necessary, and which could be advantageously considered in another Session. What were the provisions of the Bill? There was, first, a relaxation of duties on the sale of foreign wines, a relaxation far greater than that proposed with regard to the sale of home-brewed beer. Indeed, the provisions with respect to the beer-houses not selling foreign wines were almost wholly restrictive. There was a vexatious clause imposing a penalty in the form of liability on the part of a successor to pay duty on property which had ceased to exist. Then, all the summary powers which existed for the collection of revenue under the Excise Laws, and which had been adopted to prevent smuggling, had been extended to the collection of Inland Revenue. Then there was a proposal to compel joint-stock companies, under a penalty, to make a return of their servants receiving wages rendering them liable to income tax; but there were firms employing a far larger number of hands than public companies, who would be exempted for no valid reason of the principle of rendering the employer liable was justifiable. Taking the Bill from first to last, it was one which, being a sequel to the Supply Bill, contained provisions which ought to have accompanied the change in the imposition of taxation, and to have been then decided upon, if intended at all. He for one wished to hear from the Government which of the provisions of the Bill were in their opinion absolutely necessary, and he hoped to find the House prepared at that period of the Session to reject the rest; and if no part was necessary, then that the House would refuse to proceed with a Bill so objectionable.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that at the proper time he was prepared to show that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Newdegate) had misunderstood the Bill, and, therefore, entirely misrepresented it. The proposal of his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Martin) he thought a reasonable one; and he begged to thank the hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets for having pointed out the subject by a notice which he had given. They (the Government) had included what might be called a police provision in a revenue Bill. That was according to precedent; but as the matter had been pointed out, he thought it would be advisable to separate the two matters. He, therefore, was willing to assent to the proposal to divide the Bill.

MR. HADFIELD said, he had been urged most strongly by a most excellent society to give every opposition to a clause in the Bill relating to beerhouses, by which the floodgates of vice and immorality would be opened for the purpose of replenishing Her Majesty's Exchequer. He questioned the propriety of introducing a Bill to alter the law with so short a notice, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would withdraw the objectionable clause to which he called his attention. If not, he (Mr. Hadfield) would move that the Bill be committed that day three months.

MR. W. E. FORSTER observed that he fully agreed with the hon. Member for Sheffield in his view of the clause.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to approve of the proposition of the hon. Member for Rochester (Mr. W. Martin); what was the reason, then, that the right hon. Gentleman had not himself made the proposal?

MR. BRISTOW said, that the discussion as to the clause was a mere collateral issue raised by the hon. Member for Sheffield as to whether a particular clause should be part of the Bill.

MR. HENLEY said, that the Motion before the House was as to dividing the Bill into two Bills or more. He wanted to know whether it was only with regard to one particular clause that the Chancellor of the Exchequer had consented to divide the Bill? He (Mr. Henley) thought that the clauses with regard to the probate and succession duty were so important that they ought to be made the subject of a separate Bill.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would at once accede to the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman, and consent to give up the clauses relating to the Probate and Succession Duties, with the view of forming them into a separate Bill.

MR. HUBBARD said, that he also had objections to offer. The income tax was an exceedingly complicated subject, and it would be unfair to the community to conceal any legislation with respect to it under the title of an Inland Revenue Bill. There was a Committee sitting upon the income tax, and, therefore, he considered it premature to propose to make any changes with respect to it at the present moment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that an appeal had been made to him against the 43rd Clause, which compelled employers to make a return of all persons in their employment who were liable to income tax. That was felt to be very objectionable, and he hoped it would receive the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, the Bill gave the income-tax screw another and a tighter turn. The 43rd Clause compelled public companies to give returns not only of the salaries their servants had received, but to give notice of salaries that might be advanced in the course of the year for good conduct, thus calling upon them to exercise the gift of prescience.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he wished to say that he did not think it right at that period of the Session to introduce novelties in legislation for the discussion of Parliament. The Bill, however, contained chiefly clauses of mitigation and relaxation, and certain administrative regulations for the correction of errors and the prevention of abuses and evasions, and, therefore, he thought the Bill ought to receive the consideration of the House. With regard to the 43rd Clause, to which the hon. Gentleman had just referred, he might state that clause contained no new principle, for it was already in force in regard to large classes of persons; but, as the clause would apply the principle to a new class of individuals, he had no wish to press it upon the House, and would agree to withdraw it. He hoped the hon. Member for King's County (who had a notice on the paper to commit the Bill that day three months) would be content with the discussion that had taken place, and not press his Motion.

Instruction to the Committee on the Inland Revenue Bill, that they have power to divide the Bill into two or more Bills.

Motion made and Question proposed "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. HENNESSY said, he would move that the House do, on that day three months, resolve itself into a Committee.

On the 19th July a proposition was made to alter the law in relation to twenty-eight distinct articles of taxation, by an Act which might and ought to have been brought in in the middle of February. Methylated spirits were for the first time to be subjected to duty. There were clauses relating to beerhouses, refreshment-houses, wine licences, beerhouses in Scotland, sale of beer and spirits at fairs and races, racehorses, horses conveying prisoners, game dealers, illicit distillation in Ireland, distillation and rectification of spirits and vinegars, rectifying sugar, stamp duties, adhesive stamp, insurances, bills of sale, succession duties, probate duties, land tax, and summary proceedings for the recovery of penalties. In all there were twenty-eight separate propositions, all of great importance, which might fairly have been introduced into as many Bills. Besides, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was about to modify the Tippling Act, which he thought was operating materially to diminish drunkenness. The second reading was taken without discussion; and the House was now called on to go into all these important subjects at the fag-end of the Session. Why, also, did the right hon. Gentleman wish to make the wine licence cheaper than the beer licence?

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee"—instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not help noticing the inconvenient course taken by hon. Gentlemen opposite. That was not the proper time for him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) to refer in detail to the provisions of this Bill. He would, however, rest the Motion of the hon. Gentleman on one single clause—namely, that which allowed a drawback on beer. If the hon. Gentleman would take the trouble to consult any one interested in the beer trade he would find that the clause simply affected a re-adjustment of the whole scale of allowances and drawbacks on beer, rendered necessary by the change that had taken place in the manufacture and the mode of regulating the strength and the price of that article. If the hon. Gentleman succeeded in his injudicious Motion the matter must remain over till next year, and the manufacturers would be devoid of that accommodation which the Bill proposed to give them with the perfect assent of the Crown as representing the interests of the revenue.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he hoped his hon. Friend would not press his Amendment. It was a common practice to bring in at the close of the Session what was called an "Omnibus" Bill, in which was inserted a variety of provisions connected with the administration of the Departments of Customs and Inland Revenue, and which were not matters that ought to form the subject of separate Bills. But what was felt with regard to the present Bill was that the licence of an "Omnibus" Bill had been somewhat exceeded by the insertion in the Bill of the succession and probate duties, which very frequently involved legal questions, especially as by adopting the present course the House of Lords would be deprived of any opportunity of expressing any opinion with regard to them. It would have been better that the clauses had been altogether withdrawn.

MR. PHILIPPS said, that before going into Committee of Supply the House ought to have some assurance as to the course which it was proposed to take. As the matter stood then they could not fail to view with jealousy the clauses as to the succession duty.

MR. HUBBARD said, if the right hon. Gentleman would confine the Bill to the first thirty-five clauses, he should have no objection to it. But he had the strongest possible objection to the income tax clauses, which, so far from being in the direction of a mitigation of taxation were essentially penal in their effects.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would withdraw his opposition to going into Committee after the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the Bill had been likened to a plum-pudding, but it was, in fact, making a pudding of taxation. It was, however, only a sequel to their original mistake, and he hoped before another Session the Government would be impressed with the force of the objections which had always been felt to tacking Supply Bills. He was prepared to vote, and he would vote, if he went alone into the lobby, against going into Committee on the Bill.

MR. HODGSON pointed out the objectionable character of the 44th Clause, and asked the right hon. Gentleman the

Chancellor of the Exchequer whether, as he had agreed to omit the 43rd Clause, he would not also omit the 44th?

MR. BRISTOW remarked that the House ought to be obliged to the hon. Member for Stamford (Sir Stafford Northcote) for the advice he had given to the hon. Member for the King's County (Mr. Hennessy). It was admitted by every one that there were useful clauses in the Bill, and if that were so, surely the common sense course was to go into Committee.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that although he had a strong objection to one of the clauses in the Bill, and he hoped it would be omitted or considerably modified, he would not object to going into Committee.

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had met the proposal to divide the Bill in the fairest manner, and he hoped that they would now go into Committee and discuss the clauses. With regard to the 44th Clause, he doubted whether it was confined to public companies, and did not also apply to individuals.

LORD JOHN MANNERS remarked that the proposal of the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard) that the Bill should end with the 35th Clause was a very reasonable one, and he hoped it would be acceded to by the right hon. Gentleman. It was, in his opinion, highly objectionable to be asked at the middle of July to discuss the important financial questions contained in the Bill.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that if the Bill was to be proceeded with, he hoped that all reference to Ireland would be omitted in the absence of any responsible Member of the Government connected with that country.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would withdraw his Motion, provided the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, acceded to the proposal of the hon. Member for Buckingham, but not otherwise.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he was very sorry he could not accede to that offer.

The House divided:—Ayes 82; Noes 49: Majority 33.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that he thought the time was now come when the right hon. Gentleman, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, should give an explanation of the manner in which he meant to deal with the Bill. The Bill dealt with the most important subjects of taxation—the wine duties, the succession duty, and the income tax. On these points the right hon. Gentleman had given them the minimum of information. Was the Bill to be divided into four? If they went through the clauses in the order in which they stood in the Bill the House might find itself discussing some of the most important portions of the Bill much nearer the fag-end of the Session than even then.

MR. SPEAKER said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer having already spoken could not reply to the question.

MR. COLLINS said, that to enable the right hon. Gentleman to answer the question, he would move that the House do adjourn.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, there had been an attempt to prolong discussion on questions that could be much better debated in Committee. It could hardly be expected that he would go through the several batches of clauses in the Bill and give explanations of each. He denied that the licence usually taken in Omnibus Bills was exceeded. With regard to the division of the Bill, he had at once acceded to the Motion of the hon. Member (Mr. Martin) for that purpose, and he also acquiesced in the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley), that the clauses relating to the legacy and succession duties should form a separate Bill. Further than that he could not go at that moment.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he was glad that the right hon. Gentleman had so far agreed in his view as to divide the Bill into three. It showed the inconvenience of consolidating several Bills, which ought to be kept separate, into one.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Methylated Spirit may be retailed under Licence for that purpose),

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the explanation which he had to give relative to the first six clauses was this:—Methylated spirit was a very useful invention recently made, which involved the solution of a most difficult problem—how to invent a spirit which should be available for purposes of manufacture, and which could not be used as drink.

The present law admitted the sale of that spirit wholesale only under the £10 10s. licence, and as it would be a great benefit to the public that it should be sold also by retail, the clause had it in view to effect that object by empowering dealers to sell it under a £2 2s. licence.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 2 to 8 inclusive.

Clause 9 (Lower rate of Duty on Refreshment-house Licences for Houses under £30 annual value. Allowance of duty paid for Refreshment-house Licence to be made on taking Wine Licence),

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the first part of the clause altered somewhat the charge for refreshment-houses in favour of the person taking out the licence; the second part of the clause enabled a person who took out a wine licence, and who also had a refreshment-house, to pay only for the wine licence, instead of paying, as now, on both. It would be a relief to the extent of 21s.; but the clause was introduced chiefly to remedy a flaw in the Act of last Session.

MR. AYRTON said, he had given notice to leave out the latter part of the clause, because, as the law stood, a person would be compelled to take out a licence for refreshment if he sold only such innocent refreshments as tea and coffee, and kept his house open after ten o'clock at night. Besides, in order to encourage the consumption of wine, the Chancellor of the Exchequer was proposing to grant licences for the sale of wine at a lower rate than for the sale of beer, which was contrary to what was understood to be the intention at first. The light French wines were not to the taste of the English people, and why, then, was that concession to be made to the holders of wine licences? In night houses these wines would never be asked for. The strong spirituous wines would always be preferred.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the hon. Gentleman's objection seemed to turn upon the relaxation given under the clause to houses open at night. He was willing to insert words which would limit the operation of the clause to refreshment-houses that were not open at night. For that purpose he proposed to insert "not being a house open after ten o'clock at night."

MR. AYRTON said, that the Amendment would remove some of his objections to the clause, though not all of them.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to express a hope that he would receive from the right hon. Gentleman an assurance that he would place the beer seller, at least, on an equality with the wine seller.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not accede to the request of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. He (Mr. Forster) did not think that any advantage should be given to beerhouses under the present state of the Beer Act. There was little or no supervision exercised in regard to beerhouses.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, that the advantage in favour of the wine seller was only 5 per cent.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it was advisable to revise the whole system of beer-licences, but they were asked to place the seller of beer at a disadvantage with the seller of wine.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the sellers of what were called strong wines had eating-houses and were also beersellers. He had, however, no objection to introduce words that would place the wine and the beer licences upon the same footing. If it were competent to him, he would bring up words upon the Report. He could not, however, help remarking that the phantom of protection, although long ago buried, was constantly rising just enough to make itself visible.

MR. HENLEY said, that he, at all events, would not be a party to raising the sod which was now to keep down the ghost of protection.

MR. NEWDEGATE remarked, that the only ghost of protection which had made its appearance in the debate was the ghost of that protection which gave the preference to foreign over home produce.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that if the beerhouses and houses licensed for the sale of wine were to be placed on the same footing in respect of licences they ought also to be placed on the same footing with regard to supervision. He would remind the Committee that in the Bill of last year was contained a very strong power of supervision, and a person holding a wine licence might for an infraction of the law have his licence taken from him, and in certain cases it might be taken from the house. That was a supervision much needed with regard to beerhouses.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he could not agree that the responsibility in the matter should be shifted from the keeper of the house to the owner. It was a very wide principle to adopt.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, that the owner of the house was a much more effectual check on the misconduct of the person who held the house than would be any penalty which might be enforced under the Act.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 10 (Persons licensed to retail Beer not precluded from taking out Wine Licences),

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should be glad to know the reason for the insertion of the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that the clause was intended to remove doubts as to the construction of some words in the Wine Licences Act so as to make it certain that a person who held a wine licence might hold a beer licence also.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 11 to 14 were agreed to.

Clause 15 postponed.

Clause 16 (Duty on Racehorses to be paid for the year ending on 31st December, in 1862, and in any subsequent year),

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that it was intended to relieve the owners of racehorses. At present the racehorse duty for the year expired on the 5th of April, and it often happened that owners of such horses brought them out just before the 5th of April, so that they had to pay the duty twice in one year. The clause was intended to remove that difficulty.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 17.

Clause 18 (Persons dealing in Game without excise licence to be liable to penalty whether licensed by the justices or not),

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that it was intended to remove certain anomalies in the imposition of penalties on dealers in game for selling game without an excise licence.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 19.

Clause 20 (20 & 21 Vict. c. 40 s. 6, does not repeal 1 & 2 W. 4, c. 55, s. 31, with respect to Penalties under the illicit distillation Acts in Ireland),

MR. HENNESSY raised an objection to one justice being empowered to convict in cases of illicit distillation, and to impose so high a penalty as £100. He proposed that the word "one" should be omitted, and the words "two or more" justices inserted.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the spirit of the existing law was not changed by the clause; but a doubt having arisen as to the operation of the Act of last year it was thought desirable to restore in the present Bill the old law.

MR. CARDWELL stated that the clause had been introduced at the suggestion of the law officers of the Crown in order to remove a doubt that had arisen. In some parts of Ireland where illicit distillation most prevailed it was sometimes difficult to find two justices.

MR. HENLEY said, he for one objected to so much power being given to one justice.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 21 to 23.

Clause 24 (Power to Officers of Excise to examine Stills or Retorts kept by persons not distillers, rectifiers, or compounder of spirits or vinegar makers),

MR. HENNESSY observed, that by the 24th Clause any gentleman who kept a still or retort for scientific purposes would be subject to the visits of an exciseman.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the clause in no way altered the law as it stood.

MR. HENLEY said, there was hardly a gentleman's house in the country that had not a stillroom for the manufacture of rose water and things of that kind, and it would be very hard that such houses should be open to the examination of the exciseman. He suggested words that would exclude such cases from the operation of the clause.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would accept the words.

Clause, as amended, agreed to, as were also Clauses 25 to 36.

Clauses 37 to 40 inclusive postponed.

Clauses 41 to 44 negatived.

Clauses 45 to 47 agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Clauses from 48 to 53 disposed of subjects of some interest, but upon which he anticipated the Committee would agree. They had not so much financial objects in view as the relief of the persons affected, and he would explain them when they met again. Clauses 54 and 55 were given up; Clause 56 was of obvious utility; Clause 57 was of importance, and he wished to have the opinion of the House upon it; but he would not persevere with it, if it were thought that it should not be pressed under the circumstances. On Clauses 58 and 59 he did not think any special discussion would arise. The only point that would then remain for discussion, in addition to the Legacy and Succession Duties, related to the Land Tax Acts. That, he believed, would soon be disposed of; and he proposed to take up the Legacy and Succession Duties on Tuesday next.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Tuesday next at Twelve of the clock.

ROYAL ATLANTIC MAIL STEAM NAVIGATION COMPANY.

PETITION.

Petition of George O'Malley Irwin, praying for inquiry into alleged fraudulent practices committed by John Orrell Lever, Esquire (a Member of this House), and others, in reference to the Royal Atlantic Mail Steam Navigation Company, offered:—

MR. CONINGHAM: Sir, I rise for the purpose of presenting a petition from Mr. O'Malley Irwin similar to the one which I presented to the House a night or two ago, with this alteration, that the Petitioner seeks for an investigation instead of proposing a prosecution by the Attorney General.

Now, Sir, if I understand rightly the position in which I am placed, I am expected to express an opinion with reference to the petition which I present. [Cries of "No, no."] I believe, Sir, that I am right. I certainly was repeatedly told that a night or two ago—and from what you, Sir, have said, I am led to believe that I am justified in the statement which I have just made. That being the case, I now state why I think I am justified in the statement that there are prima facie grounds for inquiry. I have no hesitation whatever in stating that I believe so, and, should a discussion arise upon the question, I am fully prepared to state the grounds upon which I entertain that opinion.

MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Gentleman make any Motion?

MR. CONINGHAM: Yes, Sir, I now move that the petition be read by the clerk at the Table.

The Clerk read the Petition.

MR. CONINGHAM: Sir, I now move that this petition do lie on the Table.

MR. SPEAKER: Does any hon. Member second the Motion?

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: Sir, I rise to Order—I understand that the practice is that when a petition of this kind, making charges against an hon. Member (the hon. Member being present), has been read at the Table, the House would be guided in the course it might take by any statement which that hon. Member might think fit to make before any Motion is made with respect to the petition.

MR. ROEBUCK: I thought, Sir, that a Motion ought to be made first, and that when the Motion is made the hon. Member ought to be heard. I put it to you, Sir, whether some Motion ought not to be made upon a petition of this sort, and whether that Motion ought not to be made before the hon. Member is heard?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member for Brighton has moved that the petition do lie on the Table.

The Motion was seconded.

MR. SPEAKER put the Motion.

MR. LEVER: Mr. Speaker, I must claim the indulgence of the House for a few moments. I beg to state most distinctly and emphatically that there is not the slightest foundation for a single statement contained in the allegations of that petition. I, for one, should conceive that the House would be doing justice not only to me but to its own character if they would grant a Committee of investigation so as to afford me every opportunity of showing that there is not the slightest foundation for these charges. I should only be troubling the House and occupying its time unprofitably if I were to go into the whole details of this case; and it would then be merely a statement of my own. I am wishful, and anxious, and most desirous that this matter should have the fullest investigation. I only regret that I could not bring the question into a court of law as I did before, so that I might have an opportunity of prosecuting the person from whom the petition emanates for the misstatements and misrepresentations that have been publicly paraded throughout the whole country by him. With your permission I will just say this—that some time ago an action was tried which he lost; and that he is now passing through the Insolvent Debtors' Court to pay the expenses of those trials that have taken place. Those expenses, amounting to some hundreds of pounds, came out of my own pocket, he being without a shilling in the world. It is not right that I should be continually annoyed by a man of this description, without character, upon charges without the slightest shadow of foundation.

Mr. E. P. Bouverie

Under these circumstances, if the House desires it, I am prepared to go into the case. I do not want to weary the House, but if the House desires it, I could refer to certain documents that I have by me which give a complete answer to these charges. I think it would only be fair if a Committee of Inquiry were granted, and I, therefore, beg to move that a Committee of Inquiry be appointed.

MR. LEVER then bowed to the Chair, and withdrew from the House.

MR. CONINGHAM: I rise for the purpose of saying a few words. A statement has been made with respect to Mr. Irwin who has been charged by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield with forgery. The truth or falsehood of that charge is a question which is still under discussion, and against that charge Mr. Irwin has appealed, and is prepared to appeal. I think it necessary to state that fact to the House.

LORD JOHN MANNERS: The Motion is that the petition do lie on the Table. If it meets with the sanction of the House, I would propose as an Amendment that the matter be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. ROEBUCK:—I would ask the House not merely to refer this petition to a Select Committee, but to instruct the Committee to inquire, first, whether the matter is such that the House ought to take cognizance of it. If the accusations of that petition merely referred to the hon. Member for Galway in his private character, this House has nothing in the world to do with it. I say in justification of myself that these accusations come from a man who has been convicted of forgery. Now for the hon. Member for Brighton to tell me that that matter is now under discussion is to tell me that which is utterly futile and false. The trial took place in 1835, and the petitioner lay nine months in Kilmainham Gaol a convict under that conviction.

MR. CONINGHAM: I said that he appealed.

MR. ROEBUCK: We all know what the meaning of that phrase is. The man is a convict; he is a forger. He has brought actions against my hon. Friend the Member for Galway. He has been cast; and he is now going through the Insolvent Debtor's Court, because he is unable to pay the costs. At this present moment the whole of that matter is sub judice, and I say that this House would be most unworthily and improperly interfering if they were to allow this man to throw broadcast imputations in this manner. The hon. Member for Brighton has presented this petition, but he does not say that he is prepared to make a Motion for inquiry.

MR. CONINGHAM: I moved that the petition do lie on the Table.

MR. ROEBUCK: But that is just what I complain of. A petition is presented by the hon. Member who does not make a Motion for inquiry, but he merely moves that the petition be laid on the table. Now, I say, that it would be most unworthy of this House if they were to send this petition to a Select Committee without first and foremost directing the Committee to inquire whether this matter ought to be inquired into or not.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: Sir, I apprehend that the question now before the House is whether this petition should lie on the Table or not.

MR. ROEBUCK: That has been settled.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE: That question has been put from the Chair—but I have not yet heard you, Sir, put any Amendment. It appears to me that the correct course would be that the petition should in the first place be printed, so that the House may have an opportunity of seeing what the statements contained in it are, and then, on a future occasion, it will be open to the hon. Member for Brighton or the noble Lord (Lord John Manners), or the hon. Member for Galway himself, if they are desirous of inquiry, to move that the petition be referred to a Select Committee. It appears to me that that will be the time for discussing the question which has been raised by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield, whether this is a matter into which this House ought to inquire at all. But if we embark hastily and on the spur of the moment in an inquiry of this nature, we may find ourselves engaged in the investigation of matters with which we have no more to do than with the private matters of any hon. Member of this House. We have had petitions in the course of the last few years of a similar character presented to this House. A petition was presented by a noble Friend of mine, the Member for Haddingtonshire, eight or nine years ago, complaining in strong language of the conduct of Mr. George Hudson. That petition was signed by or on behalf of the shareholders of an important Railway Company; it was brought before the House, it was read, and it was laid upon the Table, but the House did not think it right to take any steps with reference to it. They considered that they were not competent to do so, and that it was beyond their province to inquire into the allegations which it contained. It is perfectly true that charges of a similar nature have often been inquired into, but the House will find that these cases have generally had reference to public Officers, or those connected with the public service, and, therefore, responsible to this House for their conduct. What I wish to impress upon the House is that they should not be in a hurry to take the course which has been suggested, namely, that of referring this case to a Select Committee. First, let us decide the question whether this petition is to be laid upon the Table or not—and if we do decide that it be laid upon the Table let us take care another day to consider it, and then determine whether we shall take any further proceedings with respect to it or not.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I think that the course which has been hitherto pursued has been perfectly regular; but I quite agree with my right hon. Friend that the House ought to take with deliberation and caution any future steps in this matter. The hon. Member for Brighton having given notice to the hon. Member accused, has brought regularly before the House this petition, which certainly contains grave charges against a Member of this House. The hon. Member accused immediately challenged inquiry, and denied the allegations. The House, however, will do well to consider, first, whether this is the sort of charge that it ought to inquire into; and, secondly, what precedents there may be in similar cases; so that I do not think that anything ought to be resolved upon to-day; and, further than that, the petition, if printed at all, ought to be printed only for the use of Members of this House. Formerly we were in the habit of printing petitions, which were justly complained of, on the ground that we were thereby circulating libels. Now, Sir, if this is to be a matter of inquiry, hon. Members ought to be in possession of the allegations; and for that purpose I certainly see no objection to our ordering this petition to be printed for the use of Members only. If it is understood that either the hon. Gentleman who presented this petition, or the noble Lord opposite, is ready to make a Motion to this House, they will be of course responsible, each for himself, in recommending that inquiry.

MR. CLAY: Sir, this House has always been exceedingly jealous of the character of its Members, whether the charges made against them refer to them in their public capacity or their private character. Now, the hon. Member for Sheffield has said that this petition ought not to be received because the petitioner had been convicted of forgery. But to me this objection scarcely seems valid, seeing that the forgery was condoned by the hon. Member having confessedly employed the petitioner afterwards.

MR. MALINS: Sir, the charges contained in this petition amount to imputations of personal fraud against an hon. Member of this House, and the House should be slow in erecting itself into a tribunal for the trial either of civil or of criminal cases. Now, Sir, suppose the hon. Member for Galway, being a trustee under a will or a settlement, had been guilty of a breach of trust amounting to fraudulent conduct, I would ask, would the House entertain any charge which might be made against him upon that point? Would it not rather say that the Courts of Equity were open in which the hon. Member might be proceeded against? In like manner, in the case of a criminal offence, the House would say, "Let the Member who is impugned be charged in a criminal court," and then, upon his conviction, the House would know how to deal with a man so convicted.

Sir, since I have been a Member of this House I have been a party to the expulsion of one Member (Mr. Sadleir), though at the present moment I cannot accurately remember for what offence particularly; but of this, Sir, I am certain, that that hon. Member, either by his own admission or by conviction before a proper tribunal, was shown to have been guilty of conduct derogatory to the character of a gentleman, and that conduct rendered him unworthy to sit in this House.

Now, Sir, if the present petition charging the hon. Member for Galway is to be entertained, let me ask in what capacity is this House to act? The charge contained in the petition is that the hon. Member, being the Director of a Company, has been guilty of fraudulent conduct in the course of his duties as such Director. That is a civil offence which might be made the subject of investigation in a civil court; and if the hon. Member were convicted of that offence I do not think this House would hesitate to adopt the same course as was pursued in the case I mentioned of Mr. Sadleir. I submit respectfully that if the House were to enter into the investigation of a civil offence of this kind it would be going far beyond its jurisdiction, and would be embarking on a course of conduct which would be fraught with the greatest possible inconvenience. Therefore, Sir, in the present state of things, I cannot accede to the Motion that this Petition be referred at once to a Select Committee; but I do concur with the noble Lord in thinking that this House should consider what precedents exist on the subject, and that for the present the House should be satisfied with either receiving or rejecting the petition.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, there was an expression which fell from the hon. Member for Hull, which no doubt that hon. Member on reflection would regret, because in a preliminary discussion like the present nothing should be said to prejudice an hon. Member who declared that he was anxious that his conduct should be investigated. The hon. Member, noticing something which had been said about Mr. Irwin's character, said that the hon. Member for Galway was not in a position to take advantage of that, because the hon. Member for Galway had condoned it by employing him afterwards. Now, Sir, it is not strictly fair to say that, because, according to the evidence which was given before the Select Committee of last year, it would appear that when the hon. Member for Galway became first acquainted with Mr. Irwin, about two or three years ago, he was utterly ignorant of Mr. Irwin's antecedents; and how was the hon. Member to know that this person was some twenty years ago convicted of forgery?

MR. CLAY: Sir, I rise for the purpose of explaining that I had no wish, in what I said, to say anything unfair towards the hon. Member for Galway.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, I think that the general feeling of this House is that the course which has been suggested by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Kilmarnock is the best and the safest. It can hardly be desirable to refer this matter to a Select Committee until the House has had an opportunity of considering the allegations contained in this petition. Therefore, Sir, after the petition shall have been laid on the table, I will move that it be printed for the use of Members of this House.

MR. PAULL: Sir, I do not think it right to give any further publicity to the petition which has been presented to this House, and which has already been read by the Clerk at the Table. It is quite clear that charges are made in that petition which it is perfectly competent for the ordinary tribunals to take cognizance of, and I think that the House should be exceedingly cautious how it encourages persons, bankrupt in character and paupers in purse, and who have exhausted the powers of the ordinary tribunals, to come here and throw on the table any charges they please. Under these circumstances, Sir, I am of opinion that this petition should now be rejected.

COLONEL FRENCH: Sir, I do not see why this House should depart from its usual course in this case. According to the rules of the House, this petition would go before the Printing Committee, who, if they think proper, will have it printed; and if not, any hon. Member who says that he is about to bring forward a definite Motion in respect to it might move that the petition be printed. Therefore, Sir, if the hon. Member for Brighton, upon his own responsibility, chooses to give notice that he will bring the matter forward, he can move that the petition be printed.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the said Petition do lie upon the Table."

The House divided:—Ayes 99; Noes 78: Majority 21.

MR. G. W. HOPE: I take this opportunity of stating that, although I have voted in favour of the petition lying on the Table I have done so, not because I entertain any good opinion of the case of the petitioner, but because I felt it impossible, considering the general principle on which petitions are received, to afford to Members of the House an immunity which is not afforded to other persons. I may also add, that I have voted in support of the petition upon the understanding that the hon. Member who presented it was responsible to a certain degree for the allegations contained in it. I have done so upon the understanding which seemed to be general on the last discussion, that before any hon. Member presented a petition he should, to a certain extent, satisfy himself that there were prima facie grounds in that petition for the allegations which it contained, and in the belief that if the hon. Member for Brighton thought that a prima facie case against the hon. Member for Galway existed, he would, as a necessary consequence, be prepared to move that further inquiry into the subject should be instituted. I now, therefore, wish to know whether the hon. Member for Brighton is prepared to follow up his previous Motion by moving for further inquiry?

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member ought himself to have concluded with a Motion.

MR. CONINGHAM: It was my full intention to have done so, but I did not wish to take any step in the matter hastily. I thought that this was the first necessary step, but it is my intention to move that the petition be printed and referred to a Select Committee. I, therefore, give that notice now.

MR. SPEAKER: As this is a matter of privilege, it is competent for the hon. Member now to move that the petition be printed. The course which has hitherto been pursued in cases analagous to this has been to move, without notice, that the petition be printed, and also that it be printed for the use of the Members of this House only.

MR. CONINGHAM: Then, Sir, I now beg leave to move that this petition be printed for the use of the Members of this House only.

COLONEL FRENCH: I do not wish to oppose the reception of the petition, but I take this course on the distinct understanding that the hon. Member is to make a further Motion upon this subject.

CAPTAIN JERVIS: Mr. Speaker, I think it necessary that something should be said for those hon. Members who have gone into a division against the hon. Member for Brighton. It has been distinctly stated both here and out of doors that there is a sort of wish to protect Members of this House when charges of this nature are made. I am totally unconnected with the Galway Contract, and I wish to say why it was that I went into the lobby against the reception of this petition. I cannot see why a petition against a Member of this House should be received, which in the case of a private individual would be rejected. In the present case, a man who has been convicted of the crime of forgery has sought to blacken the character of the hon. Member for Galway, with whom, I may state in passing, that I am unacquainted, and I do certainly think that the hon. Member is entitled to the same protection which a person who is not a Member of this House would have a right to expect when accused by a man whose word is held not to be entitled to belief in a court of law. Let the matter go clearly before the country. If it were not the case that it was a petition against the hon. Member for Galway, and in connection with the Galway contract, we should never have had a word of this discussion. It is entirely an attempt on the part of those who are opposed to this contract to bring the subject forward. ["No, no!"] I assert it most distinctly. It is in order to blacken the character of the hon. Member for Galway, and it is on that account that I myself, and many others, have gone into the lobby. I hope that this petition will not be printed.

MR. CONINGHAM: I beg to say, in reply to the concluding observations of the hon. and gallant Gentleman who has just sat down, that if he referred to me, I give the statement a most flat denial. I had no concern with, and was in no way personally interested in, the Galway contract. I have brought this matter forward solely on public grounds. The Committee upstairs would not entertain the application to have the matter heard before them, and, therefore, I felt it my duty, as a Member of Parliament, to bring the matter forward; and it is my intention on Monday to move that it be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. G. W. HOPE: I must remark that in the discussions in the Committee upon the Galway contract, the view which I took was favourable to the maintenance of that contract. It was so throughout, and I made Motions in the Committee to that effect. So far from being desirous to uphold the charges of the petitioner, I was of opinion that he had no case at all, and I stated that opinion.

The Speaker put the Motion that the Petition be printed for the use of Members only, and the same was agreed to.

Ordered, That the said Petition be printed for the use of Members only.

NEW SOUTH WALES.—QUESTION.

MR. MARSH said, he would beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, If any Petitions to Her Majesty have been received from the Inhabitants of the District of the Clarence and Richmond Rivers, praying for separation from the Colony of New South Wales?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, that the Petitions in question have not arrived, but they were understood to be on the way hither.

Captain Jervis

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSIONERS. QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Why the Ecclesiastical Returns, and the Return of the attendances of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, ordered by this House last July, had not yet been laid upon the Table of this House?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he had made inquiries at the Office of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and the information furnished to him was that the Returns ordered in July last were made in August, at the end of the Session. It should be recollected that an Order of that House for Returns was valid only for the Session, and that unless it was renewed in the following Session it was no longer operative.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR stated that when, not long ago, he inquired at the Library of the House, the Returns had not then been received.

COURTS OF JUSTICE BUILDING ACT (MONEY) BILL.—QUESTION.

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it would be recollected that early in the Session two Bills were introduced for the purpose of carrying into effect the recommendations of the Royal Commission on the concentration of the Courts of Law and Equity. The estimates on which those Bills were based were—First, that the total expenditure would not exceed £1,500,000; and, secondly, that the sum required would be furnished by the Suitors' Fee Fund. One of the Bills had already passed through both Houses of Parliament, and was now waiting for the Royal Assent. The other stood on the Paper for consideration in Committee that evening. It now appeared, however, from a printed Minute recently circulated, that, in the opinion of the Treasury, the total expenditure would be, not £1,500,000, but £2,000,000; while, on the other hand, the sum expected to come from the Suitors' Fee Fund would not amount to more than £1,000,000, showing that the charge upon the country, instead of being nothing at all, would certainly be not less than £1,000,000. Under these circumstances he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether it is his intention to proceed further with a Bill which now so materially affects the finances of the country; and, if so, whether he will have any objection to postpone the consideration of the Bill in Committee until some day when a discussion can be taken upon it?

MR. COWPER said, it would be desirable that the House should have an opportunity of discussing the points raised by the noble Lord. The Bill stood for consideration in Committee that evening, and if there should be time for discussing it he should certainly bring it on; but, if not, he should have to name some other day.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he could name an hour after which he would not proceed with the Bill that evening?

MR. COWPER said, he would not take it after twelve o'clock.

MR. HENLEY said, he must remind the right hon. Gentleman that a body of evidence which bore very much upon this matter was delivered only that morning; and, as there had been a forenoon sitting, it was impossible that hon. Members could have had the advantage of reading it. He, therefore, trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would agree at once to postpone the Bill till some other day, as it could not be properly discussed that evening.

MR. COWPER said, that as there was so little prospect of the Bill coming on at a reasonably early hour that evening, he would at once postpone it until Monday.

THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

QUESTION.

In reply to a Question from Mr. T. J. MILLER,

MR. COWPER stated, that the Commissioners appointed to consider the subject of the Embankment of the Thames had nearly completed their Report, which might be expected in the course of next week, and he undertook to say that no delay would be allowed to occur between the presentation of the Report and its being laid on the Table of the House, together with the Evidence.

CESSION OF SARDINIA.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. KINGLAKE said, he rose to ask the Foreign Secretary whether the Governments of France and Italy continued to deny that the King of Italy had entertained a project for ceding to France the Island of Sardinia, and whether the truth of any such denials was confirmed or shaken by the information which Her Majesty's Government might have received from other quarters, and to make a Motion on the subject? He had determined, at first, to depart from his intention of bringing the question forward in consequence of the denial addressed to the Sardinian Chamber by Baron Ricasoli, and the strong denial addressed to the Government of Her Majesty by the Government of France; but, owing to a recent act on the part of the French Government, he now felt it to be his duty to proceed with it. The question was essentially an English question, and if any European interest attached to it, the reason was to be found in the fact that English interests were so deeply involved that all the Powers who desired the welfare of England naturally felt some anxiety on the subject. He would not weary the House with any remarks on the agricultural or the mineral wealth of the Island of Sardinia, and his reason for such abstinence was that he entertained no feeling of jealousy with respect to the material prosperity of France. He believed that the richer France was the better it would be for us; and if there were nothing in the cession of the Island of Sardinia except a mere acquisition of land, and of the advantages which land could give, he should be the last person to find fault with it. But he thought it would be seen that the possession of the Island of Sardinia went necessarily to a great extent to secure the control of the Mediterranean. More than half a century ago that question was anxiously considered by Lord Nelson, who had left upon record in his correspondence a most solemn declaration as to the enormous importance to England of the control of the Mediterranean. Hon. Members would all recollect the phrase in which he expressed his longing for more frigates, when he said that the words would be found written upon his heart if he were then to die. The energy he had brought to bear upon the subject of Sardinia was sufficient to remind them of that expression. Over and over again Lord Nelson had referred to the subject. In one letter he said, "What a noble harbour! The world cannot produce a finer." In another he said, "The island has a harbour capable of holding our whole fleet, and if it were in the possession of a great naval Power, no fleet could pass to the eastward." "Malta," he said, in a third letter, "is not to be named in the same breath with Sardinia;" and again, "This is the most important island as a naval and military station in the Mediterranean." He said, "the more I know of it the more I am convinced of its unspeakable value from its position and naval resources." He said, "The King of Sardinia cannot keep it; if France gets it she commands the Mediterranean." Then he said, in another letter, "Sardinia never must even risk its falling into the hands of France." It was rather curious that in part of the correspondence to which he had adverted, and for which he was indebted to Mr. Forster, who had collected Lord Nelson's correspondence—in one of those letters Lord Nelson took occasion to state that at that very time the island had in it French intriguers, and he mentioned a report that Napoleon Bonaparte had gone to the island for the purpose of effecting an exchange of Parma and Piacenza, in order to bring it into the possession of France. If the possession of the island of Sardinia was important in the time of the First Napoleon, it was now vitally so, for every one must know that the importance of the Mediterranean to us had since then been enormously increased. Our communications with India, now a recognized possession of the British Crown, were to a great extent carried on no longer by the Cape, but by the Mediterranean. It could not, therefore, be endured that our communications with the Mediterranean should be imperilled or held by sufferance. Even, independently of the danger which would affect our communications in the Mediterranean, the mere fact that these would be affected by the cession of that island, an enormous change in the distribution of naval power was of itself sufficient to make this country resolute and determined to prevent any such change, because it was obvious that the sufficiency of our naval resources, the sufficiency of our harbours, ships, and seamen, was not a positive thing, but only a relative amount as compared with the resources of our neighbours, or, to speak more plainly, with the naval resources of France; and it was plain, therefore, that if by any operation similar to that which took place last year France should succeed in acquiring the Island of Sardinia, she would be inflicting on us a loss—a relative loss, but still a loss as far as our interests were concerned, equivalent to having endured a great naval disaster. They all knew that the First Napoleon made it one of the great objects of his life to reduce the Mediterranean to what he called "a French lake." Well, that object of Napoleon was a perfectly natural, and in a sense a perfectly legitimate one; because during the whole time of his occupying the imperial throne he was engaged in a flagrant war with England, and it was his right—nay, in a sense his duty—to do England all the harm he could. Consistently, therefore, with that position of his, he sought to make the Mediterranean "a French lake," with the view as far as possible to injure the country with which he was at war. But what he had now to remark was that when they were not at war with France, at a time when they were at peace with our neighbour, the same kind of effort was going on to obtain for France the control of the Mediterranean.

What, he would ask, was the meaning of the phrase, to make the Mediterranean "a French lake?" Why, the meaning of it was that France, by acquiring in some places actual dominion and in other places a dominant influence, should creep on, and on, and on, until no vessel could go into the Mediterranean Sea without having, as it were, to run the gauntlet between lands either under the actual dominion or control of France. Now, what progress had already been made in that direction? His hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had most properly kept his eye on what was doing on the coast of Africa. There they all knew there had been indicated a great desire on the part of Spain to possess herself of Tetuan. The possession of Gibraltar was to a great extent dependent on that of Tangier, and the independence of Tangier was threatened by the occupation by Spain of Tetuan. Since the last war almost the whole of that coast till they approached Tunis had become in the strictest sense of the term a French dominion; and, then, last year a great stride was made in the same direction by the acquisition of the country of Nice and the seaboard in that direction. It was obvious that upon its being known that France was aiming at an object of the kind no English Government could stand idle. They knew by the papers laid before the House that he was speaking of last year—no sooner had Government acquired knowledge or suspicion of the course that was being taken than a vigorous measure, he would not say was executed, that would be too strong a term, but a very wise and vigorous measure was conceived by the noble Lord the Minister for Foreign Affairs. He wrote a stringent despatch to Sir James Hudson, stating that certain rumours had come to his ears but that the acquisition by France of that island would be a serious derangement of the balance of power in the Mediterranean, and that no further acquisition of territory by France could be viewed with indifference by Europe. The noble Lord followed up these stringent words by a wisely-conceived instruction addressed to Sir James Hudson, in which he called upon him, and he afterwards instructed him, to write a formal note on the subject; he was to call on Count Cavour to give a formal engagement binding the King of Sardinia not to cede any more territory to France. He said that was a wisely-conceived instruction; but, unfortunately, it was answered in a way which, as events had occurred, was far from satisfactory. Count Cavour answered that he had just been making a speech in the Sardinian Chamber, in which he had declared that even the temptation of acquiring Venice would not induce him to part with an inch of the Italian territory. Well, now, that reference to his speech which Count Cavour wished our Government should receive in substitution of the formal engagement which the noble Lord had demanded, fell grievously short of the demand; because, in the first place, that equivocal expression, "Italian soil," might be conceived as not applying to the Island of Sardinia; and then there was a very important difference between a reference to a speech and an actual diplomatic engagement. Count Cavour was now no more, and there existed no such diplomatic engagement as had been demanded by the noble Lord on which he could call Sardinia to account. The noble Lord last year was not content to make the declaration at the Court of Turin, but he also instructed Earl Cowley to state to the French Government that these rumours had reached his ears, that they were disbelieved; and Earl Cowley received from M. Thouvenel the most positive denial that there was any truth in those rumours. The expression was very strong; he called it an abjuration; M. Thouvenel said it was quite preposterous; it could not be expected that for Sardinia, so barren of resources, France would incur the risk of war. A very curious circumstance occurred—ten days after receiving that despatch the noble

Lord again addressed Earl Cowley on the subject. He said those rumours had again reached him, and again Earl Cowley was distinctly instructed to bring the subject under the notice of the French Government. No doubt, that was a disagreeable duty for Earl Cowley to perform, because, having received that previous solemn denial from M. Thouvenel, it might be thought awkward to have to return to the subject within so short a time, and again to state that Her Majesty's Government were still suffering anxiety in regard to it. How Earl Cowley executed that duty they did not know, for there was a hiatus in the despatches at that point. It might easily be conceived that the despatch explaining the mode in which he had performed that task had been withheld on good grounds; but it was rather unfortunate for Earl Cowley that it should be so without some reference being made to the missing despatch, because one might be led to imagine, what was certainly not likely to be the fact in Earl Cowley's case—namely, that there had been on his part something like a flinching from the performance of a painful duty. Well, those despatches were long since laid on the Table, whereby the opinion of the House upon them might be said to have been invited. He thought the House was somewhat to blame in the matter; and he was quite willing to take his own share of that blame for not calling public attention to the purport of the despatches, because they left off in an unsatisfactory manner, informing them that the Government was anxious on the subject, without containing anything tending to show that that feeling had been removed. That was the more to be regretted because he was disposed to think the silence—the dangerous silence—of the House of Commons might have been one of the causes that induced the French Government to take the steps which it afterwards took. If the House had performed their duty more vigilantly it was not improbable that those steps might have been prevented. The result was that since the spring there had been very strong ground for supposing that France had been advancing towards the attainment of its original object—the acquisition of Sardinia.

In testing the accuracy of that supposition they were justified in looking at the anterior position of those two Powers, Sardinia and France, as, if he might so speak, the buyer and the seller. They must remember that those were the very two Powers which, the one by ceding and the other by accepting the surrender of territory, occasioned a great distraction last year in Europe. And one could not help feeling that the Island of Sardinia was an enormous temptation to France, and that France had the means of so tempting the King of Sardinia that, a priori and in the absence of all engagements, it was possible that the Sovereign who made up his mind to surrender Savoy might, under similar motives, be induced to surrender the Island of Sardinia. To try the question by its probabilities, if such an engagement had really been entered into between those two Governments what might they expect to find? Why, that the people of the Island of Sardinia were disturbed by the notion that under some sort of compulsion, which they could not well understand, it was their fate to be surrendered to France. They might also expect to find some preparations going on in that island for that wonderful piece of legerdemain which the Imperial statesmen were accustomed to call a plébiscite. They might further expect, a little later, that there would be a strenuous denial by France of any intention to effect a transaction of the kind; that the King of Sardinia, emboldened by the vehemence of that denial, might imagine for a moment that he was really a free man and assert his intention to hold his own; but that the next step would be a rebuke addressed to him by France for daring to fancy that he was free to refuse the cession of the island in question. That was what they might expect to find, applying the canon of construction of which he had spoken the other night in respect to the conduct of those two Powers. Well, he was prepared to say that all that, and more than this, had already occurred. In the Island of Sardinia agitation had been going on which led the people to suppose that they were necessarily and inevitably to become French. He had a copy of an able newspaper published at Cagliari, which was written exactly in the same painful tone which was so distressing last year in the case of Savoy and Nice. The writer hoped and feared, but was apparently convinced, that by some process which he could not prevent the island was to be ceded. That process had, indeed, been carried so far that even the humble official of the Government was brought to the belief that the Sardinian uniform he wore was the last of the kind he would ever have, and that the time was not distant when the islanders must necessarily become French. It would be interesting to know from the noble Lord what accounts he had from the English Consul at Cagliari, a man, as he was told, of high character and great ability. The reports of that gentleman would be exceedingly useful either in dissipating our alarms, if they were idle, or in furnishing a better foundation for them if well founded. It was unwise to suppose that the fears of the people of Sardinia were no element for consideration. When transactions of that kind were going on the instinct of the people concerned enabled them to know pretty well what was about to take place; and he did say that the sensations of the victims were in this case much deserving of our attention. No one, perhaps, could be supposed to be less acquainted with what was passing in Europe than an humble shopkeeper—say at Chambery or Nice; and no one could be supposed to be better acquainted with what was passing in Europe than the noble Lord at the head of the Government. Yet, last year, those humble men had an instinct which told them with greater truth and certainty than the noble Lord was able to attain that they were about to be handed over to France. Turning from the Island of Sardinia to Turin, the belief in the fact that an agreement of some kind had been signed had been so strongly entertained by those who were so placed as to have the means of knowledge, that it would be incorrect to speak of it as a mere rumour. It so happened, however, that the sources of information on which that rumour depended were not within his reach, and, therefore, he would not even advert to the date of the agreement, nor to the names by which it was supposed to have been signed. Perhaps before that discussion terminated his lack of information on that head might be supplied by others. But the House should remember that the understanding of which they had suspicions was not of a perfectly definite kind, fixing the day on which it would take effect; and he could also easily believe that to a great extent the terms in which it was intended to be carried into full operation might have been left uncertain. They ought, likewise, to bear in mind that Count Cavour, with a sensitiveness which he thought honourable to him, was accustomed throughout all the transactions relating to Savoy and Nice to flinch from avowing the whole extent to which he had engaged himself. Count

Cavour had also this peculiarity—that he was very much in the habit, he would not say improperly, of giving but half confidences to other people, and would instruct the man who was acting under him as far as was necessary for his guidance, but would not tell him a whit more.

He would now state to the House what he believed to be the real extent to which Count Cavour was engaged in negotiations for the cession of the Island of Sardinia to the Emperor of the French. Count Cavour, as he was informed, put himself in communication with a gentleman, whose name would be well known to Her Majesty's Ministers and to Europe generally. He was not at present at liberty to mention it himself; but he believed he should obtain permission to do so to one of Her Majesty's Ministers should it be necessary. Count Cavour told that gentleman to make inquiries—personal inquiries—in the Island of Sardinia, with a view to ascertain what progress the French were making with the arrangements for a cession of the island. Not unnaturally, the gentleman to whom these instructions were addressed, said, "What progress have you made with negotiations? Is the island to be ceded?" Count Cavour's answer was, "The Emperor of the French is always pressing me. Hitherto I have held out." Well, the gentleman, as instructed, went to the Island of Sardinia. He there ascertained that the people had been worked upon in the way which he had already described to the House, and he also learned that the process for drawing the island to the French Empire had been that of constituting on the island itself two Committees of annexation. And now he would tell the House who had been performing that singular duty. His hon. Friend the Member for Tamworth would not, he was sure, be unwilling to bear the odium of being considered one of the detective officers engaged in bringing those transactions to view; and, pursuing the analogy of the expression, he thought he might say that the gentleman who was constructing these Committees of annexation in the Island of Sardinia was one well known to the police. He was no other than M. Pietri—Senator Pietri—the very man who conducted universal suffrage in Savoy and Nice. Well, so much for the Island of Sardinia; so much for Turin. He now came to Paris, and he found that towards the close of the Session one of the bureaux, as they were called—which were certain sections of the House working with closed doors—was engaged in considering what would be called here "the Naval Estimates." It was remarked by one of the deputies that those Naval Estimates were on an enormous scale, and that the ports of France were clearly insufficient for the reception of so great a navy as France was contemplating. Thereupon, as he was informed, the General who in that bureau represented the Government said that it was very droll, but France was engaged in negotiations which would have the effect of putting her in possession of additional ports, and that there were to be additional ports in the Mediterranean. If there were any other ports in the Mediterranean which they expected to acquire, he hoped the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary would be able to tell the House what ports they were, if not those in the Island of Sardinia. Then, he was told of another fact, which was this—that in the Ministry of Marine an inquiry was ordered into the capacity of the port of Cagliari for the reception of vessels of war. He thought, that when he had put together all these converging circumstances—when the Island of Sardinia expected to be ceded—when they found the Prime Minister of the Kingdom of Sardinia in exactly that kind of agony which his predecessor was suffering last year—and when they found France, while denying a proposed cession, yet going on in the same way as if a cession was to take place—he had succeeded in showing, if not that an arrangement existed—and he did not go so far as that—certainly that the most serious grounds for uneasiness and anxiety on the part of this country at present existed. It was not long since Baron Ricasoli addressed the Sardinian Chamber in a speech in which in almost proud terms he stated that he knew not of any portion of Italian soil which Sardinia would yield. He had reason for thinking that, at the same time, there were addressed to Her Majesty's Government such earnest and positive denials on the part of the French Government as succeeded in producing something very like a boliof—perhaps a complete belief—that under those circumstances, at least, the idea of a cession had been adjourned. He had not been willing, therefore, to raise any discussion in that House which might be injurious; and under that feeling he had determined to abstain from bringing the question forward. But no sooner had the denials of Baron Ricasoli and the French Government taken effect than exactly the process of last year went on again, and the French Government returned to its enterprize. He held in his hand a rebuke which La Patrie, the official organ of France, addressed to Baron Ricasoli for his denial. He was very reluctant to read anything to the House; but, as that must be regarded as an official statement of the French Government, he would venture to do so. It was as follows:—

“M. Ricasoli has also declared ‘that the Government of the King did not know of a palm of Italian territory which it could cede.’ By these words, no doubt, the Prime Minister only meant to allude to accomplished facts, to retrospective acts. Nevertheless, in order to prevent any of the truth of principles from being lost sight of, we think it our duty to remark that it has always been admitted that a nation could, without compromising its independence, without failing in its dignity, and taking counsel only of its own interests, voluntarily make territorial cessions. Does not history in modern times justify and furnish example of numerous and similar cessions? . . . However noble and honourable may be the sentiments expressed by M. Ricasoli—declarations so absolute as those which he has uttered, and which could not prevail in public law, would be an invincible obstacle to those transactions which (dans l'ordre politique) two countries always could, and always can freely accomplish.”

He believed that the matter did not end with that official rebuke, for, unless he was much misinformed, M. Thouvenel addressed an official note to M. Ricasoli, complaining of the fact that he had repudiated all idea of making any further cession of territory to France. The spirit in which the French Government was disposed to act in the matter had been laid down in an extract copied into a paper which they all had on their table that morning. The Revue Contemporaine was a journal not only founded and subsidized by the French Government, but which evidently received its inspirations from the same source, and its last number contained the following observations on the annexation of the Island of Sardinia:—

“We had hoped to possess some day the Island of Sardinia, which would be so useful a half-way resting place to Algeria, offering us excellent timber for our navy and good harbours of refuge for our vessels. The Island of Sardinia is the continuation of Corsica; it is an island more French than Italian, where the people love France, and feel that their happiness lies with her, and where the annexation would be voted with enthusiasm, were the island, either by necessity or chance, to be relieved of its duties towards the Crown of Italy. And, now, here is M. Ricasoli extinguishing our patriotic dreams, and depriving us of a hope similar to that which he entertains regarding Venice. It is true that certain circumstances may arise calculated to oblige the Italian Government to modify its programme a little with respect to France, and induce it to establish a happy distinction between Sardinian territory and Italian territory—two things which are, indeed, very distinct. We do not believe that the Government of the Emperor will ever claim this second Corsica either by threats or force, although it is so essential to the preservation of the sister island in the case of a conflict in the Mediterranean; but our Government would certainly not refuse it if courteously offered, especially if the population, on being consulted, were to answer by an almost unanimous vote, like Nice and Savoy. In order to preserve the Island of Sardinia, which no more belongs to Turin than Corsica belonged to Genoa, the Italians should, therefore, above all, avoid offering it to us; that is their business.”

No doubt, if the annexation were carried out, M. Pietri would obtain another unanimous vote, recollecting that he had performed a similar duty at Nice with such zeal that, according to M. Mocquard, the number of votes in favour of annexation considerably exceeded the whole number of voters. He had said enough, he hoped, to justify the anxiety he felt upon the matter, and which he had endeavoured to convey to the House. He might point to the despatches of the English Consul in Sardinia, and to the negotiations which had been going on during the summer on the subject. It was unsafe to rely on the moderation of France. He did not believe that when the Emperor of the French used moderate expressions he was always misrepresenting himself, for there were often occasions when he desired that matters should pass off as quietly as possible. The truth was that, having engaged in transactions of this kind, he succeeded in interesting a great number of persons in his plans, and when he was willing to recede he was driven forward by his own ideas fermenting in the minds of other men. Last year, when he outraged Europe by the annexation of Savoy and Nice, he did so on a momentary impulse upon the suggestion of a mere soldier who was not competent to advise him on state affairs. But on his mere suggestion that his credit with the army would be imperilled if the annexation did not take place he gave way. If a similar suggestion were addressed to him by the French navy, and nothing was more probable, with regard to the annexation of Sardinia, it would be absolutely necessary that he should be sustained in resisting any such annexation by the certainty as to the light in which such a cession would be regarded in this country. He repeated that they could not trust either the moderation of France or the firmness of Ricasoli, or any other Italian gentleman. A firmer or more honourable man than Ricasoli did not exist; but he very much doubted whether he had yet come into full possession of all the humiliations which awaited him as the legatee of Count Cavour. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Hear, hear!] He did not yet know all that Count Cavour had agreed to do. He hoped that Sardinia would never be annexed to France. He did not believe that the noble Viscount at the head of the Government would ever let history say of him that while he was Prime Minister of England and in time of Peace there was endured such a displacement of the naval powers of the countries of Europe as must be grievously prejudicial to England, as must endanger her communication by way of the Mediterranean, and make a great stride towards placing France in possession of that control of the Mediterranean which had always been the main object of the Bonapartist policy.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies of any further Correspondence which may have passed respecting the Cession to France of the Island of Sardinia,'—instead thereof."

SIR ROBERT PEEL: Sir, I hope the House will allow me to second the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend, and I am sure I do but express the feeling of the House when I say that it has listened with pleasure and pride to the speech of my hon. and learned Friend. I can well understand the grounds which have induced my hon. and learned Friend to bring forward this question under our notice before the close of the Session, because it is quite evident, from the repeated denials respecting this alleged cession of Sardinia to France, that there is and must have been some foundation for the apprehensions that have alarmed Italy and Europe, and not only Italy and Europe, but England in particular. This a question that directly affects this country and the power of England, inasmuch as we must look at this annexation in a different light from the annexations of last year. England was not directly concerned in those annexations, but protested against them as one of the great Powers of Europe. As regards the bucaniering annexation of St. Domingo by Spain, it is clear that America's misfortune has been Spain's opportunity. Then, again, there is the question of Tetuan. Those, however, are all matters affecting Europe; but the cession of the Island of Sardinia affects this country immediately. It is a matter of great importance to us, and if there are grounds for this apprehension—if this annexation were accomplished, it would strike the most severe blow against the maritime power and legitimate influence of England that has been inflicted for fifty years. That naval supremacy, for which Nelson and other great men fought and bled and conquered would be imperilled, and the position which every English Government has taken up is that the independence of the Island of Sardinia is essentially necessary for the commercial interests and naval power of Great Britain. My hon. Friend has told us what the position of Sardinia is. Hon. Members, if they refer to the map, will see that Sardinia is the largest island in the Mediterranean, that it is larger than Sicily. [Mr. ROXBURGH: No!] I quote from a book lately published. At all events, its position is most remarkable. It spreads out from Corsica to the centre of the Mediterranean. It is half way between France, Spain, Italy, and the coast of Barbary. It is the half-way house of France, and has two magnificent ports, La Maddalena, on the north, and Cagliari, on the south. My hon. Friend has quoted the language of Nelson on this subject, and it cannot be too strongly impressed on Her Majesty's Government. Nelson writes to Lord St. Vincent in December, 1803. He says that Sardinia is the finest island in the Mediterranean, that its harbours are fit for arsenals, and capacious enough for the whole navy. He says, in 1804, "I have written to Lord Hobart to say that Sardinia is worth a hundred Malas, and that it has the finest man-of-war harbour in Europe." On the 17th of September he wrote another letter to Lord Hobart, to say that, "Sardinia is the summum bonum of everything valuable to us in the Mediterranean." These opinions of Lord Nelson justify the most serious apprehensions as to the danger to this country if Sardinia should be seized by France. But there is something in the way of such a cession. There are treaties. I know that in those days treaties are of very little value. But there are treaties, and there is a distinct treaty regulation that binds this Island of Sardinia to Savoy. In 1720, by the Treaty of London, to which France, England, Holland, Savoy, and Sardinia, were parties, Spain gave up Sardinia, which she then held. An arrangement was made by which the Island of Sardinia was ceded to Savoy, and Savoy gave up Sicily—which she held under the Treaty of Utrecht—to Naples, by which the Kingdom of Naples became the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies. This treaty was confirmed by the Treaty of Vienna. But the Emperor Napoleon wants to annul the Treaty of Vienna. He demands that satisfaction of Europe, and he hopes that Europe will not interfere. But this treaty is the charter-paper of Europe, and without the consent of the Great Powers we cannot allow one Power to monopolize the authority of doing all this. There is only one hon. Gentleman in this House who supports the policy of the Emperor Napoleon. I refer to the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Bright) who blew his trumpet so loudly at the Mansion-house the other night. I regret the absence of that hon. Gentleman, as I was very anxious to address some observations to him on this subject. He is the only man here who applauded this conduct of Louis Napoleon. Last year, I recollect the pain and grief I felt when I heard the hon. Member for Birmingham say:—"Savoy! Perish Savoy!" He said that, politically speaking, the possession of Savoy was worthless. France and Switzerland both said that it was a matter of vital importance. But later in the year the hon. Member for Birmingham said, as regards the map of Europe and the limitations of States, that that was not worth one minute's consideration. This Socialist view of the rights of others was happily not re-echoed by nor shared in by the people of England, who desire to respect the rights of others, but at the same time are anxious that there should be maintained that balance of power which is just and legitimate. About the same time I was very much struck with some observations, which, as it appeared to me, so admirably expressed the feelings of this country in respect to the policy of France, and the danger resulting from the annexation of Savoy and Nice, that I ask permission of the House to quote them. There appeared in The Times newspaper, in March, 1860, this sentence—

Sir Robert Peel

"This act must leave upon every man's mind a conviction that there is no safety, except in continual watchfulness and in armed preparation, against the aggression of a Sovereign who thus seizes upon the possessions of a friendly Power, and then challenges approval, and talks of equity and claims the assent of Europe to his act."

That is a sentence which, I am certain, finds an echo in the heart of every man in this country, and it is because we feel that we are dealing with a subtle and dangerous man, always designing how to carry out the object he has in view, that I urge this vigilance on the Government, and desire, with my hon. and learned Friend, to impress its necessity on the House and on the country. Now I ask the Government are there any just and legitimate grounds of apprehension in this matter? Over and over again we have had denials that anything was intended; and I should be inclined to regard those denials, but for the repeated proofs we have had of the principles which actuate and influence not only Louis Napoleon, but the Imperial policy of France. The noble Lord at the head of the Government has found out whom he has to deal with in dealing with Louis Napoleon, and if you cast your eyes around Europe at this moment you see abundant confirmation of the danger in the distrust prevailing at the uncertain position of affairs. That is our justification for submitting this subject at the present moment to the consideration of Parliament. Some people may say that we are handling very delicate questions, and that we ought not to allude to these foreign affair matters in the House of Commons at this moment, when the situation of things is so delicate. The hon. Member for Birmingham said so the other night. Such was not always the opinion of the noble Lord at the head of the Government. I recollect that when he was in Opposition, he did not consider what might be the position of the Government of the day, or the position of France at that time. An almost parallel case occurred in 1844. There existed then extreme uneasiness respecting France and Morocco, and the Government of the day urged on the House of Commons the necessity of not alluding to questions which might agitate the public mind. What did the present Prime Minister then say? In his expression of opinion delivered at that time I entirely concur, deeming it one of those straightforward, honest declarations which have gained for the noble Lord a legitimate popularity in this country. When begged to be silent, and not to endanger negotiations which were going on, the noble Lord said—

“That, so far from being tongue-tied in the House because of the state of parties in France, he did not think that any consideration arising from the position of persons or parties in foreign countries, should debar us from canvassing the conduct of the Government with reference to our own interests, for the consideration of our own interests must be paramount with an English House of Commons.”

That is precisely the feeling we have now. The interests of this country are intimately wrapt up with the consideration of this matter. My hon. and learned Friend has made so able and interesting a speech that he has really left me almost nothing to add; but he has omitted to refer to one thing, and that is the very striking expression of opinion which appeared in the Moniteur, the official journal of France, representing what M. Thouvenel calls the Imperial policy of France. Let the House consider M. Thouvenel's opinion respecting the Imperial policy of France, and the imminent danger of the measures which Louis Napoleon has in view. In June, 1860, M. Thouvenel, addressing a report to the Emperor which appeared in the Moniteur, says—

“The Imperial policy is guided, not by ambitious intentions, but considerations respecting the future (un sentiment de prévoyance). Your Majesty has obtained a ‘guarantee’ from the friendship and gratitude of a Sovereign, which constitutes a fine page of the history of a reign already so fruitful of prosperities.”

It is precisely this “sentiment de prévoyance,” and this system of France always asking for a guarantee that we wish to watch. When she took Savoy and Nice that was a guarantee. In the speech of the Emperor, in 1860, it was observed—

“In frankly stating the question to the great Powers their equity will, doubtless, induce them to recognize that the important territorial change which is about to take place gives us the right to a guarantee indicated by Nature herself.”

Only the other day France recognized the King of Italy, and what were the expressions introduced by M. Thouvenel into his despatch? They were not like the frank and generous avowal made by the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary. In M. Thouvenel's despatch appeared this short sentence, with the word “guarantee,” which indeed is always to be seen in M. Thouvenel's despatches—

“The French troops will continue to occupy Rome so long as the interests which brought France to Rome are not covered by guarantees.”

I should like to know what is the meaning of that; because I think it means continual annexations of different places in Europe to the French Empire. I wish to point out to the House, also, how full, but how fallacious have been the denials we have received from the Sardinian Government. Three times has this question of the annexation of Sardinia to France been brought before the Constitutional Chambers at Turin, and three times it has been most emphatically denied, twice by the lamented Cavour and once by M. Ricasoli. Count Cavour, in October, 1860, said—

“The charge of the meditated annexation of Sardinia (Island of) to France was met in a manner in which a wide distinction was endeavoured to be made between that question of the Island of Sardinia and the cession of Savoy and Nice The great principal of nationality, the corner stone of our political edifice, can never be invoked for a cession of a portion of our territory.”

That was what Count Cavour said in October, 1860; but precisely the same thing was said as regards the cession of Savoy and Nice on the 22nd of March, 1860. On that day the King of Sardinia received the Savoyard deputation, and said “That the ties which bound his dynasty to Savoy were too ancient to be rent asunder.” At the very moment when that solemn declaration was made, M. de Persigny, writing from this country to the French Government, mentions that the cession of Savoy was long arranged to take place on the conclusion of the war in Italy. On the 8th of April, 1861, another interpellation was addressed to Count Cavour, and he made a brief reply on the subject of the rumoured cession of the Island of Sardinia to France. He said:—“I give a formal denial to the rumours of an intended cession of the Island of Sardinia to France.” A similar denial preceded the cession of Savoy and Nice; and Sir James Hudson wrote a despatch, dated Turin, February 10, 1860, in which he said—

“I called upon his Excellency this morning, and the Count said that he could only repeat to me what he had already stated, that Sardinia was under no engagement to cede, sell, or exchange Savoy or any other part of her dominions.”

And yet at that very time it was understood that Sardinia would cede Savoy and Nice to France, as reward for the assistance she had given Sardinia in Italy. The House of Commons and the country, under those circumstances, require, I am sure, something more than verbal denials, especially when we have precedents so strong tolling against the credit which they are entitled to receive. Again, I find the Sardinian Government writing in March, 1860, to M. Nigra, who was then Chargé d'Affaires in Paris, precisely in the same terms on the same subject. They say—

“His Majesty's Government would never consent, with even the greatest prospective advantages, to cede or exchange any one of the parts of the territory which has formed for so many ages the glorious inheritance of the House of Savoy.”

Stronger terms than these could scarcely be used; but I now come to Baron Ricasoli. He, in the month of June in the present year, made a bold speech—I hope he will act up to its boldness—in the Sardinian Chamber, in which he said—

“We arm for the defence, not only of the national territory as it is actually constituted, but also to complete it, and to restore to it its natural and legitimate limits.”

He goes on to say—

“I have heard a cession of territory spoken of, but permit me,”—and he made this emphatic declaration—“but permit me, Gentlemen, to repel with profound disdain the very thought.”

Cries of “Brava” followed this announcement, and Baron Ricasoli added—

“The King's Government knows not of a foot of Italian territory which it can give up; il ne le veut pas; il ne le fera pas; non, absolument non.”

Now, if I could be persuaded Baron Ricasoli would act up to that statement, I should feel satisfied; but the danger is, as my hon. and learned Friend has pointed out, that he will fall into the toils of the French Emperor, and be absolutely unable to resist the schemes which he may have set on foot to effect his object. My hon. and learned Friend has just read an article from a newspaper issued under the direct authority of the French Government, and I shall not, therefore, further advert to it; but I feel assured the interesting observations he has addressed to the House are sufficient to show that Her Majesty's Government ought to exercise the utmost vigilance in this matter. The noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs knows perfectly well that I have approved—I venture to say so with all respect—of the policy of non-intervention in the affairs of Italy which he has pursued, and if the tranquillization of the country has not proceeded so rapidly as we could wish, it is owing to no fault of which we can be justly accused. It is to be attributed rather to the presence at Rome of a French army, for I do contend that army is maintained there, not for the purpose of protecting the liberties of Italy or upholding the authority of the Pope, but solely with the view of insuring to the Emperor of the French some ultimate guarantee in the shape of a cession of territory either in the Island of Sardinia or elsewhere. That being so, I venture to second the Motion of my hon. and learned Friend, and I beg the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to direct his serious attention to this subject. Rumour says the noble Lord is about to leave this House for “another place,” and I am quite sure I but express the opinion of every hon. Gentleman here when I say that by his removal from among us we shall lose one of the brightest ornaments of this assembly. I must on public grounds also give utterance to the hope that the country will not by the change be deprived of the services of a man of the noble Lord's enlightened experience, but I must at the same time observe that I do not like to hear the indisposition of England to go to war so frequently paraded. That is an expression of opinion to which I have listened more than once both this year and last. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, indeed, received the other day a deputation, I think on the subject of the slave trade, and he said upon that occasion—

“Spain had acted with great insincerity, and no doubt had given ample cause of war, if this country chose to resort to force. But he doubted if House of Commons would respond to the call for war on such grounds.”

Now, I agree with my noble Friend in this respect, but I do not see why we should be so anxious to lay before the House and the public the indisposition of the country to go to war on trivial grounds. God forbid we should ever resort to hostilities under such circumstances, but the country, as well as my noble Friend, knows well that the force and strength of a Government depend, not so much upon its declaring its reluctance to enter into war, as upon its avoiding the possibility of such an event by the dignity of the policy which it pursues. That is the policy which I would ask the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs to pursue in this case. There is no reason why, if we follow out such a course manfully, we should, therefore, immediately rush into arms to vindicate our position. I will merely add the expression of an anxious wish that the noble Lord will not allow his vigilance to relax in this matter. The Island of Sardinia is included in the great national movement towards Italian liberty. Her Majesty's Government have acknowledged the Kingdom of Italy, and this cession of the Island of Sardinia would, I contend, be an infringement of the principles by which in that acknowledgement they have declared their readiness to abide. The proceeding is one, it is true, which may be calculated to add another bright page to the history of France in the reign of the present Emperor, but it would, if carried into effect, be in direct contradiction to the principle of Italian unity, and be an outrage and an insult on Italian independence. Nay, more, this cession would so violently disturb the present position and balance of power in Europe that we should ultimately be obliged to interfere, and I now take the liberty of telling Victor Emmanuel, as one who is deeply interested in the progress of Italian liberty, that if this island is handed over to France a blow will be struck at the maritime power and legitimate influence of this country which will unquestionably have the effect of alienating from him and his Ministers the confidence and sympathy which happily the people of England and their Government have hitherto so generously manifested in favour of Italian independence.

MR. BAILLIE COCHRANE observed that the two hon. Members who had just spoken had dealt with the question under discussion principally as affecting English interests, and he wished to deal with it in the same point of view. There were, however, some remarks which had fallen from the hon. Baronet which had, he confessed, caused him not a little surprise. Both his hon. Friend and the hon. and learned Gentleman who introduced the Motion insisted strongly upon one point—namely, that for a long period of time antecedent to the secession of Savoy and Nice to France, there was an understanding with Count Cavour that the cession was to be made, and yet his hon. Friend quoted the speeches of Count Cavour, in which he stated that not one inch of Italian ground would be ceded to France. According to the statement of his hon. Friend the conduct of Cavour was most extraordinary. Count Cavour, it appeared, had entered into secret treaty with France for the cession of Savoy and Nice at the very time he was stating there was to be no cession of territory to France. Now, if that were really the case, it was a subject of marvel to him that the hon. Baronet should have passed upon the statesman who had been guilty of such conduct an eulogium so flattering as he had, upon a former occasion pronounced in that House. But, be that as it might, the hon. Baronet had proceeded to quote extracts from the speech of Baron Ricasoli. The hon. Baronet said he approved the policy of Baron Ricasoli; but did he go to the full extent of the policy shadowed forth in the speech? [Sir ROBERT PEEL: I do.] Then it was important to see what that policy was. In the speech to which reference had been made Baron Ricasoli went on to say—

“What the King's Government sees is a territory to defend, a territory to recover. It sees Rome, it sees Venice. To the Eternal City and to the Queen of the Adriatic it turns the thoughts, the hopes, the energies of the nation. The Government feels the heavy task that lies before it. With God's help it will fulfil it. Opportunity matured by time will open our way to Venice. In the meantime we think of Rome. Yes, we will go to Rome.”

Then follow these remarkable words:—

“We will go to Rome hand in hand with France.”

He (Mr. Cochrane) would like to know what view Her Majesty's Government took of that policy, and whether the noble Lord had taken any notice of that extraordinary declaration? The question did not stop at the possible cession of Sardinia. He fully agreed that there was a secret understanding respecting the Island of Sardinia, and he begged to call attention to what they might anticipate the state of Italy would be should such a cession take place. The accounts from the South of Italy were worse and worse. There existed what was called a state of brigandage; but the feelings of the country were deeper than could be expressed by that term. It was, therefore, doubly important to see that nothing should occur to disturb the present state of Europe, and they should also recollect that no faith was to be placed in the pledges and promises given by France. It appeared that there had been representations made by the French Government to the Swiss Confederation, in which they insisted upon a further cession of territory, and the noble Lord would, of course, know whether that was correct or not. It was stated that M. Thouvenel had gone on to say that he would not discuss the matter any further. He should ask the noble Lord not only to answer the question put to him, but go further and tell them what was the advice given by the English Government to the Sardinian Government. English interests required that every Government should be conducted upon the principles of justice, and according to those treaties which had been grossly violated.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, that one advantage resulted from these discussions—that they proved that there was no apathy in England as regarded foreign politics. In the present day all men's minds were unsettled, and, although there was no expectation of war, there was no confidence in the maintenance of peace. Commerce was stagnant; the funds were almost at a war price; and, as had been well said elsewhere, Europe was in a state of armed truce. He feared the disturbing influences had been aggravated by the political principles laid down, and the admissions made which had tended to diminish the force of treaties. No greater proof could be given of the disorganized state of our foreign relations than these repeated discussions about annexations. First, there was the annexation of Savoy and Nice. When that was settled there came a question of Chablais and Faucigny, which in its turn was followed by the question of the French Switzerland, and now they were talking of the apprehended annexation of the Island of Sardinia. He was bound to say that, in his opinion, if the Government had pursued a more vigorous and consistent line of conduct they would not have heard of any more annexations. In the course of last year the policy of the present Government underwent a change. In the debate which led to the defeat of the late Government the noble Lord the present Prime Minister taunted the Earl of Derby's Government with having misapprehended the state of things abroad; and argued that they had threatened France and had patronized Austria, and thought that all danger of aggression arose from France, while in truth Austria was the aggressive Power. The noble Lord, now Foreign Secretary, also maintained upon that occasion that the true policy of this country was alliance with France, but that the late Government had weakened that alliance. But when events had shown that France was from the first the aggressive Power, and that there was a secret treaty between France and Sardinia that they were to attack Austria and divide the spoils. The noble Lords opposite found themselves in a position of great perplexity. He, therefore, admired the manly speech of the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) in the last days of the last Session, wherein he expressed distrust of France, and said that thenceforth forethought and precaution was the duty of every Power. He rejoiced at hearing the noble Lord utter that sentiment, and admit at the same time that he had been deceived and had wronged the Earl of Derby's Government in the debate upon the vote of want of confidence. It was creditable to the great Conservative party, to the right hon. Member for Bucks, and to the hon. Member for Horsham (Mr. S. FitzGerald), that they had not attempted to embarrass the Government in its foreign policy, but, on the contrary, had pursued a patriotic course, and had endeavoured to assist the Government in every way. If the relative positions of parties had been changed he did not think the noble Lords opposite would have been so forbearing. The policy indicated in the speech of the noble Lord the Prime Minister at the close of last Session had for its logical consequence the celebrated despatch of the 31st of August, in which the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary told Sardinia that England would not tolerate aggression on her part, and hinted that England had interests to guard in the Adriatic. If the principles of that despatch had been acted upon we should have heard no more of other annexations; but afterwards it appeared that the noble Lord forgot all about the necessity of precaution and forethought. He wrote a despatch on the 29th of October, laying it down that every State and part of a State had a right to choose its own rulers. He favoured the Sardinian intrigues and the expedition of Garibaldi; and thus, opened the door to every species of aggression and spoliation. It had been argued in justification that the noble Lord had contributed to the unity of Italy, and had outwitted the French Emperor in his schemes. He (Mr. C. Bentinck) differed from both those statements. It was quite true that by the suggestion of the non-employment of force, the noble Lord placed an instrument in the hands of the French Emperor by which he was enabled to get rid of the provisions of the Treaty of Villafranca; but, if even there had been any serious intention of executing those provisions on the part of the French, the assistance of the noble Lord would not have been wanted for there could be no doubt that Austria would have stood true to her engagements. It was clear that if the Treaty of Villafranca had been executed Savoy and Nice would not have been immediately annexed to France. The terms of the agreement between France and Sardinia were to the effect that Savoy and Nice were to be ceded to France only in the event of Lombardy and Venetia being conquered by France for Sardinia. If the Treaty of Villafranca had been carried out, France could have taken Savoy and Nice only by some violent proceeding; but when the noble Lord opposite succeeded with the French in overthrowing that treaty, Savoy and Nice fell to France as a necessary consequence. On the annexation of Romagna and the Duchies to Sardinia, the noble Lord was not consistent in his argument as to the non-employment of force, because he had not objected to force in the subjugation of Naples by Piedmontese troops; nor could it be said that the result of his policy had been to diminish French influence in Italy. Great mystery hung about all the negotiations between France and Sardinia, and it was to be apprehended that the danger of annexation was greater than ever. It was certain that the French Government had been a party to the invasion of Umbria and the Marches by Sardinia, and that they had also sanctioned the invasion of Naples by Piedmontese troops. The denials of France with respect to the Island of Sardinia would be almost diverting if they were not likely to be so tragical in their consequences. M. Thouvenel had asked how it could be supposed that France wished for an island which was in such a state of barbarism that it was a disgrace to the Sardinian Government? But it was the alleged barbarous rule in Naples and in Sicily that was used as a justification of the invasion of those territories. The noble Lord had virtually admitted that the ballot-box was to decide the fate of nations; for, although he had altogether objected to the ballot-box and universal suffrage in Savoy and Nice, yet, with singular want of logic, he had approved it both in Naples and Sicily. He hoped the noble Lord would tell the House where the policy of the ballot-box was to stop. He was as much in favour of Italian liberty and unity as any man in that House, but he was certain that even a united Italy would prove no barrier to France. France was gradually encroaching on Italy. She possessed Corsica and Nice; she was in occupation of Rome, and it was as idle to expect that Civita Vecchia would be given back to Italy as that Calais would be restored to England. He hoped, therefore, that the noble Lord would accede to the Motion, and would give the House every possible information on all the points mooted by the hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater and subsequent speakers.

MR. STIRLING thought the House was much indebted to the hon. Member for Bridgwater, not only for bringing this subject forward, but also for the watchful eye which during the last two years he had kept on the intrigues of the Emperor of the French. It was impossible not to remember how last Session the hon. Member week after week addressed questions to the Government about the annexation of Savoy and Nice; how his statements were first of all denied, then discredited, then deprecated, and at last, by the course of events, confirmed and verified in every particular. It was to be hoped that the warnings which he had on the present occasion so vigorously addressed to the Government would fall on less unwilling ears, and that the House would not be told, when too late, that England could only enter her protest against the annexation of the Island of Sardinia. He agreed with his hon. Friend, the Member for Taunton, that on its Foreign policy Government owed a debt of gratitude, not only to its supporters for their confidence, but also to the Opposition for its forbearance. No one could have forgotten that, at the very time when the questions of the hon. Member with respect to Savoy and Nice were receiving evasive and inaccurate answers from the Treasury Bench, Lord Cowley by means of private letters was keeping the noble Lord at the head of the Foreign Office fully aware of the intrigues and intentions of the Government of France. On the publication of the blue book on Italian affairs, he (Mr. Stirling) had himself called the attention of the House to the fact, which on the 23rd of April was put beyond all doubt by Lord Cowley in his speech in "another place." He could not help contrasting that state of things, so little creditable to the present Ministry, with the language held by the noble Lord and his colleagues when in Opposition towards their predecessors in office. Nothing was too severe or too contemptuous to be said of the policy of Lord Derby's Government. Lord Derby's Government, we were told, was in unsatisfactory relations with every Power in Europe. With some it was too intimate; of others it was too distrustful. Now that Lord Derby's Government had been superseded by the two noble Lords opposite, what were the most salient features of the existing relations between the French Emperor and this country? In the two years which had elapsed since the change of Government the principal historical events were these—that England had concluded with the French Emperor a treaty of commerce for ten years, that the French Emperor had taken in perpetuity a large mountain territory which gave him the keys of Italy and Switzerland, and that he had also increased his dominions by a long stretch of Mediterranean coast, which would greatly aid in the development of that great naval force which every month saw growing at Toulon. There never was a Government which more peculiarly owed to that House and the country all their exertions to prevent the annexation to France of the Island of Sardinia, which his hon. Friend had shown such good grounds for fearing was about to take place. Last year they were told that, however we might condemn the circumstances under which the cession of Savoy and Nice had taken place, England was not materially interested in the question. They were not of vital importance to her, and besides, she could not possibly have prevented the cession being made. Would that be said of the Island of Sardinia after the opinions which his hon. Friend had quoted from the correspondence of Lord Nelson as to its importance to our position in the Mediterranean? Surely it was the duty of Her Majesty's Government to tell the French Government, in the most firm, though courteous terms, that the cession of that island would not be allowed under any circumstances. Out of this question, important as it was, there arose another of still greater importance. How long was the Emperor, by his own acts and deeds, to make himself an object of distrust to Europe? There was a small minority in that House, consisting of Gentlemen whose intellectual qualities he greatly respected, and whose patriotism he did not presume to doubt, who maintained that distrust of the Emperor was on our part unjust, and that he might more justly be distrustful of us. But what were the facts of the case? It was said we were under great obligations to the Emperor as a good and faithful ally, and especially as the author of the recent treaty of commerce. He was quite willing to admit some of these obligations. The Emperor had certainly shown in part of his conduct that he wished to be on good terms with this country. Had it not been that the negotiations for the treaty of commerce were simultaneous with the cession of Savoy and Nice, which he could call by no other name than a trick, he should have said that treaty did lay us and Europe under considerable obligations. It was a beneficent though an arbitrary act, which, in some degree, redeemed a despotism founded on the destruction of French liberty. But under present circumstances it was impossible not to connect that treaty of commerce with the aggressive designs of the French Emperor. At all events, whatever our obligations to him in respect of the treaty, and of the improved position and prospects of Italy, was there not another side to the balance-sheet? Did we not owe to him the Russian war, arising, as it did, out of his intrigues in the East? Above all, did we not owe to him our enormous naval and military expenditure? In 1850, before the coup d'état, on which the Emperor's despotism rested—an act of which the noble Viscount, the head of Her Majesty's Government, had expressed a hasty, and, he must say, an un-English approval—our Naval and Military Estimates were only £15,500,000. They had since gone on steadily increasing till they were £26,500,000. In addition to this we had the expense of the fortifications, and the hardly-to-be-calculated cost of the Volunteer movement. He believed he was understating the amount if he said that military despotism in France did not cost England less than from £15,000,000 to £20,000,000 a year. He thought the science of diplomacy might find terms in which the Emperor might be asked how long he was going to play at this game of beggar-my-neighbour, not only with England, but with all Europe. It might be hinted to him, in diplomatic terms, that, however ruinous to other nations, such a policy must in the long run prove most disastrous to that Power whose foundations were least secure, which did not rest on a broad and popular basis, but on the surprise and overthrow of the liberties of a people. He hoped the noble Lord would firmly and decidedly inform the Emperor that those vast naval armaments which he had compelled us to create and maintain might, if the necessity of using them should arise, possibly be found a considerable impediment in the way of his occupying the Island of Sardinia.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I must say I think the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken shows a very considerable forgetfulness of facts. In the first place, with regard to Savoy and Nice, it was during the Government of the Earl of Derby that my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) informed me that he had received information to the effect that, in return for the assistance the Emperor gave to Sardinia in the war with Austria, the provinces of Savoy and Nice were to be yielded to France. Did I bring that forward or urge my hon. and learned Friend to bring it in the House of Commons as an accusation against the Earl of Derby's Government? What I advised him to do was to go to the Earl of Malmesbury, and apprise him of the information he had received. He did see the Earl of Malmesbury, who made inquiries on the subject at Paris; but if the Earl of Derby's Government had thought that it was a question on which England ought to go to war with France, it was for the Earl of Malmesbury to declare that resolution on the part of the Earl of Derby's Government. The Earl of Malmesbury did not take any such course. And when the war was impending, the Earl of Derby and the Earl of Malmesbury were quite unable, although they made efforts in that direction, to prevent that war from taking place. Did my noble Friend and I reproach the Government of the day for the course they pursued? There were arguments that might have been used to show that the efforts of the British Government might have averted that war; but it seemed to me that it would not have been just to say that any recommendations could prevail in that state of things, and, accordingly, I never uttered a word of reproach of the Earl of Malmesbury, in consequence of the course which the Government then took. I think all the time we were in opposition with reference to foreign affairs my noble Friend and I showed very great forbearance in regard to the conduct of the Earl of Derby's Government. I have always said in this House, and to this day I am ready to say, that I think the Earl of Malmesbury was a very efficient Minister of Foreign Affairs, and that the general course of his policy was the right policy to pursue. Both in this House and before my constituents I defended the course of neutrality he pursued in regard to the war. There were some things said by the Earl of Derby at the beginning of the war which I did not approve, and these words were afterwards explained away in a speech made by the noble Earl at the Mansion House. I have nothing to reproach myself with in the course I pursued in regard to his Government. The hon. Gentleman who spoke last but one has certainly somewhat mistaken the facts, because he said that, although I talked of the invalidity of universal suffrage in regard to Savoy and Nice, I never said a word as to the invalidity of universal suffrage in regard to Naples and Sicily; and, therefore, there was a remarkable inconsistency on my part. Now, if the hon. Gentleman will refer to my despatch upon that subject to Sir James Hudson, he will find that I distinctly stated that with respect to Naples, Sicily, Umbria, and the Marshes, the taking of votes by universal suffrage "appeared to have little validity," and I went on to show why, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Government, they had little validity. The hon. Gentleman, however, says that I fell into a remarkable inconsistency, because I allowed the validity of that vote in Naples and Sicily, while I denied its validity in Savoy and Nice. Really, if hon. Gentlemen will come forward and enter into long disquisitions for the purpose of attacking the foreign policy of the Government, they should take a little more care and not state as facts what are totally remote from the real truth.

With regard to the main object of this debate it is, no doubt, a very important one. | With regard to the question of Sardinia, I entirely admit the importance of that island, and I have in despatches repeatedly expressed my opinion that the annexation of the Island of Sardinia to France would be a great disturbance of the territorial distribution of power in Europe, and would more especially affect the distribution of power in the Mediterranean. It may be an object of desire and ambition to an ambitious Power; but I must put in the balance the consequences—the very grave consequences which would follow from any attempt on the part of France to annex the Island of Sardinia. | It is not a transaction which could take place merely between the Emperor of the French and the King of Sardinia. It must put an end at once to any intimate alliance between this country and France. The importance of the island is very considerable; but at the same time I must say it is not my opinion that the Government of the Emperor of the French will attempt to annex the Island of Sardinia, seeing the grave consequences that would ensue. What has happened in the present spring is nearly as follows:—About the month of April, I think, there appeared in a journal published at Cagliari an intimation that French agents were active in the Island of Sardinia. Soon after that there followed a despatch sent by Sir James Hudson, from Her Majesty's Consul in the Island of Sardinia, saying that he believed there were French agents busy in the island, although he had not, I think, then any very accurate details on the subject. Further inquiries were directed to be made, and the inquiries so made by the Consul, who has been many years there and is a most intelligent man, conveyed very conflicting information. There was one person described as having been to several places and having spoken of the benefits to be derived to the island from annexation to France. There were other accounts that no such attempts had been made; and men who knew the island said that very few persons, indeed, had been spoken to on the subject. Then there came what might naturally have been expected—an appeal in the first place to the Government of Turin with respect to these rumours. They were in the first instance denied by a telegraphic message from Count Cavour. Soon after Count Cavour's death Baron Ricasoli stated emphatically what has been read here as part of his speech, but he stated it verbally to Sir James Hudson—namely, that Italy had no intention of yielding an inch of her territory; that there was territory which ought to belong to Italy which did not belong to her, but that there was no territory which she possessed that she was ready to give up. My hon. and learned Friend who brought forward this subject said that when Baron Ricasoli spoke of Italy and of Italian soil he might not have included the Island of Sardinia. At the same time my hon. and learned Friend stated his belief that Baron Ricasoli is a man of character and of honour, and that he would not violate his word. Sir, all that I know of Baron Ricasoli, of whom, although I have had a very slight personal acquaintance with him myself, I have heard others speak who have had much intimacy with him, confirms that description. He is a man, perhaps, somewhat proud in his manner, less conciliatory in his bearing than Count Cavour; but he is a man of the highest honour, the highest patriotism, with an honest ambition to acquire a name in Europe by contributing to the establishment of the independence of his country. But, if he said that he would not give up an inch of Italian soil, and was afterwards found engaging in intrigues with the view of transferring the Island of Sardinia to France, I should say that he was one of the meanest equivocators that ever existed. Equivocation, I am convinced, forms no part of his character, and that such a thing would never enter the head or be shown in the conduct of Baron Ricasoli. We have always spoken of the soil of Italy as, of course, including the Island of Sardinia, and have never had a contradiction to that statement. Well, I believe the Baron Ricasoli does not intend to give up the Island of Sardinia.

On the other hand, when we have applied, as we were bound to do, to the Government of France on the subject, they have not only given the most positive contradiction to the rumour, but when M. Thouvenel was told that there were French agents, perhaps busy voluntary agents, in that Island, he said he would write at once to the Consul to disavow any such agency—to put an end to any such meddling there. Well, an hon. Gentleman has asked what is the use of obtaining denials. Why, I think if I had not asked the Governments of France and of Italy what was the truth with regard to these rumours I should have been accused, and very properly accused, of neglecting my duty in that respect. Sir, I admit—one must admit—that in the present state of Europe, and seeing what has passed during the last three or four years, it would be very unwise in the Government of this country, very unwise also in the Parliament of this country, to rest in a blind confidence that there would be no aggressions, no annexations, no ambitious projects entertained. The Emperor of the French is very powerful. Everybody sees the great power that he possesses. But, at the same time, if it was his intention, as I believe it is his intention, to preserve the peace of Europe and remain upon the most friendly terms with England, I am not at all sure—I cannot rest in any perfect confidence that the state of public opinion in France, that the state of opinion in the French Chambers or in the French army, might not in a most sudden manner alter the whole policy of the Government. That has happened with past Sovereigns of France, and I think we should be very unwise if we thought we had a security that it should not happen again; and, therefore, what my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgewater said—and the hon. Baronet the Member for Tamworth spoke in the same tone—was that there were two things which we ought to do:—In the first place, we ought to be very watchful with regard to the events which are taking place in Europe. Those events, be it remarked, are not altogether connected with the policy of Sovereigns and of Courts; it is not merely that this Sovereign has shown too much ambition and another has disregarded treaties. There is much more in the condition of Europe than that statement of itself would imply. There are great movements going on in different parts of Europe of which the movement in Italy was perhaps only the first—great movement of popular bodies and of whole nations discontented with the Governments under which they have lived, asking for better forms of Government, and looking out for aid by which they may obtain them. Why, what results from such a state of things? What but uneasiness, proceeding perhaps to civil convulsions, to insurrection, to wars, and producing changes of sovereignty and of possession among the Powers of Europe. Well, then, I say that that alone, without imputing to any Sovereign designs hostile to Great Britain, that alone is a reason why the Government of this country ought to be watchful, why they should be vigilant with respect to every event that takes place in Europe, and I trust that neither my noble Friend nor I have our eyes entirely shut to that which is going on around us, and that we shall not idly neglect the interests of this country whenever they may be threatened with injury. At the same time, to be continually expressing suspicion, to be making the whole state of peace uneasy, would, I think, be not only a very puerile, but a very mischievous policy. It ought to be our endeavour, and has been our endeavour, wherever these threats of war occur, rather to compose the differences which exist and strive to reconcile those among whom discord is arising, and promote peace between them.

The hon. Baronet (Sir Robert Peel) who spoke second in this debate has alluded more than once to the question between Spain and Morocco. Our endeavours have been directed on the one hand to inducing the Sultan of Morocco to keep faith with the Kingdom of Spain, and on the other to inducing the Spanish Government to press their advantages in such a manner as may make reconciliation possible. And when hon. Gentlemen speak in a tone as if Spain was constantly acting in a state of aggression, and that the Spanish policy must be confounded with French policy, I must own that my view is a very different one. I think it should be our policy to favour and encourage the spirit of independence which prevails among the various nations of Europe. And there does prevail among the Spanish people as high a feeling of independence as that which exists in any other continental country. In other days, during the last century, owing to the War of the Succession, there was a family alliance between France and Spain, and whenever you found yourselves at war with France you also found that a war with Spain immediately followed; but there is no such family connection at present. Spain, which has been long weak, is recovering her strength; and that she should take her fitting part and fitting place among the Powers of Europe is a thing not to be checked and discouraged by Great Britain, but is rather a matter to be fostered by Great Britain as long as her own honour and interests are not interfered with by that Power. My belief is that both the Queen of Spain and her Prime Minister are favourably disposed towards this country. I have always endeavoured to assure them that we have no wish inconsistent with the greatness and dignity of Spain, and that they might rely on our friendship on any question in which they may be concerned. Look again at Italy. Hon. Gentlemen are very fond of representing Italy as a mere follower and vassal of France. Undoubtedly she is under great obligations to France, and after her long contest with Austria she owes much to the army by which she was enabled to obtain a victory that she could never otherwise have accomplished. But notwithstanding these obligations there are many matters in which she must rely upon her own spirit, and to the hand of her own sons she must owe her real independence. It is they who, like

Harmodius in giving liberty to Greece, must, in the noble lines of Wordsworth—

“ Give the gift which is not to be given

“ By all the blended powers of earth or heaven.”

It is not in the power of France to make Italy; it is she herself who, by her own strength, and patience, and wisdom must build up and consolidate her independence, and if she does not do so, all the Powers in Europe cannot do it for her. What we have done has not been to assist in this work, but to require that other Powers should not prevent it from being accomplished; and the Emperor of the French has held the same language with regard to intervention. He has said that he would not allow foreign Powers to interfere in Italy. But while such has been his policy, it is impossible not to see that there has been among his subjects—perhaps in an even greater degree among those who are opposed to his dynasty—a feeling that the creation of an independent Kingdom of Italy, with many millions of subjects, pursuing its own policy and following out its own destiny, was an obstacle to the greatness of France. You trace that feeling in speeches, and in all the pamphlets and publications in France; they hold that it is a mistake for France to assist in forming a strong Italy. That I hold to be a great mistake on the part of French politicians, and I believe that the jealousy which is thus shown will diminish the influence which France naturally possesses in Italy. But still it is not now in the power of France to prevent the Kingdom of Italy from being constituted; and when it is constituted we shall have an additional security for the liberties and independence of Europe. It was one of the recommendations addressed to us in the course of this debate that we should be watchful with regard to all changes which might take place in Europe. With that recommendation I perfectly agree; we should be to blame if we did not act in that spirit. The hon. and learned Gentleman and the hon. Baronet added another recommendation that, while great armaments were going on in Europe, we should not disarm. That piece of advice I consider as sound as the other. It is a great misfortune for England, and it is a great misfortune for Europe, that such costly armaments should be kept up in time of peace; but we should not remedy that if we were to disarm, and to leave other nations to increase their preparations. I trust that no shortsighted view of our interests, no narrow spirit—for I should call it a narrow spirit—of saving with regard to any particular tax, will induce this country, in the present state of Europe and the world, to maintain a navy and army which are not adequate in all respects to the position we ought to occupy. Not merely the greatness, but the very safety of this country is concerned in her state of preparation. So far from increasing the probability of war, as some have thought, I believe the knowledge that this country is strong is not only advantageous for her own interests, but is a weapon in the hand of every other Power that seeks for independence and for liberty. The knowledge that this country is able, and in a just cause is ready, to assume the offensive, at the same time that she prizes the blessings which result from peace and the prosperity of her own commerce and manufacture, is, I believe, a guarantee for the independence of nations and a security at the same time for the peace of Europe. And now, Sir, let me add, in the same spirit in which I have spoken—that of discountenancing needless and irritating suspicions—that I think it my duty not to agree with the Motion for the production of papers at the present moment. When the Government think that any public benefit can be gained by the production of papers on this subject they will not hesitate to do so; but I hope the House will confide so far in us as to believe that we shall not neglect any opportunity of meeting in the proper manner any dangers which may arise.

MR. STANSFELD said, it was difficult to exaggerate the importance of the question which had been raised. If the possibilities suggested by the hon. and learned Gentleman should unfortunately be realized in fact, they would entail the shipwreck of that great policy of non-intervention which they had made such efforts to uphold in Europe. He could not pretend to be entirely reassured by the statement of the noble Lord, for he was bound to place some confidence in information coming from the same source which had revealed to this country the contract of Plombières, and the very plan of the campaign in Lombardy before those memorable words were spoken to Baron Hübner which first woke Europe from her dream of peace. The question which had been raised by the hon. and learned Member could not exist were it not for the existence in Italy of a fact and of a policy in which we are deeply interested, not only as well-wishers to Italy, but also as Englishmen and members of the European community of nations. The policy was that which had hitherto obtained too exclusively in Italy—the policy of too absolute and too subservient a dependence upon one foreign alliance. And the fact was the long-standing and anomalous fact of the occupation of Rome by the troops of the French Emperor. What should be the policy of the councillors of the Kingdom of Italy? Italy had recently lost a great statesman, and though he had never been one of his indiscriminate admirers that was no time for a detailed criticism of his policy. After all his great labours and successes he was gone; and he might be permitted to say that it would be well for the honour of Italy, and for the peace and welfare of Europe, if all the personal engagements, or, at least, the personal entanglements of that distinguished statesman could be buried in his grave. What, then, ought to be the policy of his successors. Rome and Venice were essential to Italy, and she could not pause or dally long on the road leading to their acquisition except at the risk of fatal internal dissensions and national suicide. There were only two policies open to the counsellors of the new kingdom. The first was the policy of Plombières, which, owing to the indomitable spirit of the Italian people, had met with successes which did not at the time of its reception appear possible, but of which no one would recommend a repetition. The other alternative was that of a national Italian policy, which should rest exclusively and subserviently upon no one foreign alliance, but which, backed by the sympathies and moral weight of all free peoples, should multiply and organize the forces of Italy, so that in due time she might suffice for the completion of her own emancipation. There were great dangers to Europe in a Franco-Italian war of independence—danger of cessions of territory which might dissipate the last poor remnant of confidence upon which slender thread hung suspended the peace of Europe, danger of Germany being drawn into the war, and danger of an active alliance between Italy and France being brought into action, not upon the plains of Lombardy, but upon the banks of the Rhine. There were also dangers in an exclusive Franco-Italian alliance, if things remained as they were. Rome, in the possession of the troops of the Empire, was, as they knew, the focus of reactionary intrigues and attempts. Nor was that all. There was, as had been stated from the other side of the House, springing up in the South of Italy a spirit of disaffection to Sardinia, which was not confined exclusively to the ranks of those who were still devoted to the exiled dynasty of Bourbon. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Hear!] He did not wish to criticise in a hostile spirit the faults of Ministries at Turin which might have caused that disaffection, but he wished to point out the remedy. The only way to get rid of that disaffection was to adopt a truly national policy, which, trusting, not fearing the people, should rally them round the Government and its head, and should organize the immense and willing force of a nation which desired to be free. There were three bases on which a policy useful to us and to Italy ought to rest. The first was a negotiation, in the face of Europe, on the part of the Kingdom of Italy with the Emperor of the French, to induce him to withdraw his troops from Rome; the second, with a view to dispelling the disaffection in the South, was that there should be a clearly expressed intention that when once its capital was restored to Italy a National Assembly should sit at Rome, and should revise in a national sense the laws of the country; and the third was the armament, multiplication, and organization of the regular and irregular forces of the kingdom. Italy, with 22,000,000 of inhabitants, had now no more armed men at her command than her neighbour, the little Republic, Switzerland, which had but one-eighth of her population; and of the 150,000 men whom she could place in line, they were told that 60,000 were required to keep order in the South. Why was no attempt worthy of the name made to organize a system of volunteering, and thus free the Italians from their wrongful and foolish dependence upon the power and the will of their great ally? He wished to say a few words of a party of which he had some special knowledge—the party originally known as the party of Young Italy, then as the Republican, then as the National party, and, lastly, as the party of action. He neither knew nor had read of any other party which had been so much and so persistently misrepresented and maligned as they had been. In their ranks was born and nursed into a faith the idea of Italian unity. It was their faith and his when not a single English statesman believed in the possibility of realization; and but for the motive-power which they supplied that realization would have been impossible. Let them trace back, step by step, the policy of Count Cavour, and from each of those steps, whether in argument before the assembled diplomatists of Europe, or, in fact, upon the field of Italy, let them eliminate the element of the existence, the determination and the restless enthusiasm of that party, and they would find that that step in argument would have been impossible, as it would have proved abortive in point of fact. The latest achievement of that party was the most brilliant and most conclusive proof of what he said. By far the greater number of the volunteers who followed Garibaldi and regained Naples and Sicily sprung from the ranks of that party. Men who were called Republicans, led by one of themselves, died on the field of battle that monarchy might rule the destinies of the future united Italy. That party had a programme and a policy of its own, to which he would direct the attention of the noble Lord. Its programme and its policy were consistent with the declarations of the present First Minister of the King of Italy, and if that Minister would carry into action the words which he had spoken, he would rally that party round him, he would secure all the elements of the vital force of the nation, and the moral unity of Italy would be at once and for ever assured. The programme of that party was neither more nor less than the simple independent national Italian programme, good for Italy and good for Europe, which he had endeavoured to bring before the House.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary had told them that in the case of the cession of Sardinia to France taking place an end would be put to the intimate relations which existed between this country and France. But the noble Lord had said precisely the same thing in regard to the cession of Savoy and Nice to France. And what came of it? Nothing—not even an empty protest. The noble Lord, indeed, expressed very strongly in that House his vexation at having been duped by the Emperor of the French and his friend Count Cavour; but there was an end of the matter. Previous to the accomplishment of the cession of Savoy to Nice the noble Lord said that such a circumstance must cause England to seek other alliances, and must put an end to the friendship which existed between this country and France. In consequence of that statement there appeared in Paris one of those semi-official pamphlets to which they had been so much accustomed of late years. The author of that document at once met the noble Lord on his own grounds, and asked very pertinently, where was England to find other alliances upon which she could fall back when she lost the alliance of France? And he went on to show that the foreign policy of the two noble Lords on the Ministerial bench was one which was calculated to alienate from England every nation on the Continent, and to cause the English Government to be looked on with distrust by every nation in the world. Now, that was the very thing which he (Sir George Bowyer) complained of. The noble Lord talked with great indignation of the cession of Savoy and Nice to France; but he (Sir George Bowyer) contended that it was in a great measure brought about by that policy which the noble Lord encouraged. And when Sardinia was ceded to France—as he believed it would be—that result might be charged to the policy of the noble Lord himself. He thought the House ought to feel deeply indebted to the hon. Member for Bridgwater for having pointed out in his speech that night—a speech characterized by great clearness of expression, almost judicial impartiality, and thoroughly statesmanlike views—the dangers which the Government seemed ready to ignore. The noble Lord had assured them that Baron Ricasoli was an honourable man, whose word was to be trusted; but the noble Lord also said that Count Cavour was to be believed, and they knew how strongly that Minister had denied the cession of Nice and Savoy, and what that denial was worth. What ground was there for placing more confidence in Baron Ricasoli than in Count Cavour? Was the denial given by Count Ricasoli less worthless than that of Count Cavour? The noble Lord had refused to produce the papers asked for. That fact alone spoke volumes. If the whole matter were fair and above board, what objection could the noble Lord have to produce those papers? If there were nothing in them but questions addressed by the Government of England to the Sardinian and French Governments, and plain straightforward denials by those Governments of the truth of those rumours, surely the noble Lord could have no fear about their production. But the noble Lord's refusal showed that there was something going on on the subject of the cession of Sardinia to France, and that England was endeavouring weakly and impotently to stop it. He defied any person to put any other rational construction on the refusal of the noble Lord to produce those papers except the report was true, and he (Sir George Bowyer) believed that that cession would take place. The noble Lord, no doubt, would then again express his vexation and annoyance in having been duped by the Emperor of the French, and there would be an end of the matter. What he wished to impress upon the House was the extraordinary inconsistency of hon. Members and Her Majesty's Government on that subject. When anything was done affecting the interests of this country the Government made an outcry about it, and hon. Members talked of the violation of treaties and of the law of nations. But they were perfectly ready to applaud any attack on the lawful rights of Sovereigns, any destruction of treaties, or any violation of the law of nations, if it suited what was called "public opinion" in this country. They pandered to sectarian prejudice, and made use of popular opinion to keep themselves in office. No act of the character to which he had just referred succeeded in arousing their indignation, if it did not touch their own interests or the interests of their party. We were told the other day in the paper which was supposed to express—and which really did to a great extent express—the opinions of the people of this country; that the great reason of Count Cavour's popularity in England was, that he was an enemy of the Pope. [Mr. WHITE: Hear, hear!] The Government kept themselves in office by supporting that policy on which Count Cavour acted. The Government supported the revolutionary party in Italy and in that House—not that he believed that they had any real faith in the opinions of that party, but simply because they knew it was popular in the country and would help to keep themselves in power. The Government encouraged revolution all over the world, and especially in Italy. He was glad to see his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer taking notes of what he said, because he believed him to be the chief offender. Even the noble Lord's own supporters said that the Earl of Derby might come into office on the next day, and get the support of the country, but what the noble Lord rested upon was his foreign policy. The Earl of Derby was supposed not to be so favourable to what was called the revolutionary party as the noble Lord. It was constantly repeated in political circles that if the noble Lord went to the country during the Session, he would go on his foreign policy—upon a cry against the established Governments of Europe, and especially against the Pope. The Emperor of the French made use of the revolutionary party as his tool to effect his ulterior objects. The first Emperor carried his points chiefly by great armies. The present Emperor carried on his policy partly by arms, and still more by the engine of revolution. If he wanted to cripple a country he stirred up revolution. If he wished to have territory ceded to him, he encouraged the revolutionary party. He made use of Piedmont to revolutionize Italy, and to obtain Savoy and Nice. It was very well to talk of an united Italy; but they all knew that Italy was not united, nor ever would be so. The King of Sardinia was but the satrap of the Emperor of the French. It was avowed by M. Ratazzi, in the Piedmont Chambers, that the King of Sardinia could not refuse the Emperor of the French anything. And he went on to say that the Government of the Pope, which was physically the weakest, when asked to make a cession of territory, said Non possumus; whereas, their Government, which was the great standard of nationality in Europe, could not use that language, but must submit if the demand were made by the Emperor of the French. The policy of the noble Lord opposite placed Italy at the feet of the Emperor of the French. That had been the effect of what was called "non-intervention." He believed that if the Emperor of the French thought that the cession of the Island of Sardinia to France would increase his popularity and strengthen his dynasty, he would bring it about. He would take Sardinia if it suited his purpose, and treat our protests with contempt. Her Majesty's Government had given their sanction to and introduced into the public law of Europe the principle that la propriété c'est le vol; and, as a consequence, their protests in such a case could be disregarded by those to whom they might be addressed. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had shown the most bitter animosity against the deposed Princes of Italy. The right hon. Gentleman stated that the Duke of Modena had made a retro-active law, under which persons could be executed who could not be executed under the existing law. Hon. Gentlemen cheered him loudly, and went home under the impression that some person had been put to death. The right hon. Gentleman was forced to come down to the House and state that the person to whom he had referred had not been put to death. The attacks of the right hon. Gentleman on the deposed Princes were part of the system of which he complained. The hon. Gentleman who preceded him had admitted that the rule of the King of Sardinia had not produced happiness and contentment in Southern Italy, and that disaffection existed in the kingdom of Naples. But what had been the cause of that disaffection? They saw the organs of the press continually calling out for more severity because the Neapolitans did not wish to see their country a province of Piedmont; and the Neapolitans were to be butchered because they would not submit to a Viceroy sent from Turin. Hon. Gentlemen on the Government side of the House sympathized in the claims of Hungarians and Poles for independence; but why, he asked, was not Neapolitan independence also to be respected? The people of Naples were burdened with heavy taxation. They were governed by military law, and the prisons, he was told, were crammed with 13,700 persons on account of political offences. The whole country was in a state of insurrection. The hon. Gentleman called it disaffection; but he called it loyalty to their rightful Sovereign. Some little had come out as to the real state of the country, but not one-tenth part of the facts, because they were not acceptable to the English people, and, therefore, the English papers did not publish them. He believed that the noble Lords on the Treasury bench knew a great deal more than they chose to say. They had produced only some meagre letters from some Government understrapper at Naples; but those letters gave no more idea of the true state of the country than if they had been written from Cochin China. The whole country was overrun by bands of men faithful to their King, who were defeating the Piedmontese and disarming the National Guard in every quarter of the kingdom. And those men were all to be got rid of. It was stated that 600 brigands had gone from Rome. It was perfectly ridiculous to call them brigands. But he would tell them what did take place. A body of men, near Severino, encountered some of the Hungarian Legion. The Hungarians said, "We cannot fight in the mountains; come down into the open plain and fight us." They did come down into the open plain, and not only fought the Hungarian Legion, but gave them a thorough good thrashing; and those were the men who were called brigands. The people had been deceived, but truth would in the end prevail. He believed that before long there would be a general rising in the South of Italy, and that it would be impossible for the Piedmontese to retain their hold except by cruelties and bloodshed, which would be applauded by the Liberal Members in that House. The people of Italy were beginning to open their eyes and to repent not having opposed foreign invasion. Before long they would see the King of the Two Sicilies again in possession of the dominions to which he was entitled. The deprivation of the King of Naples, the violation of the temporal rights of the Pope, and the deposition of the Italian Princes suited the views of some constituencies, and would enable Her Majesty's Ministers to raise a useful election cry; but they should remember that the consequence would be a cession of territory, an increase of the power of France and a diminution of the power of England. He had said on a former occasion that the policy of the noble Lord might be Italian or Liberal; but it was certainly revolutionary. It was founded on clap-trap and adapted to party purposes; but it was not calculated to promote the honour or the interests of England, and at no very distant day would receive the contempt of an indignant people.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, I feel bound to acknowledge without any delay the compliment which my hon. Friend has paid me, for he has gone so far as to introduce me under the honourable title of the chief offender. That is, he does me the honour to say that I am the main promoter of the designs of what he calls the revolutionary party in Italy. If I thought he really knew who are the revolutionary party, I should disclaim the compliment; but I think it a great honour to be called the chief offender in promoting the designs of those whom he intends to designate when he speaks of the revolutionary party. What he thinks the revolutionary party are, in my conviction, the real friends alike of freedom and of order. And my hon. Friend does me a great deal more than justice when he calls me the chief offender in promoting their designs in the presence of two noble Lords, whose authority, whose experience, and whose services entitle them to the withering denunciations of my hon. Friend in a far higher degree than I can possibly aspire to. If I were to speak of the true revolutionary party—if I were to speak of those agencies which produce disorders in the States and disorganize society, then I could tell my hon. Friend who in this House is the chief agent of that revolutionary party and has done the most to favour them. Himself! Those whose cause, I must say, he so constantly, so courageously, and in manner and temper so inoffensively recommends and pleads are those who have been the great promoters of revolutionary movements. My hon. Friend deals partly in matters of fact and partly in matters of argument. He says that all the people of Southern Italy are repenting what they have done in promoting and concurring in the rejection of the Bourbon family. My hon. Friend comes forward and claims, as usual, the absolute and implicit reception of his statement, and as, unfortunately, the papers laid on the table to bear no indication of this popular repentance, he is perfectly ready with a remedy, for he denounces the papers of the accredited diplomatists of this country as the productions of understrappers and underlings, intended, or, at all events, calculated, to blind the eyes of the people of England. He asks us to accept his unsupported assertions, without any evidence to corroborate them, in direct opposition to the statements which are received from the authorized agents of the Executive Government. So much for the fact—and what, then, is the main argument of my hon. Friend? He says to my two noble Friends, because you have taken an active part by the moral support you have given them, in enabling the Italians to regulate their own concerns, by that atrocious act of conspiracy in favour of the liberty of that long oppressed people you have forfeited all right to consider anything which relates to the balance of power and the security of peace in Europe, and if that balance is destroyed and that peace broken, it is on account of the active support you have given to the cause of peace and order in Italy. I cannot help thinking that if my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater (Mr. King-lake) had heard the speech of my hon. Friend who has just sat down, if he had heard the warm compliments which were paid to him in that speech, he would have listened to it then with a sort of cold, chill sensation. Though the sentiments and aspirations of my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Bridgwater differ much from those of the hon. Member opposite, yet my hon. and learned Friend does take, I think, a gloomy view, and shows considerable susceptibility in his estimate of those phenomena which from time to time mark the progress of events in Europe. All this, however, plays admirably into the hands of the hon. Member for Dundalk. Two years ago it was his business to assure us that the people of Italy were living under the best Government in the world. Now he has precisely the opposite task to perform, and whatever tends to excite and foment rumours, suspicions, and misgivings with regard to proceedings in France, Italy, or anywhere else, connected with the peace of Europe—all that is so much grist to his mill.

On the subject of the Motion before the House I will only say that if there be any indications that this grave and serious event, of the cession of Sardinia, is contemplated either in Italy or France, such indications are certainly unknown to me. This I may point out to my hon. and learned Friend in regard to what he said of the French alliance. When the Government of England conspires and combines with the Government of France for an unworthy purpose, then, by all means let him denounce the alliance between the two countries. But I venture to think the true merit of the alliance between the two countries is this—that it is an alliance that never can be turned to any unworthy purpose, for directly either one country or the other shall attempt to substitute a selfish, aggressive, or lawless purpose for purposes which contribute to the general good, that moment the other country is sure to become the first witness against it, and the rupture or weakening of the alliance itself will bear witness to and prevent the mischief which is intended. But why is it that the hon. Member for Dundalk is so jealous of the alliance of England and France? Is it because of the mischief that alliance has done or the good? If England had actively concerted with France to send troops to Rome, or to support the Bourbon dynasty in Naples, my hon. Friend would have been the first to trumpet to the world the merits of that alliance. The censures bestowed on that alliance by the hon. Member for Dundalk really amount to nothing short of a clear demonstration that its effect on the whole—though in certain respects it may have been impaired by causes to which I need not now refer—has been conducive, as respects the Italian question, which is the hon. Member's real test and criterion, to the attainment of those objects which we highly value and appreciate, but which he, unfortunately, thinks injurious and mischievous. The hon. Gentleman says—and no charge could be more unsupported, or more directly confute itself—that the two noble Lords have acted in this matter as the heads of a party, and to serve the interests of party. He himself, however, in other parts of his speech betrayed his consciousness that the chief characteristic of the policy pursued by them with regard to Italy is this, that it is not a party, but a national and British policy. It has been challenged by no party in this House, and it is not a policy which tends to set up the interests of one party against another, but it is a policy which explains, represents, and applies that which may be said to be the general and cordial sentiments of the whole people of this country. I cannot help saying one word on a speech very different in its order from the speech of the hon. Member for Dundalk; I mean the speech delivered by the hon. Member for Halifax (Mr. Stansfeld). The able and powerful speeches of the hon. Member are always listened to with delight, and no one listens to him with greater pleasure than I; but my admiration of his ability was somewhat qualified to-night by the peculiar tone he took and the comparative narrowness of the ground on which he placed his advocacy of the Italian cause, limiting himself as he did to a particular class and a particular school of politicians. He says he wishes to speak on behalf of what he calls "Young Italy." I believe I speak the general sentiment when I say that it had been my hope that young Italy had within these last times grown a little older. On some occasions young Italy has shown itself somewhat too young for the management of practical affairs. The exhibition of the agency of young Italy is to be found in the events of 1848 and 1849; it is the agency of an older and a wiser Italy which has given a sounder, firmer, and more beneficial direction to the course of events in that country during the great crisis and the agonies of the last two years. The hon. Gentleman says that young Italy has been the parent and author of all the great ideas of Italian unity. I am not prepared to dispute that proposition. It is very probable that in the speculative minds of these ardent spirits those ideas may, for the most part, have taken their birth. Sic vos non vobis nificatis aves, and so on. It may be that that which is the universal law of human events may also have prevailed in Italy—that the original thinkers and parents of ideas are one set of men, but that the application of those ideas and the practical solution of political problems are given to another. The hon. Gentleman said he thought there was a good deal of disaffection among the people of Southern Italy; and observe how that valuable admission was gathered up from the ground by the hon. Member for Dundalk. Let the truth be told if it be the truth, but I can find no evidence of it. It certainly is not in the official papers laid on the table. They bear no indication of popular disaffection. I will not dispute with the hon. Member for Dundalk whether it is brigandage or not, but the only proof of disaffection which he gave was a story of a body of 600 men, who came from Rome into the Neapolitan territory, who he says being on the top of a mountain were invited by the Hungarians to come down to fight the affair out. Well do not let such noble-minded persons who disdained to take advantage of a strategical position be called brigands. Call them what you will; let them be the flowers of knighthood, the bloom and pride of chivalry from the days of King Arthur to those of Charlemagne—and what then? We have not the slightest evidence that they are the population of the Neapolitan kingdom. Some 20,000 or 30,000 men of the Royal army were most imprudently disbanded—I am afraid under what may be called young Italian influence. A gross political error was committed; they were sent to their homes, though it is difficult to say where their homes were when their habits of life had been broken up by military service. They were thrown suddenly on the world, and naturally we have among them those manifestations, partly of brigandage and partly of military enterprise, which, however much they may tend to disorder and disturbances, are in no true sense proofs of popular disaffection. The hon. Member for Halifax says that the Italians must not dally and delay on their way to Rome and Venice. That is all very well, but are you thus advancing the Italian cause? Are you not rather increasing the difficulties of those who rule in that country by stimulating the ardent spirits of Italy to rashness which may be fatal to the peace of Europe, by declining to leave them judges of the time and mode of achieving results most difficult of fulfilment, and by taking into our own hands, sitting here at our ease within these four walls, to dictate the rate and the pace at which the Italians are to march to Rome? I cannot help contrasting with that "Young Italian" inspiration the sentiments which I heard the other day from the gallant gentleman who, as the representative of Englishmen, attracted so much attention both in the war of 1859 and subsequently, who fought side by side with Garibaldi, and who has, I believe, a high place in Garibaldi's esteem. I said this was not a party question, and I may say, in justice to him, that I believe his name is still on the books of the Carlton Club. He said to me, "No doubt it is necessary for Italy that she should go further; she cannot stop, you need not be afraid of that; it is impossible for the Italian question to rest at the stage in which it now stands. But do not let us attempt to precipitate consequences for which we are not responsible." "That it is most important," said that gallant gentleman to me, "that the solution of the Roman question should be as rapid as possible, and that Rome should take, as soon as possible, her natural position as the political, geographical, historical, and traditional head of Italy; but don't let the Italians be in a hurry with regard to Venice. If by any chance the Italians could be put in possession of Venice to-morrow it would be premature, and the effect of the removal of the Austrians from Italy, while the Italians were not in possession of Rome, would give rise to an amount of municipal jealousies which would be most threatening to the unity of Italy." I could not help being struck with the great practical prudence and wisdom of that declaration.

The hon. Baronet (Sir George Bowyer) says I am about to pursue a practice to which I am very much given—that of indulging in bitter animosity against Italian Princes, and of making statements to their prejudice. Sir, I do not intend to do any more on this occasion than complete an explanation which was interrupted yesterday by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli). I make no objection either to the manner or the matter of the interruption, but I stated yesterday that, so far as I knew, a young man named Granaj, who was the subject of a certain proceeding on the part of the Duke of Modena, had not been executed, and, as it appeared from reports that I had used words which might give rise to the impression that he had been executed, I was anxious to take the first opportunity of stating that, so far as I knew, that was not the case, and of expressing regret if I had used any language which could lead to the circulation of an erroneous statement. With that, however, I combined a more serious statement. The question is not so much whether a particular individual has or has not been executed, because particular cases of oppression and suffering are merely important as illustrations of the state of lawlessness which has been established under the countenance of Italian sovereigns. The first to which I attempted to draw attention was that by an ex post facto law capital punishment had been made applicable by the Duke of Modena to youths under twenty-one charged with homicide. The Marquess of Normanby has written me a letter, in which he desired that I should withdraw the charge. I am not able to do so, because the evidence in support of it is too certain and too conclusive. This evidence is contained in a work which is printed and published, and which is as accessible to others as it is to me. It was published in Modena in 1859 and 1860, very shortly after the expulsion of the late Duke. It is a work consisting not of comments, nor of extracts, but, so far as I have consulted it, consisting exclusively of original documents, the authenticity of which, to my knowledge, has never been impugned. If those documents were forged, if they were mangled or garbled, the fact would be easy of proof; but their authenticity, I believe, has never been denied. At all events, I speak upon the authority of these documents, and if in a particular instance I misunderstood them, the text was as accessible to others as it was to me, and I am sorry that the error was not immediately corrected. But the fact has not been denied that capital punishment was made applicable to an ex post facto law in the dominions of the Duke of Modena in 1857 to youths charged with homicide. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Under what age?] I will tell you presently. In September, 1857, the Duke of Modena appointed a military commission in his capital to try, by military law, certain offences which were enumerated. But the action of the military commission was not confined to offences committed after the commission itself was established, but it was authorized to deal with offences that had been committed for a very considerable period before—I think two years or more. Those offences were in the first instance brought under the action of the military law; and then, I must add, it was stated that persons who were capitally condemned by the commission were to be executed within twenty-four hours. On the 7th of October, in the same year, the Military commandant, whose name is rather Austrian than Italian, was authorized to apply capital punishment, the edict embracing cases which had happened long previous, to youths under eighteen years. Nor was that all, for the law was altered against the criminal, a law resembling that respecting Queen's evidence in our own country was established by the edict; and it was provided that soldiers, who were of course under the direct orders of the Judges of this tribunal, should be specially qualified to appear as witnesses in the case. That is the upshot of the matter so far as regards the application of an ex post facto law to youths of tender age when charged with homicide. I am much obliged to the House for listening to those observations. I wish it had been in my power to make any general retraction or abandonment of the charges. The book to which I have referred is, I repeat, accessible to the world. Some part of it has been published a year, some part of it for two years; and, as far as I know, there has been no denial of the authenticity of the documents which it contains.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH observed that it was unquestionably much owing to Count Cavour that the unity of Italy had been established; but while due praise was rendered to Cavour they must bear in mind that no small portion of the success which had attended the endeavours for the unification of Italy was attributable to Baron Ricasoli. He believed that had the people of Sardinia known that when Cavour came back to office he would approve of the cession of a portion of the King of Sardinia's territory to France he would never have been brought into office. He had seen it stated that when Baron Ricasoli was invited to take office, his first question was whether there was any notion of the cession of any part of Italy to France, and expressly whether there was any question of the cession of Sardinia. He had good authority for believing that it was only on receiving a direct assurance from the King of Sardinia that there was no intention to cede any part of Italy, and especially Sardinia, that Baron Ricasoli consented to take office. The House, therefore, might take it for granted that, as long as Baron Ricasoli remained at the head of the Government of the King of Italy, not one inch of Italian soil would ever be ceded to any foreign monarch, whether on the peninsular of Italy or in the island of Sardinia. He made that statement from particular knowledge on the subject, and he felt bound to make it in justification of the distinguished man who now held so high a place in the councils of the King of Italy.

MR. LAYARD wished to do justice to the memory of a great man then no more. The hon. and learned Member for Bridgwater (Mr. Kinglake) had said that Cavour deliberately deceived the English Government, and the hon. Member for Tamworth (Sir Robert Peel) had used expressions which might lead to the same inference, though he (Mr. Layard) was sure the hon. Baronet did not credit it. He believed that Count Cavour never intended to deceive the English Government. He (Mr. Layard) had had opportunities of tracing that great man's character from boyhood, and he did not hesitate to declare the noblest feature of his noble character was his love of truth. No doubt at the meeting at Plombières there was a tacit understanding between the Emperor of the French and Count Cavour as to the cession of Savoy and Nice. Count Cavour himself had stated that the Emperor said that if Lombardy and Venice were united to Piedmont, he, not as Louis Napoleon, but as Emperor of the French carrying out the traditional policy of France and responsible for French interests, should, in such an event, insist on the surrender to France of Savoy and Nice. Count Cavour gave no written engagement or verbal promise. He only replied that when Venice and Lombardy were united to Piedmont the Emperor of the French might appeal to the populations of Savoy and Nice, and that if they expressed a wish to be united to France, that wish should be taken into consideration by the King of Sardinia. That declaration was known to many, and was told him by Count Cavour himself. When the Peace of Villafranca was made and the war ceased, without the cession of Venice to Piedmont, the Emperor resigned his claims to Savoy and Nice. Nor was any further claim made to those two provinces until Tuscany, the Duchies and the Legations expressed their determination to be annexed to Piedmont. The Emperor then revived his claim. On the 10th of February Sir James Hudson stated that Count Cavour denied that there was any intention on the part of the King of Sardinia either to cede or to sell the territory of Savoy and Nice. That denial was given over and over again by Count Cavour. He had, however, no intention to mislead the English Government. They knew, from the conversations between the Emperor and Earl Cowley, that until the month of February the Emperor had not expressed his intention to demand the cession of the provinces. Earl Cowley was in that month first told that the Emperor had determined to ask for the cession of Savoy and Nice. Count Cavour still resisted, and although M. Talleyrand was authorized at Turin to demand the cession, Count Cavour, until about the 23rd of February, refused to listen to the demands of the Emperor. M. Benedetti was then sent to Turin to bring an additional pressure to bear. He was told to say that, unless the cession were made in sufficient time to be announced to the Legislative Assembly at its meeting in March, the Emperor would march his troops into Tuscany. He had received that fact from high authority. On the 25th of February Count Cavour, with pain and reluctance, ceded the provinces. Count Cavour was so deeply affected by the act that he had thus been compelled to perform that he could never allude to it without exhibiting the most distressing symptoms of pain and grief; and he (Mr. Layard) remembered, when passing through Turin sometime after, having been entreated by an intimate friend of Count Cavour's not to touch upon a subject which caused him such strong emotion. The Count had to consider whether he should fail in the great schemes he had formed for the greatness and happiness of his country, or cede two provinces to France that were not necessary to Italy. He believed that Count Cavour was considered by the Italians themselves as justified in agreeing to that cession, and that he only yielded to a dire necessity. The punishment of the Emperor of the French had already fallen upon that potentate. Why was his word now doubted? Because he had forfeited his word and honour in this matter. But a more honest, a more honourable, and a more truthful man than Count Cavour never existed, and posterity would do justice to him.

MR. HENNESSY said, he would trouble the House with only a few remarks upon the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer in regard to the late Duke of Modena. He was in the House in March last, when, without the slightest notice, the right hon. Gentleman made an attack on the Duke of Modena. The right hon. Gentleman then held what he called an official document in his hand, which stated that a young man named Granaj was sentenced to be executed. The right hon. Gentleman had withdrawn a part of that charge that night; but he had made the charges against what he called the cruel and lawless Government of the Duke of Modena. The Duke of Modena had reigned for thirteen years. How many capital executions did the House think had taken place in that time? Only five. And those executions had taken place in the early part of his reign, when a state of war was impending in Italy, and when it was necessary to place a portion of his dominions in a state of siege. It was directed by the Duke that the new penalties were to be imposed only when they were lighter than the old. The right hon. Gentleman had said that there was nothing in the despatches to support the statements of the hon. Member for Dundalk. Why, the very first despatch in the blue book, which was a despatch addressed to Sir James Hudson from Mr. Solan, stated that in Castiglione the peasants had risen the moment the military were withdrawn. There were others of a similar nature, and he referred to those documents, not for the purpose of proving that the inhabitants of South Italy were loyal to their Sovereign and abhorred the Piedmontese, but to give the House some idea of the little reliance which was to be placed on the bold assertions of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. KINNAIRD observed, that it was natural to suppose, when a large body of troops was disbanded and thrown on the country, that some disorganization must result. With regard to Cavour, he was convinced that, though a mistake was made in respect to the cession of Nice and Savoy, the brilliant career of that statesman had caused that particular error to be forgotten.

MERCHANT SHIPPING BILL.

QUESTION.

MR. LINDSAY said, that a notice respecting the Merchant Shipping Bill promised to be introduced by the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade had stood on the business paper eight or nine times, and now for some reason had disappeared. It related to a subject in which great interest was felt, and, therefore, he would suggest that the Bill should be laid on the Table, in order that it might be considered by the country during the recess.

MR. LIDDELL said, he knew that considerable disappointment existed among the shipping interest that this great subject had not been dealt with in the present Session. He, therefore, hoped the President of the Board of Trade would take the suggestion into his favourable consideration.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, it was the intention of the Government to have given effect to the remaining recommendations of the Committee, and for that purpose two Bills had been prepared, one for the abolition of passing tolls and for the termination of certain dues that were levied on shipping, and the other for the amendment of the Pilotage Laws, and those relating to the liability of shipowners. Having but a limited portion of the time of the House at his command he thought it better to proceed with one of these Bills before he attempted to proceed with the other; but the other Bill was prepared. Now it was obvious, from the various important subjects with which the House had to deal, that a matter of this kind could only occupy a certain portion of time, and with every desire to pass the measure he really had not found himself able to do so. If he did not accede to the suggestion to lay the Bill on the Table of the House, it was simply because he did not think it would be advantageous to the public interest to do so, inasmuch as there was no intention to push it through its various stages this Session. If he were to lay it on the table, hon. Members would naturally be impatient of having any explanation made with respect to its provisions; and he did not think it would be fair to ask him to introduce it without such comment as might be calculated to meet the objections which might be made against it. Upon that ground, as well as because still further consideration might, on the principle "the longer we live the more we learn," tend to improve the measure, he thought it would be better to postpone its introduction till next Session, at an early period of which he hoped to be able to proceed with it.

CASE OF LIEUTENANT ALLEN.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he would take that occasion to call the attention of the House to the case of Lieutenant Allen, who had been tried by court-martial in India for the murder of his native servant, and who had been convicted of manslaughter and sentenced to four years' imprisonment without hard labour. The proceedings of the court-martial in the case had been confirmed by Lord Clyde in April, 1859, and Lieutenant Allen was sent to Agra. The place, however, having been ascertained to be unhealthy, he was, on the grounds of humanity, removed to England. He had arrived in this country in June, 1860, and was first sent to Chatham; thence he was transferred to Milbank, but the Governor having complained of the transfer, on the ground that the institution was available only for persons condemned to hard labour, he was, on the authority of the Secretary for the Home Department, sent to Weedon, afterwards to Newgate; but, the Commander-in-Chief not deeming that to be a proper place of confinement for him, he was eventually placed in the Queen's Prison. The result was that he brought an action against the governor of the prison at Weedon, and recovered £50 on the ground of false imprisonment. Not satisfied with that, he had the other day brought an action against the Commander-in-Chief, and had recovered an additional sum of £200. There were, besides, he believed, eight other actions, one of them being against the Secretary for the Home Department, and under those circumstances he could not help thinking some explanation ought to be given on the subject. He would, therefore, ask the Judge-Advocate whether he had been consulted with reference to sending Lieutenant Allen from India to this country to undergo the punishment to which he was sentenced here, and, if so, on what section of the Mutiny Act his decision in the matter was based?

MR. HEADLAM, having observed that he believed the facts of the case had been correctly stated by the hon. and gallant Gentleman, said, the documents containing the proceedings of the courts-martial had been forwarded to his office, that he had examined them, and had come to the conclusion that the sentence was right. On a subsequent occasion he had, in answer to a letter—he did not exactly know whether it was of an official character—which had been addressed to him, given it as his opinion that Lieutenant Allen might be transferred to this country under a written order from Lord Clyde. Lieutenant Allen was, however, he believed, despatched from India before the reply could have reached that country, but at all events no written order had been issued by Lord Clyde, and hence arose the illegality of the imprisonment here, which had taken place without his knowledge. His attention had, in consequence of the circumstances of the case, been directed to providing against the recurrence of a similar state of things, and he had, in conjunction with the War Department, introduced an alteration into the Mutiny Act of the year, which would effect the object.

Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Supply considered in Committee.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again on Monday next.

PENSIONS (BRITISH FORCES) INDIA BILL.—SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he must object to proceeding with the Bill at that hour.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the question at issue was a very simple one, and he hoped the House would not refuse to accede to the Motion.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Monday next.

SALMON FISHERIES (SCOTLAND), &c., BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. ROBERTSON said, he should oppose the Bill, as it would have the effect of placing the salmon fishing in all the rivers of Scotland in the hands of a limited number of large proprietors. The measure would encourage poaching, and give rise to great dissatisfaction among the people of Scotland, and he hoped that his hon. Friend who had charge of it would not press going into Committee.

MR. KINNAIRD observed that he was also in favour of delay.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that as almost all the Scotch Members thought that the Bill ought to pass this year, and as it was the best they were likely to get, it was not his intention to postpone the measure.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Short Title),

MR. ROBERTSON moved that the Chairman report Progress.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Chairman do report Progress,"

The Committee divided:—Ayes 14; Noes 45: Majority 31.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 2 (Application of Act),

MR. BUCHANAN said, he objected to proceeding with a Bill of this complicated nature at so late an hour.

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he regarded the Bill as practically carried, and hoped it would be allowed to pass the present stage.

SIR JAMES ELPHINSTONE said, he considered that the Bill had been accepted as a compromise between the different opinions upon the subject, and he trusted that the opposition to its progress would not be persevered in.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 3 to 73 agreed to.

Clauses 74 and 75 postponed.

Clauses 76 to 83 agreed to.

Clause 84 (Weekly Close time),

MR. ROBERTSON said, he would move to leave out the words "between four o'clock on Saturday afternoon and six o'clock on Monday morning," in order to insert the words "between twelve o'clock at noon on Saturday and two o'clock on Monday morning." The early hours in the morning were most important for river fisheries.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"In page 24, line 4, to leave out 'between four of the clock on Saturday afternoon and six of the clock on the following Monday morning,' and insert 'between twelve of the clock at noon on Saturday and two of the clock on the following Monday morning,'"

—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, that following the recommendations of the Committee he must oppose the Amendment.

MR. ROBERTSON said, he would then move that the Chairman report Progress.

Whereupon Motion made, and Question, "That the Chairman do report Progress," put, and negatived.

Original Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 32; Noes 10: Majority 22.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 85 to 119 were also agreed to.

Clause 120 (Licence for Rod fishing),

MR. ROBERTSON objected to the clause, on the ground of its hardship, and that it would lead to confusion and discontent.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he was willing to withdraw that and the three following clauses, and bring them up on the Report.

Question put, "That Clause 120, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 14: Majority 11.

And it appearing that 40 Members were not present:

Mr. SPEAKER resumed the Chair:—House counted, and 40 Members not being present:

House adjourned at half after Two o'clock till Monday next.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

DUCHY OF MODENA—MOTION FOR DESPATCHES.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY, in moving, pursuant to notice, that an Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies or Extracts of any Despatches relating to the Affairs of the Duchy of Modena, from Her Majesty's Ministers accredited to the Courts of Central Italy, during the years 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1858, said, he purposed to extend the terms of his Motion so as to include copies or extracts of any Letter written by Mr. Walton, Her Maesty's Consul in the district of Massa Carrara, with regard to the state of that Duchy. When he first gave notice of this Motion he certainly was very little prepared for the consequences of his attempting to explain the motives and intentions with which he brought the subject forward, or that allusion should have been made, most unusually and irregularly, to the statement which he had felt it his duty to make in giving notice of this Motion. A grave accusation having been put forward on the authority of a Minister of the Crown (Mr. Gladstone), to the effect that orders had been given for the execution of a person contrary to law, in the Duchy of Modena, and that statement having been circulated throughout Europe, he had thought it but fair to give to the colleague of the right hon. Gentleman notice that he was prepared completely to contradict those charges. He also thought the right hon. Gentleman himself ought to have the opportunity of assenting or dissenting from his statement. But when he rose for the purpose of making an explanation with this object he had been much surprised at hearing sounds which were by no means usual in their Lordships' House from a certain number of noble Lords opposite connected with the Government. Thinking it by no means fair that a Prince who had been driven from his country and his throne by the simultaneous attacks of the large armies of France and Sardinia, and who had chosen to retire from his own dominions rather than expose his small body of faithful native troops to certain destruction, should be exposed entirely without defence to attacks such as he had referred to, and believing also that, as the representative of Her Majesty during the period at which those atrocities were alleged to have taken place, it was but right that the House should receive an explanatory statement at his hands, he felt compelled by a sense of duty to state what the facts really were. But when he endeavoured to make that explanation, no sympathy was felt for him in performing a duty which he felt it was imperative upon him to discharge, nor for the Prince who had been so cruelly wronged. Subsequently he put himself into communication with the right hon. Gentleman, and in the course of the correspondence, with which he should have to trouble their Lordships, he thought he had succeeded in convincing him that the question raised was not merely the answer which might be given in one House to debates in the other, but whether a Minister of the Crown, in that responsible position, ought to be allowed to circulate throughout Europe a charge with regard to the Duke of Modena which official documents would show to be entirely unfounded. If the right hon. Gentleman had answered that communication in the spirit in which he felt certain one of their Lordships would have replied to it, he should have had very little to say; but so far was that from being the case that the right hon. Gentleman actually returned to the charge and renewed the insinuations. Though the right hon. Gentleman possessed singular facility of expression, and always conveyed an impression favourable to his views to the assembly which he was addressing, all the reference which he had been able to find in the papers of the notice taken by the right hon. Gentleman of this correspondence was in the following terms:—"The right hon. Gentleman vindicated his former statement with regard to the Duke of Modena." The right hon. Gentleman called the publication from which he had quoted a "book," and said that it was as accessible to any other Member of the House of Commons as to himself. He must have made that statement in entire oblivion of proofs which he (the Marquess of Normanby) had supplied to him that such was not the case. Since that statement was made a gentleman connected with the Duke of Modena had received from one of the Ministers of that Prince a letter, in which he said—

"The book which has served as the text of all the accusations is not yet in my possession, because it appears that the authors, while they sent it round to their friends, took very good care to prevent its falling into the hands of those who, having full knowledge of the facts, could have had no difficulty in refuting them. My bookseller has not yet been able to procure a copy; and a bookseller at Leipsic, who advertises the book in his catalogue, and to whom I wrote sixteen days ago, has not yet sent a reply."

It is evident that this must have been the case, because, judging from the extracts quoted by Mr. Gladstone, which was all that he knew of the book, the inhabitants of Modena would never have listened to such an accusation as that with reference to Granaj, well knowing that during the reign of the Duke but few persons, and those all of mature age and convicted of atrocious crimes, had been executed; and as to the charge of dealing improperly with prisoners, they would have known that it was founded upon prison, to which persons confined by the correctional police were transferred, where they were taught trades and paid wages, and the effect of which had been to reduce theft and petty offences in the proportion of one-third, or from 2,700 some years ago, to 1,800 now. He must trouble the House by reading the correspondence which had passed between himself and Mr. Gladstone on this subject. The day after he was compelled to postpone his Motion he wrote to the right hon. Gentleman to this effect—

"Hamilton Lodge, July 9, 1861.

"Dear Mr. Gladstone,—When I found myself obliged last night to postpone my Motion, and could only fix it for a distant day, I stated that I much regretted the delay, as I could positively disprove the calumnies injuriously affecting the character of the Duke of Modena, the person attacked in the publication to which I should refer. I added that if 'any one anywhere' had given additional publicity to groundless charges I was sure that when he heard the truth he would be the first to express his regret that he had been deceived by those whom he now found unworthy of credit. In obedience to the somewhat capricious observance in this particular instance of the strict rules of order required by some of your colleagues, I stated the case hypothetically; but I am sure you would not the less feel the responsibility of the charges you have distinctly made, and, if convinced that some further step on your part is required, all must agree that the sooner it is taken the better. You are probably aware that the object of the Commission from whom the publication emanated was to collect and give to the world garbled extracts from the confidential correspondence between the Duke and his private secretary, to obtain which the desks of both had been rifled. I am told by a trustworthy person acquainted with all the circumstances of the case that, in order to produce an unfavourable impression abroad (for the book was little circulated where the facts were known), this Commission falsified the chronological order of the documents, perverted their sense, adulterated their substance, and the whole product of their labours became a work of false suggestions, of fraud, and of forgery. I do not expect you to adopt that view from any statement of mine. I have in my hands ample materials for contradicting every one of the seven charges, which you made your own by adoption; but I think, if I can give you the means of satisfying yourself that the most odious charge is a malignant falsehood on the part of those who imposed it upon you, you will feel that not much credit can be given to the minor allegations, which are mostly mere matter of inference. You are reported to have stated distinctly, 'A young man of seventeen, of the name of Granaj, of Carrara, was found guilty of murder, or manslaughter. The law of Modena does not permit capital punishment under the age of twenty-one. After the trial the Duke of Modena sent forth an edict declaring that, notwithstanding the law, the young man should be executed.' Now, no such edict ever existed; no man of the name of Granaj was ever tried for murder, therefore, none such was ever executed. On examining the notes of the presiding Judge General Gentile, it is found that a certain Antonio Granaj, aged 17, was imprisoned for two days for refusing to give evidence; but I understand that there is no trace of a criminal process of any kind at that time against any person of that name. There is a striking fact bearing upon the impossibility of the truth of that charge—that during the whole of the Duke's reign of thirteen years there have been but five cases of capital punishment, all of persons of mature age, and for atrocious murders. Great care was taken not to circulate these infamous calumnies where there was any fear of contradiction. The Duke of Modena never heard of these charges till he read your speech, and, I am informed, exclaimed with honest indignation as to this particular charge, 'If this were true I should feel myself morally guilty of murder.' His Royal Highness may well think he has a right to complain that a Minister of the British Crown should make such a charge without taking any previous pains to ascertain the truth. You will, therefore, excuse me for reminding you that there is a very easy method to put yourself in a position to do tardy justice to the Duke of Modena. You can get the Foreign Office to telegraph to Mr. Walton, Her Majesty's Consul at Carrara, and ask these simple questions—'Was any man of the name of Granaj ever convicted of murder within your recollection? Were more than five persons ever executed during the whole of the Duke of Modena's reign?' You will see that I am very confident as to the authenticity of my information, and all I ask of you is thus to test it. If you do so I am convinced that in a few hours you will be in a position to do justice to the upright and unfortunate Prince you have wronged in the place where the injury was inflicted. And I am sure that you will feel that he does not the less deserve strict justice at your hands because he is utterly defenceless since he was driven from his dominions by the overwhelming power of the arms of France and Sardinia.

"Yours faithfully,

"NORMANBY."

To this Mr. Gladstone replied—

"11, Carlton Terrace, July 9, 1861.

"Dear Lord Normanby,—I have just received your note, and in reply I cannot admit that, as at present advised, I have done wrong to the Duke of Modena. I have not made a single charge except on the authority of published documents, construing them to the best of my ability. These documents had been before the world for nearly two years, I think, at the time I cited them, and their authenticity had never, to my knowledge, been disputed. Such being the case, it was, I think, my duty to assume them to be authentic. Nor, indeed, do I gather from your note that it will now be alleged they are forgeries. If I have misunderstood them, and misstated their natural meaning, then I have done wrong, and upon being convinced of it will express my regret with a strength of language proportionate to the gravity of the charge which may have been made in error. According to my confident recollection I did not state that Granaj was executed. What I believe I stated, and what I think the document strictly justifies, was that the law was altered ex post facto so as to include his crime, and I contrasted this proceeding with another, in which certain criminals appeared to be denied the benefit of an ex post facto mitigation, which had been decreed, I think, between their conviction and their apprehension.

If this and other documents are forged, no words can be strong enough to denounce the baseness of such an act. If they are not, I believe you will not shake an atom of my statements of facts, nor do I think much can be said against the colour that I gave them. Will you permit me to express my regret that the task of vindicating the Duke of Modena does not devolve upon one or other of the very zealous men who uphold in the House of Commons opinions on Italian affairs resembling those of your Lordship? I venture to think the practice of answering in one House speeches made in another so exceptionable, that I have never on any occasion adopted it, and do not foresee that I ever shall. I will read your Lordship's letter to Lord Wodehouse, who has possession of my papers; but I doubt whether he ought to make inquiry upon an isolated question until we know the whole of the statements which are about to be made, and into which we have no opportunity afforded us of inquiring.

"I remain, dear Lord Normanby,

"Very faithfully yours,

"W. E. GLADSTONE."

On the 10th of July he wrote to the right hon. Gentleman—

"Dear Mr. Gladstone,—There is only one point in your letter to which I feel it necessary at once to call your attention. You state 'According to my confident recollection I did not state that Granaj was executed.' I read this sentence with a surprise which I am sure will be shared by everyone who has seen the reports of your speech, either in the most authentic records we have here, or in the best translations in the foreign papers. In all these identical words appear, 'After the trial of Granaj, the Duke of Modena sends forth an edict that, notwithstanding the law, the young man should be executed.' And here you are supposed to have stopped. Now, you must feel that, if any one else had used these words, the inevitable impression on your mind would have been that the sentence had been carried into effect; unless these words were added, 'I must admit that no execution took place.' I feel certain that all those who heard you looked upon this execution as the gravamen of your charges. When you know from me that the Duke of Modena shared, in this respect, the universal impression as to the obvious meaning of your words; when you heard that he indignantly used this expression, 'If this were true, I should feel that I was morally guilty of murder;' I appeal to your sense of justice whether you should lose twenty-four hours before publicly declaring that you are now aware that no such execution ever took place? This is not a question as to answering in one House any debating speech which was made in the other. It is simply this, whether a Minister of the Crown should allow an accusation to be circulated throughout Europe, in his name, of 'moral murder' against an exiled Prince with whom his Sovereign was always on terms of friendly alliance, and this, too, after that Minister disclaims the interpretation of his words on which the charge is founded. All other questions raised by the selections from this book which are coupled with your name throughout Europe may well be reserved till I bring on my Motion. Having been the Queen's representative at Modena during most of the years to which those charges refer I feel it my special duty to re-establish the truth, and I shall call for my periodically-renewed reports of the state of Modena, that they may be judged side by side with the selections you have made from a publication founded, as it appears, on garbled extracts or the alleged substance of stolen private documents never seen by any but the compilers.

"Yours faithfully,
"NORMANBY."

Mr. Gladstone sent the following answer:—

"Downing Street, July 10, 1861.

"Dear Lord Normanby,—I cannot undertake to state, as you require, within twenty-four hours, that I 'am aware that Granaj was not executed.' First, because what you stated in your letter yesterday is wholly at variance with the printed document; and you do not inform me, in reply to my letter, that that document is falsified or forged. Secondly, because I have recently been told that Granaj was executed, and, though I do not absolutely assume this to be correct, yet I cannot certainly assert the contrary. I have no doubt the Duke of Modena speaks what he believes to be true, but one of the curses adhering to certain systems of Government is, that the denial of publicity to the subject places the Sovereign in the hands of Ministers, and each class of governing agents in the power of those who are below them. I do not believe the King of Naples knew a fifth part of the horrors that were perpetrated in his kingdom. I am not a little astonished to be challenged, after five months of anxious and varied business have intervened—I mean, not to have been challenged before if I was challenged at all—upon the accuracy of a particular expression, for which I am not responsible and which I have never read. I will, however, investigate that matter as well as I can by comparison of reports and let you know the result. Meantime I restate the charge which I meant to make, and which I believe I did make. It was this, that while the benefit of ex post facto mitigatory legislation was denied to certain criminals capital punishment was by ex post facto legislation made applicable to the crime of a certain youth named Granaj. I state this thus plainly that you may be able to affirm or to deny it, and to apprise me whether the published document from which I spoke is or is not falsified or forged. It is surely grave enough to demand attention.

"I remain, dear Lord Normanby, faithfully yours,
"W. E. GLADSTONE."

To that he merely replied that after the right hon. Gentleman's last letter it was quite useless to continue the correspondence, and that he reserved the whole case of the Duke of Modena for his Motion in the House of Lords. After that he received the following letters from Mr. Gladstone:—

"July 11, 1861.

"Dear Lord Normanby,—I have now consulted all the accessible reports of the passage in my speech to which you have referred, and, though I cannot remember my words, I think the fair presumption is that I said the Duke issued an edict for the execution of the youth Granaj. What I ought to have said was that the Duke issued an edict ex post facto, bringing the crime of that youth within the category to which capital punishment was applicable. I am most ready to explain without delay this difference, and to express my regret for having stated, as the meaning of the edict, without any qualification, what, though I might have argued it was the intention of the paper, was not its necessary import. But I am desirous in doing this to do all that may be right. Is there more which, from the contents of the paper itself, I ought to say? That there may be no doubt on the subject I send you a copy of it. If it is within your knowledge that in any other respect I have mistaken the meaning of it, I am most ready to be corrected.

"Yours faithfully, W. E. GLADSTONE."

On the 12th of July he wrote to Mr. Gladstone this letter in answer to his of the 11th containing the copy of what he still erroneously called an edict—

"Hamilton Lodge, July 12th, 1861.

"Dear Mr. Gladstone,—I received last night, just before I was obliged to go out, your announcement that you had convinced yourself that you must have said that 'the Duke of Modena had issued an edict for the execution of Granaj, and that you were ready to express your regret on that point;' and I have also to thank you for inviting me to say whether there is any other statement connected with this charge in which I consider you to have been in error, as you are anxious to do all 'that is right.' For this I give you implicit credit. I shall, therefore, in as few words as possible (since I quite feel with you the importance of the explanation being made without delay), give you my opinion with the candour you desire. After your avowal of the general opinion which you feel must have been derived from your reported words as to the execution of Granaj, I have no doubt your feelings will induce you to express yourself satisfactorily as to having been unfortunately the means of propagating throughout Europe so cruel a charge. And here I would willingly leave this point but for a phrase in your letter of the 10th:—'I have recently been told that Granaj was executed.' It was this apparent willingness to revert to a charge which I believed to have been disclaimed which induced me in my note of yesterday morning to declare as useless any further correspondence on the subject. All I wish now to say is that I trust you will not hereafter place any reliance on the statements of the person, whoever he may be, who attempted to palm upon you this wanton falsehood. Now, without stopping to quote the words of your letter, for which I have not time, I regret to have to tell you that what you think you ought to have said is still far removed from a correct statement of the facts of the case as gathered accurately from the papers you quote. In the first place, the paper you send me is not an edict that was ever published, both its form and its substance show that it could not be. It is merely a minute of the Duke's, written and countersigned by his private secretary, which, after the Revolution, was stolen from the cabinet of that secretary, and used for their own purposes by the Piedmontese Provisional Government. This was the form in which his Royal Highness conveyed his confidential instructions to his departmental Ministers. That minute, addressed to the Minister of Justice, points out some alterations in the new criminal code. If it had been a published edict it must have been countersigned by that Minister. In "

proposed amendment of the code then under consideration the monstrous crime committed by this Granaj in the year 1855 makes his Royal Highness think desirable some further alterations with regard to the crimes to be excepted in the future code. Now, so far from justifying the assertion that the Duke intended to make an ex post facto law, it proves directly the contrary, as by the first paragraph the Duke distinctly adopts the inadequate sentence against Granaj as prescribed by law. Before I went out last night I made a literal translation of the documents you sent me, which you will see cannot be otherwise construed. Therefore, in answer to your appeal as to what you ought to do, I should say, first, as to the charge of the execution of Granaj, act according to your own feelings; secondly, admit that there is no proof that the Duke ever published an edict as to the case of Granaj; thirdly, explain that the minute you have seen has no one character of an ex post facto law. I send you my translation; I am sure it is correct.

"Yours faithfully,

"NORMANBY."

This was the translation of the document to which he referred—"To the Minister of Grace and Justice.

"Seeing the atrocious case of the assassination committed by a certain Granaj of Carrara; seeing that the sentence relative to it is based on the local statute, that the assassin cannot be condemned to death because he has not attained the age of 21 years; seeing that it is not in the project of the new Criminal Code to make any other exceptions upon this point except the crimes of sacrilege and high treason, we ordain that such exception applicable to the two crimes here above cited shall be extended to all kinds of premeditated homicide, or committed without that adequate provocation which might be pleaded as such.

"Dottore CARLO SARESI, Segretario di Gabinetto.

"Dear Lord Normanby,—I will endeavour to get at the bottom of this Granaj case as far as the whole of the printed documents will enable me, and I will explain to the full extent which the evidence will warrant it, either to-day or Monday, as I may be able. Those who told me that Granaj was executed did not state it as final or authoritative information; and what appears probable, as far as I have yet gone, is that he was sentenced to be confined to the galleys for life. I should have thought these published documents must have passed into the hands of the Duke and his friends. They are, however, ill-arranged as well as voluminous, and hence it is that I am reluctantly obliged to hesitate about saying at once what I may have to say.

"Faithfully yours,

"July 12, 1861.

"Dear Lord Normanby,—I am now in a condition to tell you what, from the documentary information in my hands, I can consistently and properly state in reference to the youth Granaj, and to the charge against the Duke of Modena

of having brought homicide by youths under age within the reach of capital punishment by means of an ex post facto law. I fear it may not give you much satisfaction. First, I think that I put a construction on the document I cited beyond what it properly bears. It is certainly not an order for execution; and I am ready to express my deep concern for having used words that might fairly be held so to describe it; and, though I think that the order apparently indicates an intention of operating ex post facto, it may, as a single document, be otherwise construed. Secondly, I do not assert that Granaj was brought within the operation of the law; and such evidence as I possess appears to show that he was not put to death, but sent to the galleys for life. Thirdly, I am sorry to say that the general charge remains in full force and with circumstances of aggravation. In September, 1857, the Duke by decree appointed a military commission—apparently a commission of Austrian officers—to try persons charged with homicide; and authorized this commission to try all pending causes of that class in which the act was charged to have been committed anterior to the appointment of the commission, and since the (previous) 'state of siege' had been abolished. Persons capitally condemned were to be executed within twenty-four hours. Fourthly, on the 7th of October, in the same year, the Duke authorized the military commandant to apply this capital punishment to youths under eighteen years of age, and, combining this with the last paragraph giving the law ex post facto operation, you will see that the ex post facto operation is made applicable to youths under eighteen. The Duke of Modena at the same time alters the law of the country by admitting the evidence of accomplices and that of soldiers—that is to say, persons under the military control of the judges themselves. I quote from the same repository of published documents, and not from any comment upon them. Might I venture to recommend your personal inspection of the collection? I am quite ready to make, or not, as you think fit, an explanation to the effect above described, and

"I remain, faithfully yours,

"W. E. GLADSTONE."

On the 13th he wrote to Mr. Gladstone—

"Hamilton Lodge, July 13th, 1861.

"Dear Mr. Gladstone,—If you adhere to the intention you announced to me of taking the earliest opportunity of expressing your regret as to the errors into which you had fallen yourself and led others upon the only grave charge you had made against the Duke of Modena, referring exclusively to the case of Granaj in 1855, I can have no objection to the manner in which you propose to do so. But if you mean to avail yourself of that opportunity to bring forward new charges against the Duke, I must protest against the unfairness of that proceeding, although I happen to have in my hands authentic materials for contradicting the fresh allegation relating to quite a different period, put forward in the letter I have just received. Should you persevere in this strange method of making amends for admitted mistakes I shall give these additional contradictions when I dispose, I trust satisfactorily, of the other five minor charges, which throughout Europe are only known as coupled with your name. On that occasion, I, of course, reserve the option of using our correspondence as the best mode of doing full justice to both parties.

"Yours faithfully,
"NORMANBY."

He did not think that the right hon. Gentleman, sitting on the bench with other Ministers, and speaking in the name of the British Crown, ought to have made charges with the levity with which these charges had been made. The last letter which he received from Mr. Gladstone was as follows:—

"11, Carlton Terrace, July 15, 1861.

"My dear Lord Normanby.—If you think fit to supply me with the evidence on which you are prepared to contradict the documents referred to under Nos. 3 and 4 of my last letter, I shall be most happy to consider it. If you do not I shall then state, with your approval, that you have apprised me you mean to contradict, but have not been disposed to put your proofs in my hands. I have no intention of bringing any new charge against the Duke of Modena. I think it would be ungenerous to do so in connection with an explanation such as is intended. But my charge was that he had by an ex post facto edict brought youths under age, charged with homicide, within reach of capital punishment. This charge I unfortunately find to be true, and I, therefore, cannot recede from it. You treat what I said about Granaj as the principal charge, and the others as minor. Of course it is open to you to classify them as you please; but the classification is yours, not mine. I did not treat it as the principal charge; I look upon all these charges alike, as mainly important from their tendency to illustrate that character of real lawlessness which, unhappily, distinguished the Government of Modena. What I understand you to ask is this, that when I state my charge not to be proved by page 6, I should refrain from stating that it is more than proved by pages 11 and 14. To this I think your Lordship will see I could not accede.

"I remain, faithfully yours,

The right hon. Gentleman alluded in this letter to a publication which no one that he knew of had seen but himself, and which certainly was not such a document as he had any right to quote. To that letter he replied as follows:—

"Hamilton Lodge, July 16, 1861.

"Dear Mr. Gladstone,—I never saw the publication to which you refer, nor do I know anything of its contents, except from the selections you yourself made; but I know the infamous means by which it was concocted, and the disrepute in which the characters of the compilers are held. It was never communicated to the Duke of Modena, and neither he nor his friends ever saw it, nor had their attention been called to the charges, except by the translation of your speech; but for that they would not have condescended to notice anything coming from so impure a source. Therefore, I positively decline to discuss by letter any new charges which you have taken from that book. If you choose to enter into a new campaign, under the auspices of these persons, I have no doubt I shall on Monday next have so many more opportunities of proving how you have been deceived. I think it fair, however, to caution you against proceeding with the levity shown in your letter of the 12th, where you talk of the commission, apparently composed of Austrian officers.' Can it be possible you have spoken and written all this about Modena in ignorance of the notorious fact that every Austrian officer had been removed from the duchy with the army of occupation eighteen months before the period to which you refer? If you choose to introduce these topics, and to say that I was not disposed to put my proofs into your hands, you will, of course, give my reasons for such refusal; but I trust you will see that it better on every account to confine your explanation to those points on which you feel yourself indisputably wrong, by which means you will do the best in your power to remedy the personal injury you have inflicted.

"Yours faithfully,
"NORMANBY."

The right hon. Gentleman's explanation was so unsatisfactory that in some of the papers it was summarized thus—

"Mr. Gladstone vindicated his former statements with regard to the Duke of Modena."

If that were the case, Mr. Gladstone certainly did not express himself with the extreme facility and ability which he displayed when he knew exactly what was the impression which he wished to convey. He had a perfect answer to all the charges which had been made. So far from substituting the military for the civil code, the Duke had directed that, where there was any distinction between them in regard to any particular crime, the milder punishment of the two should be applied. With respect to the Commission, only five persons had been executed under it, and not one of them within twenty-four hours after sentence, as Mr. Gladstone had asserted. No intention of the sort had ever been entertained. No doubt there were many of the victims of General Cialdini and General Pinelli who would have been very glad of this twenty-four hours' respite. He had another witness on this point to which he begged their Lordships' particular attention. Since Mr. Gladstone made his statement he had received a letter from the Duke of Modena, which showed the frankness and honesty of his conduct, and which also disposed of Mr. Gladstone's insinuation that the Duke knew nothing of what his Government were doing. He would read to their Lordships three extracts from that letter. The first related to the manner in which the Duke left his territory, and was as follows:—

"If I have not the means to supply you with the further documents that you desire, I beg you to take into your consideration that in quitting my States, I did not touch the archives or even the confidential papers of my own private secretary. I did not wish to displace anything which might be necessary to guarantee the personal interests of any one. This would suffice to prove that I did not feel myself guilty of any injustice whatever, and that I did not fear the judgment of honest men. You will recollect that I had ample time to carry off everything, but I then believed a powerful foreign invader, united with an Italian King, would be less disloyal than they proved to be after their victories. The latter stooping, by means of his political agents, to personal libels, procured at the price of the violation of the secrecy of strictly private letters."

With regard to Granaj's case, the Duke wrote—

"I now know the alleged test. I say alleged because it is impossible to remember all one may have written or proposed in so many years of government. The alleged text of the principal ground of the accusation of Mr. Gladstone is this; the order which I gave to a Commission which was to compile the project of a new code, referring to a condemnation against a certain Granaj, guilty of premeditated homicide. The text quoted will suffice to refute the calumnious assertion of Mr. Gladstone that I had caused a man to be put to death whom the law did not condemn to that penalty. I took occasion from such a premeditated case of homicide to prescribe that in the new code relating to atrocious crimes, when evident malicious intent was shown, the extreme penalty might be applied, even when the accused should be under twenty-one years of age. Such an exception had already been made for criminals guilty of high treason. In the code established in 1856 the age of eighteen was established as the minimum for the application of the penalty of death in cases comprising these crimes. My order was to apply to future cases, and not to Granaj; for that would have been giving a retrospective force to a law injuriously affecting a criminal, and, therefore, an act highly reprehensible. Thus, therefore, falls to the ground the principal accusation that Mr. Gladstone brings against me."

The third extract related to Mr. Gladstone's accusation of the general arbitrary nature and lawlessness of the Duke's Government, and on this point the Duke wrote—

"If my Government had been as arbitrary as Mr. Gladstone likes to believe it, I know not why so many families emigrated with me. Why, up to this time, not one has returned home, although suffering much thereby in their material interests. Why my troops abandoned their country and their families for an indefinite period, resisting seductions of every kind, and menaces of revolutionary vengeance. Why, in short, troops cut off from their own country should continue to recruit their ranks far better even than when I held authority in my hands."

The publication on which Mr. Gladstone had relied was not a solitary instance. It was tried with similar success by the same person against the Duchess of Parma, and also by other Piedmontese agents against the Grand Duke of Florence. A couple of years ago everybody was full of the story that the Grand Duke had left orders to bombard Florence; but who now believed it? With regard to the present state of Italy, there was a perfect system of deception practised by every one acting on behalf of the Piedmontese Government. Their Lordships knew that it existed in the Ministers of the King, because they had suffered from one of the greatest diplomatic deceptions ever attempted, when, on the occasion of the first discussion last year respecting the annexation of Savoy and Nice, a telegram with these words of Count Cavour was produced by the noble Lord opposite, "I have no intention either to sell, barter, or exchange an inch of territory." Just to show how our unsuspecting agents were imposed upon in different parts, their Lordships would find that Mr. Bonham wrote home from Naples to the effect that Count San Martino had told him that there had been great exaggeration about the reactionary bands; that there were only five of them consisting of about 100 men in each. Such a story made one ashamed of diplomacy. So far from there being only 500 men in arms in all the dominions of Naples, five times as many thousands were known to be scattered over the kingdom. Now, he thought their Lordships had a right to some accurate information on this subject, and if Sir James Hudson did not choose to write his own account of these transactions he would suggest to Her Majesty's Government an easy method of being better informed of what went on in Naples. They might refer to the official documents respecting the proceedings of the Turin Chamber of Deputies, and there they would find how far the opinions of the Neapolitan deputies corresponded with that of Count San Martino. Such was the condition to which the country was reduced by the Sardinian Government that if the people were now called upon for their votes the result would be very different. If the official accounts to which he alluded were forthcoming, Mr. Gladstone would find a charge made against the Sardinian Government of treating most harshly an individual whom they imprisoned, and distinct charges were also made against them of falsifying telegrams. He would also ask the noble Lord how he would explain the return of General Pinelli? Early in the Session, when he read General Pinelli's proclamation, the noble Lord said that the best proof that it had been disapproved by the Sardinian Government was that Pinelli had been recalled; but how was that consistent with the fact of his re-employment? It was proper that the Government should be in possession of accurate information before they arrived at such hasty judgments as those of Mr. Gladstone. The whole of Southern Italy was in a state of hopeless anarchy, and throughout the whole of the rest of Italy there was a growing distaste for the Piedmontese domination, and the people at any moment were ready to break out into open revolt. The noble Marquess concluded by moving—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty for Copies or Extracts of any Despatches relating to the Affairs of the Duchy of Modena from Her Majesty's Minister accredited to the Courts of Central Italy, during the Years 1855, 1856, 1857, and 1858.”

LORD WODEHOUSE thought he was entitled to ask the House whether it was a convenient plan that a Member of one House should be attacked as to a particular statement which he had made, and that allegations should be made against him affecting his personal accuracy, in the House of which he was not a Member, and in which he was not himself present to answer this attack? No doubt it would be very disagreeable to the accusers of Mr. Gladstone to meet him face to face. No doubt they found it a great deal more convenient to bring these charges where he himself was not present to answer them; but it would be only fair and just towards him, and would only accord with the usual practice of Parliament, that the accusations should be brought forward in the House where the statements complained of were made. Now, the whole of the speech made by the noble Marquess referred to statements made some months ago by a Member of the other House, and in point of strict order it was not open to a Member of one House to comment upon a speech made in the other. He disclaimed the slightest wish, however, to avoid entering into the case. What he wanted to hear from the noble Marquess was whether the documents which had been printed and published at Modena were forgeries or not. [The Marquess of NORMANBY: How am I to know?] Well, then, how was he (Lord Wodehouse) to know? [The Marquess of NORMANBY: I have not seen them.] When grave accusations of this kind were brought forward, it was surely desirable to study the documents out of which they arose. These documents, for the authenticity of which he was not called upon to vouch, were published at Modena by the authority of the Provisional Government, and were declared to have been found in the archives of the Modenese Government. Some of them were published in 1859 and others in 1860. Of course, if it could be shown that they were not authentic, all that was based upon them at once fell to the ground; but they were uncontradicted in any form by those who were supposed to have written them. Indeed, the noble Marquess himself had given some confirmation to them when he said that those by whom they had been published had stolen private letters. The noble Marquess did not allege that they were forgeries, and seemed to admit that they were private letters containing orders given by the Duke of Modena to his Ministers. Then the noble Marquess said they were not edicts. Now, that was the very thing he complained of. The main charge against the Duke was that he was constantly interfering with the ordinary administration of the law, and interfered not by edicts, but by rescripts addressed to his principal Ministers, which rescripts, affecting the personal liberty of his subjects, were by him considered to be private letters. If it were necessary to justify the declaration of the right hon. Friend that there was a state of utter lawlessness in the dominions of the Duke of Modena, he thought such a justification could be found in the remark of the noble Marquess, without going any further. But he wished to point out something which the noble Marquess had omitted to remark—namely, that the particular statement respecting the alleged execution of Granaj, about which Mr. Gladstone admitted that there might be some inaccuracy, was only one of many statements made by his right hon. Friend. The noble Marquess said nothing whatever about the other statements. Mr. Gladstone in his speech alluded to a variety of orders issued by the Duke of Modena. As to the case of Granaj Mr. Gladstone admitted he was in error in saying he was executed; but he still contended that the law which was made applicable to him was an ex post facto law; and a further examination of the papers confirmed the view he had taken. It appeared that a state of siege was established at Carrara; that came to an end on the 13th of December, 1854. A military commission was appointed in 1857, that was empowered to judge a variety of crimes. One of them was "insults by words against the military authorities." Another order made the law of capital punishment applicable to persons under eighteen years of age. Another order gave the Military Commission power to judge all crimes committed since the state of siege was put an end to. Their Lordships would observe the dates. The state of siege was terminated on the 13th of December, 1854. The Military Commission was appointed in 1857, and it was empowered to take cognizance of all crimes committed since the close of the state of siege. Now, the order referring to the man Granaj was dated the 27th of August, 1855. It was perfectly possible for crimes committed between 1854 and 1855 to have been judged by an ex post facto law; it was impossible to put any other construction on the documents; that being the case, he thought Mr. Gladstone was not without justification in making the statement. It appeared also from these documents that the Duke of Modena wrote a letter to one of his Ministers in which he complained of the tribunal of appeal, which he said made itself the advocate instead of the Judge of criminals. Another point the noble Marquess had alluded to in a rather cursory manner. He spoke of a certain house of detention as if it were a reformatory where prisoners were taught useful trades. But one of these orders issued by the Duke of Modena did not seem to bear out the description. By this order the Duke, alluding to the prisoners who were under condemnation for criminal offences—about 254 in number—said that with regard to one-third of these, in consequence of the mildness of their sentences, they were to be confined in the reformatory after the expiration of their sentence, until they had given proof of amendment. That the sentences of the Judges would be thus revised by the Executive, and persons kept in prison for indefinite period, was, he thought, rather arbitrary. The noble Marquess said that only five persons were executed in Modena during a considerable period. [The Marquess of NORMANBY: The Duke's whole reign.] During the whole reign of the Duke. But Mr. Gladstone's charge was not of cruelty, but of arbitrary Government; that the Duke revised the sentences of the Judges as he thought proper, and that this was an intolerable system. Another case was curious. Three prosecutions were dismissed by the Judge "for want of proof." The Duke calls this "a pretended want of proof, when there was the unanimous deposition of the forza pubblica." In another order the Duke complains of want of vigour in repressing a disturbance in a theatre in Carrara; he says, "The soldiers are to make use of their arms," and that "a wounded soldier ought to cost dear to a population that is guilty of such a misdeed." It appeared that the Duke interfered in every way with the administration of the law. But, not satisfied with defending the Duke of Modena, the noble Marquess had taken Her Majesty's Government to task in reference to the reappointment of General Pinelli, who had been sent back to Naples. They were not responsible for that or any other appointment of the Italian Government. The noble Marquess complained of all the official reports received from Italy that were not in accordance with his own views, and thought no confidence ought to be placed in them. For instance, he was surprised that Mr. Consul Bonham should exhibit such a want of information as to the brigandage in the Neapolitan territory. But a few weeks afterwards, when the number of the bands had increased, Mr. Bonham reported, on the 8th of June, that brigandage "prevails to a great and alarming extent." He could not see why the noble Marquess should complain because Mr. Bonham did not, in his first Report, make the number so large as in the second. As to the papers asked for by the noble Marquess, he did not suppose that they could be of any use to him personally, and, without further inquiry, he was not prepared to say that they could be produced without inconvenience to the public service.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I think it is a matter of regret that at this late period of the Session my noble Friend (the Marquess of Normanby) should have thought it necessary to call attention to the case of the Duke of Modena; but I by no means desire to cast the slightest imputation or blame on my noble Friend for having come forward in the manner he has to satisfy what appeared to him to be the claims of public justice, as well as of private friendship for a Prince in misfortune, inasmuch as the Duke of Modena has been in an extraordinary and unusual manner attacked by one of the Cabinet Ministers of this country. It may be but of little importance to us what course the Duke of Modena pursued when he filled the position of a reigning Prince; but it is of the greatest importance to the character of this country and to the character of Parliament that a member of the Government should not avail himself of the facilities afforded to him by his official position and his seat in Parliament to throw out against a deposed Sovereign, on no sufficient evidence, a charge which it was impossible that the person accused should have an opportunity of meeting. And when the noble Lord opposite (Lord Wodehouse) says he thinks it a most extraordinary thing that my noble Friend should not have brought forward his defence of the Duke of Modena in the place where the accusation was made, he must know that my noble Friend has no opportunity of making that defence in the House of Commons, and no opportunity of bringing the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer face to face with him in this House. What the noble Marquess has done has not been to bring him face to face; but in the correspondence he has driven the right hon. Gentleman from point to point, and obtained from him a reluctant, though in some respects certainly not a gracious, retraction of errors into which he has fallen. I think a generous mind would naturally shrink with repugnance from taking advantage of the opportunity—even if forced upon him—of expressing in the House of Commons exultation and triumph over the fallen and putting forth slanders against the unfortunate; yet, without the slightest necessity, or any provocation to such a course, the right hon. Gentleman has in his place in the House of Commons brought against an absent Sovereign charges of the most heinous character—accusations which he has subsequently admitted that on investigation he is not able to substantiate. I have seen the letter from the Duke of Modena to my noble Friend to which the noble Marquess has made reference. I think my noble Friend exercised a wise discretion in not reading that letter, which is very long; but if it could be laid before your Lordships you would see that there is not a sentence in it that does not denote that it has emanated from a man conscious of the rectitude of his own conduct, and feeling that he has been unjustly accused by the Minister of a friendly Sovereign who, availing himself of the opportunity which his position as a Minister and a Member of Parliament afforded him, has given utterance to those charges, and stated them in such a manner as would convey the impression that they were founded on official documents to which he, as a Member of the Government, had access. And now, as to official documents, the noble Lord opposite held in his hand a book which appeared to be very voluminous, and which, perhaps, the Duke of Modena, my noble Friend, or none of us in this House has ever seen; but having heard one or two quotations from that book, we are called on to state whether in our opinion those documents are forged or not. Not having seen them, it is impossible for us to say. This my noble Friend said, that if some were authentic they had been obtained by the basest means and in the most unworthy manner. He further stated that papers had been left by the Duke of Modena in the confidence that they contained nothing against his character or which a generous enemy could publish to his disadvantage. They were left in the archives of Modena. Whether what we have heard of them have been correctly published we do not know, but if they have been they do not bear out the charges which Mr. Gladstone thought fit to bring against the Duke of Modena in the House of Commons. The noble Lord opposite enters on the discussion as to whether the Government of the Duke of Modena was an arbitrary one; and he appeals to the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack to know what he should think if the Executive of this country were to call on the Judges to revise their sentences, with a view to making them more severe. It is not necessary to tell us that the Duke of Modena's was not a constitutional Government; it is not necessary to tell us that he had an arbitrary power. It may be very objectionable that any Sovereign should have it in his discretion to exercise such a power; but that is not the question—the question is whether the Duke of Modena is open to the specific charge of which Mr. Gladstone said he was guilty. He did not volunteer in the House of Commons to show the arbitrary character of the Government, but the arbitrary, cruel, and disgraceful manner in which, according to him, the Duke of Modena had exercised the power placed in his hands; in proof of which he stated that by an ex post facto edict he ordered the execution of a young man who did not come within those laws of the country which provided capital punishment. The charge of Mr. Gladstone was that an edict for the execution of Granaj was issued, and it was left to be inferred that the young man was executed. That is now retracted, I admit, but in what manner? Mr. Gladstone says, "I think my words conveyed something more than I was justified in saying; but there was an ex post facto edict which rendered the young man liable to be executed." My Lords, that is a very different statement from the first; but even that has been clearly disproved by the evidence read by my noble Friend. No young man under the age of twenty-one has ever been executed in Modena during the Duke's reign. That is an indisputable fact which defies all contradiction or question. It is true that after atrocious crimes had been committed a letter was sent from the Duke of Modena to his Minister, directing an alteration to be made in regard to the laws. In that document the Duke does point out the inadequate sentence that had been passed on Granaj under the existing law, and directs that the law shall be modified so as to include within the offences liable to capital punishment the case of deliberate murder, even though the criminal is under twenty-one years of age. Is the alteration therein suggested a very unjust one? I should like to know whether in this country a man under the age of twenty-one years is not liable to execution for deliberate murder? The law of this country recognizes no such distinction as that which would exempt a person from capital punishment because he is under age. The Duke of Modena thinks there ought not to be such an exemption in his country, and he sends a direction to his Minister, who is drawing up a new code of law, and says, "Make under the new law premeditated murder, even when committed by persons under the age of twenty-one, punishable by capital punishment." Why, that is the law here, and that is the ground upon which Mr. Gladstone's charge rests, of an ex post facto edict having been issued by which Granaj was made subject to the penalty of death. Even under this direction—for it was not an edict, but a direction to a Minister to prepare an edict making an alteration in the law—there was no such intention as that alleged in the charge. No one pretends to say that the edict was ever carried into effect. In point of fact, it never was an edict at all; but in the letter quoted by my noble Friend, the Duke of Modena, distinctly and emphatically declares that even this direction was not intended to apply to the case of Granaj or to any other that had occurred, and, moreover, he declares, in the language of an honest man, that if he had intended to give a retrospective operation to the proposed law such an intention would have been most reprehensible. As an indication of the animus which dictated this charge, I may observe that Mr. Gladstone stated that the Duke of Modena had directed this edict to be acted on by a Commission composed of Austrian officers, and that this Commission was directed not to refuse the evidence of soldiers. The not refusing the evidence of soldiers where the population was in insurrection, and the place was in a state of siege, was made one of the gravamina of the charges against the administration of the law under the Duke of Modena. But my noble Friend has shown conclusively that whereas the Duke of Modena was charged with causing Granaj to be executed, the fact was that he never was executed. He was charged with having passed an ex post facto enactment authorizing him to be executed—it was shown that no such ex post facto legislation was passed; he was charged with having caused him to be tried by a Commission of Austrian officers—it was proved that for eighteen months there had not been an Austrian officer in his dominions; he was charged with having enforced an ex post facto law, by which persons under twenty-one years of age were executed—it was proved that there were only five persons executed under the Duke's whole reign, each of whom had committed offences punishable with death under the civil law of the country, and that not a single person under twenty-one years of age was punished with death then or at any other time. These are the charges that were made against an absent and unfortunate Sovereign; and when these questions come to be discussed in the House of Lords, their Lordships, feeling the injury which has been done to the character of the country by one of the Ministers of the Crown availing himself of his position to put forth groundless and unfounded charges, and then refusing to offer a frank and fair refutation and retractation of charges, such as I should have thought an honourable man would have been only too eager to make—then, forsooth, we are met with the plea that he is not here to defend himself, and that we are bringing an accusation against him in his absence. Why, the accusation against the Duke of Modena was not only made in his absence, but was circulated all over Europe in the columns of The Times, and went forth as having been made in the freest assembly in the world by a Minister of the Crown, with all the authority of the Government to back it up; and that allegation must have been received as true unless some person, prompted by the honourable motives which have actuated the noble Marquess, and possessing his means of information, had come forward to contradict the charge, and to scatter to the winds the accusations made by Her Majesty's Chancellor of the Exchequer. My noble Friend says, if you wish for information relative to the years in which those transactions are said to have occurred, you have the means of furnishing the House with them; and those very documents, though they are not brought forward, have been quoted from this evening. [Earl GRANVILLE made a gesture of dissent.] Why, I see them now in the noble Lord's hand. We have never seen them, and we cannot act upon them. I always thought the rule was that the Minister, if he did not feel himself at liberty to lay papers upon the table of the House, should abstain from quoting from them. My noble Friend says if you wish to have authentic information as to the proceedings in Modena, as to the conduct of the Government, and the relations between the Government and the people, the estimation in which the Duke was held, and as to the general condition of the country, you will lay on the table those Reports which you received from your agents during the last three years; and we shall then be able to see whether there is in them anything which justifies the charges of misconduct and criminality brought by the Chancellor of the Exchequer against the Duke of Modena. I think it is a matter of perfect indifference to my noble Friend whether these documents are produced or not. Of this I am quite sure, that if they could substantiate the charges made by the Chancellor of the Exchequer there would be no repugnance or difficulty on the part of his colleagues about laying them on the table. If they are refused, I presume the fair inference will be, to say the least, that they do not support those charges. I certainly have a very strong suspicion on my own mind that they contain abundant matter for repudiating them. I should by no means recommend him to press for their production against the wish of Her Majesty's Government, I think he may feel perfectly satisfied with what has taken place. And I trust what has passed in this House will afford some reparation to that unfortunate and injured Sovereign—into the merits of whose Government I will not enter—for the grievous wrong and injustice which have been perpetrated upon him in the other House of Parliament.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, I entirely agree with all that has fallen from the noble Earl as to its being disagreeable, even if necessary, to make an attack, not merely upon a deposed Sovereign, but upon any individual, whatever his position, who may be in adversity, and who is not present to defend himself. But that principle has been pushed to an extreme which seems to me utterly indefensible. What is there in the character of a deposed Sovereign that renders it impossible, in the course of a discussion in Parliament bearing upon political questions, to bring any act of the Duke of Modena, fairly stated, before the public? Or in what way are the charges brought against that Sovereign more reprehensible than the political and personal attacks which we have heard in this House almost daily from the noble Marquess upon the King of Sardinia, his Ministers and Generals, who, equally with the Duke of Modena, are absent from this House, and have no available means that I know to repel the attacks made upon them? I confess I cannot see the difference between them. The charges brought against Mr. Gladstone with so much energy by the noble Earl who has just sat down appear to me to amount to this—that he had no business whatever to bring any accusations whatever against the Duke of Modena, and that those which he did make were unfounded. I can conceive nothing more reasonable than, in a discussion on the great Italian question, very much turning on the right of resistance on the part of the people against the constituted Government, inquiry should be made as to the character of that Government, the treatment which the people have received, and the reason which they have to complain. I think if it could be shown that the Government of the Sovereign of that country had a revolutionary tendency—and there is no course more pregnant with revolution than a rule systematically opposed to the established law of the country—it would have a very material bearing upon the discussion. And such was the line of argument adopted by my right hon. Friend. But one single point of his argument and his charges has been impugned. After a correspondence with the noble Marquess, and after a careful examination of the facts, my right hon.

Friend came to the conclusion that he had been mistaken in one respect, and had drawn a wrong inference. He, thereupon, went down to the House of Commons and made a statement exactly to that effect. The noble Earl has referred to that speech, of which he derives his impression from a short abstract in a weekly paper. I sometimes read a weekly paper, in which I see short abstracts of the noble Earl's remarks, and I can assure him he would by no means acknowledge that they contained a correct representation of what had fallen from him. The noble Earl, who must have been in desperate want of an argument, says it is not the rule to read from private letters or from despatches which have not been laid on the Table of the House. It is not the habit of any Government that I know of to lay on the Table documents belonging to other Governments. This book was published by the order of the de facto Government established at Modena at the time—a revolutionary Government I admit, but which was afterwards regularly constituted. The book consists of documents found in the archives; it has been published now for more than a year, and its contents have never been impugned. The noble Earl says the Duke of Modena never read it;—that fact appears to me perfectly incomprehensible. I have got a copy of the book myself, several friends of mine possess copies of it, and it was circulated all over Italy. If the Duke of Modena doubted its authenticity, and had been unable himself to procure a copy, he could easily have procured an agent who would have got access to it and investigated its contents; and if these could have been shown to be fictitious they would have inflicted indelible disgrace upon the men who forged such documents. But nobody has ventured to say that they are not literal copies of the instructions given by the Duke of Modena or his Minister to his private Secretary. The noble Earl says he presumes we shall refuse the papers asked for by the noble Marquess, and he, thereupon, grounded a charge against Her Majesty's Government. I can only express my own belief that it would be useless to produce them. It may be satisfactory to the noble Marquess to see what he wrote; but I cannot say I should think it perfectly conclusive if no such charges appeared in them. But, if the House thinks that it is worth the expense to print them, I conceive there will be no disadvantage to the public service in allowing them to be laid on the Table. I certainly object to these personal discussions. And I think, with my noble Friend the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, it would be infinitely more satisfactory if they occurred in the House in which the debate originally took place. The noble Marquess, in the course of his speech, did little more than read letters; and, as there are several persons in the other House who take the same strong interest in foreign politics as the noble Marquess, I do not see in what way the Duke of Modena's case could have suffered had he placed the papers in the hands of some Member of the House of Commons to enable him to reply to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. I am bound to say that anything more incorrect than the statement that all the charges of the Chancellor of the Exchequer have been scattered to the winds I never yet heard.

LORD BROUGHAM said, that when a person was reading a correspondence in which he had himself taken part, it was very common for him to read his own letters with much greater distinctness, with much more emphasis, and much more audibly, than his adversary's. That was what had occurred with the noble Marquess. When he sat, as he did at the commencement of his noble Friend's speech, in his usual place on the other side of the House, he heard every word, every syllable, and every letter of his noble Friend's letters; but whether it was that in the transition from his own to Mr. Gladstone's letter his noble Friend dropped his voice—not knowingly and wilfully—God forbid he should charge him with that!—or from other causes, he certainly did not hear the letters of the right hon. Gentleman. When he came to the side of the House from which he was then speaking he heard better; but still Mr. Gladstone's letters were not read with the same emphasis and in the same clear tone as were those of his noble Friend. The charge against Mr. Gladstone was this—he accused the Duke of Modena of issuing a retrospective edict which went to the punishment of offenders who were not then of legal age, and he assumed that that edict had had its operation, and had caused the execution of a person named Antonio Granaj. It was natural that Mr. Gladstone should think that if the Duke of Modena issued this edict he did it with the intention that it should be carried into effect, because it was known that the Duke was "nauseated" with certain sentences because he thought them too mild; and it was also natural that he should suppose that execution had actually taken place, because in Modena procedure was very summary, and execution followed very rapidly upon sentence. Again, as this edict was issued for the express purpose of punishing persons for offences committed previous to its being issued, it was a very probable presumption that this offender had been executed. More than that, however, Mr. Gladstone had information that the execution had in fact taken place, so that the probability was in his mind, connected with something like certainty. The charge against him was that when he discovered that he had been misinformed, and that, in point of fact, the execution had not taken place, he did not sufficiently retract, and explain, and express his regret for having made the statement. Now, in the House of Commons—in the very place where he had made the charge—Mr. Gladstone expressly stated that he had been misinformed, that his information was incorrect, and the inference which he had founded upon it erroneous. The noble Marquess asked why he did not express any regret? He (Lord Brougham) had not the good fortune—and he should always esteem it great good fortune to be present when so great a speaker, so eloquent and brilliant an orator as Mr. Gladstone was to be heard—to be in the House of Commons on the evening when the right hon. Gentleman made his statement, having crossed the threshold of that House only twice since the 19th of November, 1830, namely: once about a year ago to listen to Mr. Gladstone, and again the other night to hear his noble Friend at the head of the Government explain his intentions with respect to the Amendments introduced by their Lordships into the Bankruptcy Bill; but he understood from his noble Friends who heard the explanation, that Mr. Gladstone did express his regret that he had fallen into this error. One word with respect to the book of which so much had been said. Mr. Gladstone's statement proceeded upon documents which had been published officially by the provisional or temporary or de facto Government of Modena. They had been for twelve months exposed to sale and accessible to every one. But the Duke of Modena could not by any means obtain a sight of this book, nor, it appeared, could the noble Marquess. The only persons who laboured under the misfortune of not been able to procure them were the client and the advocate, the Duke of Modena and the noble Marquess. But, then, the noble Marquess said, "How can you tell that these documents are not forgeries?" and Mr. Gladstone might reply, "How can you tell that they are?" Nobody pretended to say that they were forgeries—for anything that appeared they were authentic; and, if they were, Mr. Gladstone's defence was complete. If the letters which were now sought for were in the Foreign Office, no doubt they would be forthcoming, and their Lordships would then see whether Mr. Gladstone was borne out in his statements by those documents. It had been urged in favour of the Duke of Modena—of whom he desired to speak with all the respect due to misfortune—that he had removed or destroyed none of his papers; and these papers would show that he was perfectly clear of the charge. It was a very unusual thing for persons, either upon Grand Ducal or other thrones, or upon no thrones at all, who were engaged in proceedings which would not bear the light, to put in writing what they were doing, to manufacture evidence against themselves, and leave it to be found by their enemies. Such a proceeding was, in the life of a criminal, whether throned or not, most unusual. What was the Duke of Modena's defence? He said, "Search my depositories and you will find no papers to show that I am guilty." He did not believe there was any prisoner now waiting for trial at the Old Bailey or elsewhere who, if he could not with truth plead "Not guilty," could not at least say truly that he had not knowingly left behind him any evidence against himself. The other evening, when the noble Marquess gave notice of his intention to bring forward this subject, he said he wished the Grand Duke a good deliverance, meaning not only from his accuser, Mr. Gladstone, but from his advocate, for they had here another illustration of the proverb—"Save me from my friends, and I will protect myself against my enemies." As the noble Marquess had extended his observations beyond the case in point to the general state of Italy, he (Lord Brougham) might be allowed to say that he still held, as he had always done, that there was no act more utterly without justification, and even without extenuation than for a nation, whether France, Piedmont, or any other, to possess itself of the territory of another State under the pretence that its government was bad. That was the pretext under which one of the greatest crimes of ancient or modern times—the first partition of Poland in 1772—was committed. At that time Poland was subject to an elective monarchy, under which perpetual anarchy prevailed; but that was no excuse for the conduct of Prussia, Austria, and Russia. With regard to a solution of the Roman question he wished he could say as he had said of the proceedings of France and Sardinia elsewhere—

However much he might disapprove the act itself before it was done, yet after it was accomplished he could not but hail with heartfelt joy the termination of the atrocious tyranny of the Bourbons. The present Government of Rome was elective, like that of Poland, and was one of the worst in Europe; but still that would not justify the seizure of the Papal States by any foreign Power. He hoped the day would arrive when they would free themselves from the bad Government under which they were suffering, that that would be effected by themselves, and that they would be left to themselves without the intervention of other parties. He was altogether opposed to the new-fangled notions about nationalities—as if the origin of any nation or the form of any Government gave a foreign Power a right to interfere and appropriate the territory. But, while he could not approve the schemes of aggression to which that eminent statesman Count Cavour had lent himself, with the co-operation of the Emperor of the French, he heartily rejoiced at the establishment of a great and constitutional Italian kingdom.

THE MARQUESS OF NORMANBY said, after the unanswerable speech of his noble Friend near him (Lord Derby), he certainly should not think of detaining their Lordships with any reply, nor could his noble and learned Friend who had just sat down expect that he should take any serious notice of his attempt to amuse the House. He could only remark that he (Lord Brougham) appeared there as the advocate of Mr. Gladstone, in a spirit worthy of his client as it was ungenerous and even unfair to the Duke of Modena. As he understood there was some difficulty about consenting to the immediate production of the additional papers to which he had referred in his former statement, he begged to give notice of a Motion for their production on Friday.

Motion agreed to.

Lord Brougham

CASE OF QUARTERMASTER DODD.

OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF LUCAN rose, pursuant to notice—

“To call the Attention of the House to the Correspondence between the Lord Lieutenant of County of Mayo and the Government of Ireland on the Subject of the Resignation of his Commission by Quartermaster Dodd of the South Mayo Rifles, and the Appointment of his Successor.”

The facts were simply these:—An officer commanding one of the regiments of militia, only lately appointed himself, and, therefore, little conversant with the proper channel for communications on the subject of discipline, erroneously applied to the Inspector General of Militia with respect to the conduct of a Quartermaster. The Inspector of Militia erroneously entered into a correspondence with the commanding officer, and recommended that a certain course should be pursued. Ultimately the Lord Lieutenant accepted the resignation of Quartermaster Dodd, and appointed a successor, without consulting him (the Earl of Lucan) as Lord Lieutenant of the county. At this time he (the Earl of Lucan) was necessarily absent from the country; but as soon as he became aware of these proceedings he saw Sir Thomas Larcom, and remonstrated with him upon the irregularity of the course which had been adopted. Sir Thomas Larcom admitted the justice of his complaint, and expressed his sorrow that an unusual course should have been taken. He was perfectly satisfied, and should have thought no more of the matter, but for what subsequently occurred. In April he had received a letter from Sir Thomas Larcom, informing him of all which had been going on during two months previous, and which ended in the acceptance by the Government of the resignation of the Quartermaster. In May he wrote a reply protesting against his authority, as Lieutenant of the county, being superseded; and he was in hopes, after the expression of regret by Sir Thomas Larcom, to which he had referred, that the Government of Ireland would have at once admitted that what had been done had been done inadvertently. But great was his astonishment when he received a letter, dated the 11th of June, in which it was distinctly laid down that the position of Lieutenants of counties in Ireland differed entirely from the position of Lieutenants of counties in England; that communication with Lieutenants of counties in Ireland on subjects of discipline was totally unnecessary; and that the most convenient and regular course was for the commanding officer to communicate directly with the Government in Dublin. He believed there were several Lieutenants of English counties present, and he thought they would agree with him that nothing could be more illegal or improper than such direct communications, or that the resignation of an officer should be accepted without the intervention of the Lieutenant of the county. On the receipt of that letter he again remonstrated, and the Government thought it sufficiently important to refer the question to the law officers of the Crown. In their opinion they stated that the Irish Government had acted legally in reference to the case of Quartermaster Dodd, and that the Executive were justified under the circumstances in accepting his resignation. He (the Earl of Lucan) ventured to impugn that decision as being contrary to the intentions of the Legislature when passing the Acts which defined and regulated the duties of Lords-Lieutenant of counties. Looking at those Acts, he contended that there was no such distinction as was alleged between the powers and the duties of the Lords-Lieutenant of the two countries. The appointment of the quartermasters of militia regiments was vested exclusively in the Lords-Lieutenant of counties, and he believed that the Government had acted contrary to law, right, and usage, in appointing an officer as successor to Quartermaster Dodd. The Government said that the appointment of such officers was vested in the colonels of regiments. He concluded that it was vested in the hands of the Lords-Lieutenant of counties. It certainly never was the intention of the Legislature that any act should be done under the authority of law to degrade the office of Lord Lieutenant of counties, and he, therefore, hoped that Her Majesty's Government in that House would be able to give a satisfactory explanation on the subject.

EARL GRANVILLE was understood to say that he concurred with his noble Friend in his view of the high office of Lord Lieutenant of a county, and that it never was the intention of the Legislature to do anything that was calculated to degrade it. Her Majesty's Government, however, must be bound by the decision of their law officers in such cases as that to which the noble Earl had just called their attention. He thought there could be no doubt that there was a distinction between the office of a Lord Lieutenant in England and in Ireland. The whole subject would, however, be considered by the Government.

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER.

PETITIONS.

LORD EBURY rose, pursuant to notice, to present a Petition of Members of the Church of England and Ireland, praying for an Address to Her Majesty to appoint a Commission to inquire into the Subject of the Book of Common Prayer, with a view of making alterations therein. The noble Lord said that he had not given notice of his intention to present this petition, which was not numerous but most respectably signed, on account of any special importance he attached to it, but because he wished, with their Lordships' permission, to avail himself of the opportunity to state to the House and the country the reasons which induced him not to proceed with the Motion of which he had given notice at the termination of the last Session of Parliament, to lay this year upon the Table of the House a Bill to alter and amend the Act of Uniformity. In the first place, throughout his connection with this question he had been desirous that the initiative should come from the ecclesiastical element in the legislative body. He had, therefore, waited to see whether the Convocation of the Province of Canterbury would make any move in that direction. It had done so before; it might do so again. That body met this spring under new circumstances, inasmuch as they had asked and obtained a licence from the Crown to enter on the path of Reform. Undoubtedly it was not of a very radical description; still it was a step in the right direction, and he had hoped that they might have considered the propriety of requesting those of their body who had seats in Parliament to propose legislation to ameliorate some of those evils which had been the subject of such frequent complaint. Circumstances, however, occurred which prevented the further consideration of these matters. Their Lordships would recollect that the meeting of that body was twice postponed; once owing to a domestic affliction in the family of the most rev. Prelate, and once on account of his much regretted indisposition. Meanwhile the opportunity for acting in this House was passing away; and in addition, the storm raised by the discussion of the Essays and Reviews made it impossible to obtain a fair hearing for anything else. It was, therefore, considered by those who had the conduct of this question of liturgical revision to be an inopportune moment for stirring it in this House. Now, before he proceeded to state his intentions as to the future, he wished to draw their Lordships' attention to the altered position in which this question stood, since he made his statement in that House in May last year. Subsequent to his Motion in the House last May a similar one was made in the Lower House of Convocation with great ability by the Dean of Norwich and Mr. Oxenden, one of the elected representatives of the diocese of Canterbury; and, although not successful, yet if any of their Lordships would look into the Ecclesiastical Hansard they would see that their arguments remained unanswered, and that many who would not vote for the Motion at that time begged they might not be considered as pledged against it. Then, although in some episcopal charges a revision of the Liturgy had been somewhat apologetically deprecated, yet the right rev. Prelate who presided over the diocese of Gloucester and Bristol had recommended it unhesitatingly, and in words to which he begged their Lordships' attention—

"The further revision of the Liturgy has been strongly recommended by persons of learning and piety at various times since the last revision of 1802. Indeed, all true friends of the Church must, in the abstract, be in favour of revision. However wedded to those forms which they rightly cherish as one of the greatest blessings which they have inherited from their forefathers, they can hardly deny that there are some alterations which would render the Prayer Book more perfect, and they must esteem it a service done to the Church of no little moment if any defect in her ritual were remedied, any acknowledged deficiency supplied, any change made by which, without the sacrifice of what is essential, the prejudices of Separatists might be removed and the peace and unity of the Church secured. He also adds that he sees no reason why that should not be done at once."

But the most remarkable circumstance yet remained to be considered, and it emanated from the most rev. the Primate of Ireland, with the approbation of the Archbishop of Dublin. The House was aware that in consequence of the Provincial Synods of York and Canterbury having obtained a licence from the Crown to do so, they proceeded to alter the 29th Canon, which relates to parents becoming sponsors for their own children. When this was done, one of the Irish Bishops and his clergy called upon the most rev. the Primate to convene a Synod for the purpose of following their example. This, however, the most rev. Primate declined to do, on account of an opinion which he entertained, after consulting with the ablest ecclesiastical lawyers of this country, that the 29th Canon never had any validity whatever, and, therefore, that, whether it were altered or no, the law remained the same; but he had added these remarks, which, coming from so highly respected a source, he was sure would be most interesting to the House—

"If at any time a well-considered plan for a general revision of the canons and rubrics, or for shortening the accustomed services, or for amending the laws which regulate the discipline of the Church, should be previously framed by the heads of the Church and State, it would seem to me that a National Synod of the united Church is the appropriate body for considering the principles and arranging the details of such a measure before the introduction into Parliament of a Bill to give it legal effect; should an occasion of this kind present itself during the remaining period of my protracted Primacy my best efforts shall be used for the convening of a National Synod."

Their Lordships would, therefore, see that there was abundant evidence to show not only that this question was not disposed of by the rejection of the Motion which he had the honour to make last year, but that it was as unsettled and as ripe as ever, and as urgently requiring authoritative interposition. He should like to have added some further observations in reference to this part of the subject, but he had already trespassed at some length upon the patience of the House and would refrain from so doing. He would merely add, that unless some move was made early next year by the ecclesiastical authorities (and this he must again repeat he earnestly desired, because he wished the initiative to proceed from them), it would be his duty to ask their Lordships' assent to a Bill for relaxing the terms of subscription, which had been so severely reprobated by some of the brightest ornaments of our Church, which had done and were doing an amount of mischief which could not be over-stated. Those of their Lordships who did him the honour to listen to him last year would remember that he described the alteration of the terms of subscription to be that without which all other alterations would be wholly incomplete. Their Lordships would, he thought, consider that the Motion would come with peculiar appropriateness next year. The fatal and revengeful Act which compelled these terms was passed in the year 1662; next year would be the 200th anniversary, and he trusted their Lordships would feel sincere pleasure in substituting for it something more in harmony with the conciliatory spirit and Christianity of our age. The noble Lord then presented the Petition; also one from Ashbourne to the same effect.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he was not authorized to state that Convocation would be likely to take up this subject. He was glad, however, to see that the question had become a little more clear than it was originally. It always appeared to him that this subject was greatly complicated by the mixing up of three questions which had very little to do with each other. One was whether the services of the Church could not be made more elastic and shorter; another was whether any alteration should be made in the doctrinal statements of the formularies of the Church; and the third, whether the terms of subscription should or should not be relaxed. He was glad to hear that the noble Lord intended to confine his attention to the third of these questions. He thought the noble Lord would be more likely to attain his object if he had adopted the course pursued on a late occasion by a noble Earl (Earl Stanhope) when an alteration was made in regard to certain services. On that occasion the noble Earl distinctly pointed out what the services were to which his Motion referred, and their Lordships knew the exact question with which they had to deal. The noble Lord, however, had always pressed the necessity of a general revision of the Liturgy. Now, in former times, such a course as the noble Lord advocated had only been taken after a period of revolution. When the Church recovered from the convulsion into which it was thrown at the time of the Reformation there was, of course, a general revision. When the Royal Family and the Established Church were restored after the Commonwealth, and again when James II. was compelled to leave the Throne, there was a general revision of the Liturgy; but it seemed out of the question to propose a general revision of the whole Liturgy of the Church of England at a time like the present. If the noble Lord would set forth the changes which he wished to effect the country and the Church would then be able distinctly to judge whether or not those changes were desirable, or whether they would not cause that general unsettlement of feeling throughout the country which was much to be deprecatd. As to the terms of subscription, it was of great importance that the public should not suppose them to be more rigid than they really were. His impression was, that a man who conscientiously believed the Church of England to be the Church in which he wished to live and die, and who was not more attached to any other form of Christianity than that which the Church of England presented, might fairly and safely make the subscriptions which were required of him by the present law. These subscriptions were not so strict as the noble Lord seemed to imagine. They stated that the person who subscribed accepted the Articles of the Church of England; that, if he took orders, he would act according to the formularies of the Church; and that he upheld the Royal supremacy. The subscriptions were required of all clergymen and some laymen; they were required of every one becoming a governing member of the University of Oxford. They had been made by the noble Lord himself as a member of the University of Oxford, and he did not believe they would be found to go beyond what he had just stated. If, however, it should be found that they pressed in any way upon the consciences of scrupulous persons, and if any safe relaxation could be proposed, he was quite sure such a proposal would receive great attention from the right rev. Bench and from Convocation. What he had always deprecated was the general unsettlement in the Church of England which would certainly result from throwing the Prayerbook into the hands of a Commission with general authority to alter a course. As to the services of the Church, he had several times stated that they might, if it were desirable, be shortened. The Litany, for example, might, under the sanction of the diocesan, be used as a separate service; and there were other modes by which the services, if too long, might be abridged. But the great obstacle to this was found to be in the feeling of the laity, and if a clergyman ventured upon such a change it was extremely likely that he would find his position in the parish not particularly pleasant.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH thought the extreme length of the services was objectionable. In the Morning Service the Lord's Prayer was repeated five times. He had been told that the right rev. Prelate himself, on one occasion, in reading the service at a consecration, said, "You have had the Lord's prayer four times, & will not give it you again." [The Bishop of LONDON, by gesture, expressed his denial.] The Litany, it was suggested, might be omitted, and put in the Evening Service; but if there was any part of the service a "miserable sinner" might wish to retain, it was the Litany. Many of the clergy endeavoured to strain the existing law, but any effective movement must come from the Bishops.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON could not understand the complaints relative to the repetition of the Lord's Prayer, and he regretted the manner in which it had been alluded to by the noble Marquess. Nothing of human origin could be entirely free from error; but if any composition was or could be perfect, it was the Liturgy of the Church of England. The laity generally disliked any innovation that would affect it, and he deprecated the repeated discussions on the subject of changes that could have no result but to unsettle and disturb men's minds. He did not cast any reflection on the course pursued by the noble Lord, but he regarded with alarm and anxiety any suggestion for altering the incomparable Liturgy of the new Reformed Catholic and Apostolic Church.

Petition read, and ordered to lie on the Table.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

REPORT OF AMENDMENTS.

Order of the Day for receiving the Report of the Amendments.

Moved, That the said Report be now received; objected to; after short debate,

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Amendments reported accordingly.

LORD REDESDALE moved to omit Clause 7.

On Question, Whether the said clause be omitted?

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 10; Not Contents 10.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR decided that by the rule semper presumitur pro negante the Motion was negatived.

The clause was accordingly retained, and the Bill was then agreed to, with some verbal Amendments.

Amendment negatived.

AUSTRALIAN SOVEREIGNS.

QUESTION.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS said, he would beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If, in the Trial of the Pyx which has just been made, Australian sovereigns coined at the Branch of the Royal Mint at Sydney were submitted for assay, and if the quality of such sovereigns was equal to those coined at Tower Hill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated, in reply, that the Australian sovereign was not a legal tender or part of the coin in this Realm, and was not, therefore, by law or usage subject to the trial of the Pyx conducted under the auspices of the Goldsmiths' Company, and did not receive the benefit, whatever the benefit was, of that ordeal. There was a period when the trial of the Pyx was considered one on which the country could depend for the goodness and adequacy of the coin, which there now existed sufficient means of ascertaining independent of that trial. It must not, however, on this account be supposed that Australian sovereigns were submitted to no trial, for they were assayed regularly by the Royal Mint, and he believed that the result was most satisfactory, and that those sovereigns were found on every occasion fully equal to the standard coin.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS gave notice that he would, early in next Session, bring this subject under the notice of the House.

CUSTOMS' DEPARTMENT.—QUESTION.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wished to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, What arrangements have been made for the discharge in the Outports of those duties which were formerly performed by the Controllers, whose offices are now abolished; and whether provision has been made for employing the Controllers whose services have been dispensed with upon duties as nearly as possible analogous to those which they have previously had to perform, and for securing to them their fair chance of promotion to superior situations as they may fall vacant?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that his hon. Friend was aware that the particular duties which were formerly discharged by those officers—namely, to keep duplicate cash books, in which entries were made of the payments and receipts which came into the hands of the collectors, had been abolished; and a simpler form substituted by means of the clerks at the outports, and the principal check was through the Controller General and the chief clerks in the London district. Since their dismissal arrangements had been made for the employment of some as collectors, some as clerks, some in other capacities, while some had retired on compensation. Where any had been transferred to offices lower in rank, it had been at the same salary, and always with their own consent. There were, however, a certain number on the redundant list, and he thought it would be impossible to employ all; but he could safely say that every effort was being made to reduce the number on that list.

FAIRS AND MARKETS (IRELAND) BILL, AND BIRTHS, DEATHS, AND MARRIAGES (IRELAND) BILL.—QUESTION.

In reply to Mr. LONGFIELD,

MR. CARDWELL said, with regard to the Fairs and Markets Bill, as there were a great many clauses in it, he did not think it would be just to go on with it in the absence of so many Irish Members. With regard to the other Bill, the Committee were almost unanimous in recommending that the expense should be provided out of the Consolidated Fund instead of out of local funds. It would be impossible for him to recommend that course to the House, and under those circumstances he thought the best way would be to let the measure wait until the beginning of next Session.

The Orders were subsequently discharged. Bills withdrawn.

ROYAL ATLANTIC MAIL STEAM PACKET COMPANY.—PETITION.

MR. CONINGHAM: Mr. Speaker, I have placed a Notice on the Paper of a Motion to refer the Petition of Mr. Irwin, which I presented to the House on Friday last, to a Select Committee. That Petition has been printed by the express direction of the House for the use of the Members of this House only. As that Petition contains allegations against an hon. Member who is now in his place, I beg to know whether I should not be doing right in bringing the matter forward before the other business on the Paper is proceeded with.

MR. SPEAKER: I am rather doubtful whether the hon. Member can plead Privilege in this case. Prima facie any question affecting an hon. Member would be a case of Privilege. In this case the allegations of the Petition appear to reflect upon the conduct of Mr. Lever as Manager and Director of a certain public Company, before he was a Member of this House; but the Petition makes no charges, as I read it, against his conduct since he became a Member of this House, or in his character of Member. Under these circumstances I am not aware that there is any absolute precedent upon the point, and it will be for the House to say whether they will permit the Motion of the hon. Member to be now proceeded with, or whether it shall come on in its due course.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The Notice on the Paper does not state that the matter will be brought on at this hour of the evening. I am quite ready to state the course which it is my intention to take with regard to the Motion. If the hon. Member to whom the Petition refers, and who I observe is in his place, wishes the Motion to be proceeded with at once, probably the House will not object to that course.

MR. LEVER: Mr. Speaker, being engaged in most extensive mercantile operations, I am most anxious that the charge which has been made against me should be met at once—I am most anxious, now that the charge has been brought, that it should be gone into immediately, with a view of proving the utter groundlessness of the accusations that have been made against me in the Petition which has been presented by the hon. Member for Brighton.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, it appears to me that at whatever period the transactions alluded to in the Petition are alleged to have taken place, it must be painful for any hon. Member to have these charges hanging over him indefinitely. I, therefore, assume it to be the general feeling of the House that the Motion of the hon. Member for Brighton should come on at once.

MR. CONINGHAM: Then, Sir, understanding it to be the feeling of the House that I should bring my Motion on at once, I beg leave to move—

“That Mr. Irwin’s Petition relating to the Royal Atlantic Steam Navigation Company be referred to a Select Committee, to inquire into the allegations of the said Petition.”

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS seconded the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That Mr. George O’Malley Irwin’s Petition [presented 19th July] be referred to a Select Committee, to inquire into the allegations contained in the said Petition.”

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, having looked into the precedents bearing upon the case now under the consideration of the House, I find that charges made against a Member of this House, whether in his capacity of Member or in his individual capacity, have, as a general rule, been received by the House; but not until after the Member accused has been afforded an opportunity of reading the Petition, and of knowing distinctly what the charges contained in it against him are, and until he has had a full opportunity of being in his place and of replying to them. In those instances in which the conduct imputed has directly affected the honour and character of one of its Members, in that capacity I find that the House has deemed it right to investigate the matter; they have thought it right to investigate the charges so made against one of its Members in respect to his conduct as a Member of this House. I will refer to two cases, one of which occurred a long time ago. In the year 1826 a petition was presented on the part of the Shareholders of a Coal and Iron Mine Company, containing charges of misconduct against certain persons, one of whom at that time occupied the position of Chairman of Committees of this House. The House did then appoint a Committee to enquire into the management of that Company, with an especial direction that they should report on the conduct of certain Members of the House in reference to that company. The other case is one of very recent occurrence. I do not know whether the hon. Member for Youghal is present, but a petition was presented within the last few years by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield against the hon. Member for Youghal, directly affecting his conduct and character as a Member of this House, upon the ground that he had received pecuniary payment in consideration of his having advocated the claims of certain persons in this House. An immediate and searching investigation into the allegations contained in the petition was invited by the hon. Gentleman accused. The hon. Gentleman insisted upon and begged the House to institute a searching inquiry into the charges so brought against him. A Committee was appointed by the House to investigate the charges so brought against him, and the Committee came to a decision favourable to the hon. Gentleman against whom the charges were made.

Now, there are two other cases which seem to me to be strictly analogous to the one now before the House. In the year 1849 a petition was presented by the hon. Member for Haddingtonshire, which I think bears precisely on the present case. It was a petition by the shareholders of the Eastern Counties Railway Company charging misconduct against Mr. Hudson, who was then Member for Sunderland, and a Gentleman, the Chairman of the Company, who was at that time Member for one of the boroughs in Suffolk, the petition charged them with misconduct and fraudulent practices as between them and the shareholders of the Company. The petition was received, and was ordered to lie on the table—the accused Members having been heard in their places—but then the questions involved being of a nature which it was competent for the parties to have caused to be investigated before the ordinary tribunals of the country—namely, the Courts of Law, and bearing upon the Members only in their individual capacity, the House did not institute any proceedings in the matter; and I believe that in taking that course they acted upon a very wise and a very sound principle.

Now, a precisely similar course of proceeding was adopted shortly after that, in 1850, in the case of a petition presented against Mr. Feargus O’Connor a Member of this House, as connected with the management of certain landed estates. The parties petitioned this House to institute an inquiry into charges of fraud and mismanagement on the part of Mr. Feargus O’Connor. The petition was received, and Mr. Feargus O’Connor was heard in answer to those charges, and there the matter ended.

Now, I am not aware that there are any other recent precedents to be found; but I think that the House will act wisely in this case by adhering to the principle established in the two last mentioned cases. The hon. Member having been heard in his place, and the House having heard him make a distinct and emphatic denial of the charges brought against him, I think that the House would act wisely if they proceeded no further in the matter, which may hereafter form the subject of inquiry in a court of law.

MR. LEVER: Mr. Speaker, the subject to which I am about to refer has been so widely spread throughout the country, and affects me so deeply, that as a mercantile man it would, I think, be highly impolitic that I should remain altogether silent with respect to it, even though the House should be of opinion that the case was one into which it was not called upon to institute any further inquiry. I did not make any statement the other evening except so far as denying the charges brought against me in general terms, but I said that I should be prepared to go into the whole subject this evening, and I am now fully prepared to do so. I have hitherto been satisfied with denying the allegations contained in this petition in general terms, but I am now prepared to enter into the matter with the proofs of the truth of what I have already stated in my hands, and I should feel exceedingly obliged to the House if they would allow me to read the petition paragraph by paragraph, in order that I may the more clearly be able to show that there is not the slightest foundation for a single charge which it contains. Having done that, I shall then leave myself in the hands of the House, and it will be for the House to say whether they will appoint a Committee of Inquiry or not.

Sir, the first Clause, which is stated in the petition of Mr. Irwin, is

"That your petitioner was the original and real projector of the Atlantic Steam Navigation Company, now called the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company (Limited)."

MR. MALINS: I rise for the purpose of suggesting to the House whether, after the emphatic denial of the charges made by the hon. Member himself, and the statement which we have just heard from the right hon. Baronet opposite, and after the general expression of the opinion of this House, it would not be consonant with our feelings to refer this petition to a Select Committee, whether it is worth the while of the hon. Member to take the trouble and occupy the time of the House by going through the petition seriatim. [Cries of "Order, order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The propriety of taking that course is a matter for the consideration of the hon. Member for Galway himself.

MR. LEVER: Mr. Speaker, I shall, with the permission of the House, pursue, as upon the whole the most satisfactory to all parties, the course which I had determined to adopt. This is Mr. George O'Malley Irwin's petition. The first paragraph of the petition says—

"That your petitioner was the original and real projector of the 'Atlantic Steam Navigation Company,' now called the 'Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company (Limited).'"

Now, my answer to that statement is, that I first conceived the idea of the Galway line towards the latter end of 1856, and that the first time I ever saw or heard of Mr. Irwin was on board one of my ships, the Antelope, at Gravesend, in March, 1858. The Antelope was carrying out troops for the East India Company. That was the very first time I ever had the opportunity of seeing Mr. Irwin. I may further observe that on referring to a Report laid before the shareholders of the Company, I find in it that the Directors of the Company make these observations—

"Prior to the incorporation of your Company Mr. John Orrell Lever, M.P., one of your first Directors, having satisfied himself of the geographical advantages of the ports which constitute the ocean termini of your line, placed some steamships between Galway and New York, and commenced negotiations with several Railway and other Companies and with the Government authorities for the purpose of permanently establishing a line of steamships between Galway and America. To his foresight and energy is, therefore, due the origin of this the shortest line of communication between the Old and the New World, which it will be your privilege permanently to establish."

I received no money whatever from the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company for my ships and for the expenses which I had incurred in establishing that service, from the month of June, 1858, to the 1st of January, 1859. I, therefore, entirely deny that Mr. Irwin had anything to do in projecting this Company.

Now, in the second paragraph of the petition he states—

"That, petitioner having obtained the consent of Mr. John Orrell Lever, now one of the Members of your honourable House, then of 'Hanging Ditch, Corn Exchange, Manchester,' to act as Managing Director to the projected Atlantic Steam Navigation Company, he addressed a letter to your petitioner in the following terms:—"Liverpool, June 1st, 1858. Sir, I shall be happy to act as Managing Director of the projected Atlantic Steam Navigation Company. Yours most truly, J. Orrell Lever. To G. O'Malley Irwin, Esq., Burlington Hotel." (As set forth in petitioner's answer to question 4,571, p. 8, of 2nd Report from the Select Committee on Packet Contracts.)"

Now, my answer to that is, that in the month of March, 1858, Mr. Irwin called upon me at the office of my brokers, and stated that he had just left Baron Rothschild and Mr. Peabody, who had consented to become Directors of a Company to work the Galway line under my management. He brought upon that occasion with him the draft of a prospectus in which their names appeared, and he told me that I must go with him to call on Baron Rothschild the following day, as the Baron was anxious to have personal explanations from me and an opportunity of conversation touching the undertaking. He also said that, prior to confirming the arrangement, I must write a letter consenting to become the Managing Director of the Company, which I accordingly wrote and gave to Mr. Irwin, supposing it to be intended for the information and assurance of Baron Rothschild and Mr. Peabody, which I have since found not to be the case.

Therefore, upon that head, the House will be good enough to understand that he obtained that letter from me under fraudulent pretences.

Then, Sir, the third paragraph of the petition is as follows:—

"That Mr. John Orrell Lever having, accordingly assumed the management of the said Atlantic Company, by such means was enabled to get from the funds of the said Company £200,954. out of which there was to be deducted £127,000 for his ships to the Company, balance left being £82,954 according to the now published accounts of the said Company."

Now, I do not think it necessary to take the slightest trouble to refute such an imputation as that; he had mentioned the matter to several parties; I do not think it worth while to give an answer to any observations coming from such a source as that.

On the 1st of September last I made a public speech to my constituents, in which I took occasion to answer some of the observations which had been made with respect to me by some of the shareholders of the Company. I will beg leave to read to the House what I then said, as I conceive it to be a perfect answer to any observations that might be made with respect to myself. I stated at Galway, as reported in the Galway Express—

"That real fact is that by all these transactions I have been personally a very heavy loser, while it is a matter of notoriety that had I taken advantage of other opportunities which were within my reach, I might have made a considerable profit. At the time when the Company was fully formed, I had a fleet of steamers which I proposed to transfer to the Company at a valuation price. In the course of the negotiations that followed the bills of sale were produced to show what was actually paid for the several steamers, and it was finally arranged by the Directors (I may mention that the articles of association expressly excluded me from voting on the subject) to offer me for a portion of the fleet a sum less by £11,000 than the actual cost. Having promised the Company to accept their own price, I felt bound to abide by the result, and I accepted the proposal made without any hesitation."

This fact is, I think, conclusive upon this point. The money received for all the preliminary expenses and losses incurred—the published Reports of the Company shew that £27,000 was the sum to be paid for these expenses, and for obtaining a regular service of steamers for six months, including my losses on the first vessels, which losses amounted in the gross to £17,000 out of the £27,000. This sum of £27,000 was included in the gross sum. Some of the ships were purchased in the usual course of trade, and were sold in the same manner. Deducting these charges there is a total sum of £81,000 due to me, which, in the ordinary course, ought to have been paid to me in cash. I accepted, instead of that £81,000, £10,000 of bills of the Company to enable me to pay the current expenses of the ships, and I took the £71,000 in full paid-up shares of the Company's stock.

Therefore I think with respect to that paragraph the statement I have made to the House answers that effectually.

Now the next paragraph is—

"That petitioner as originator of said Company is most desirous to have the subsidy sustained by Parliament, provided proper means are taken to prevent the committal of false and fraudulent pretences, such as have been practised by said Mr. John Orrell Lever and other officials and managers who were introduced by him into the Company."

This paragraph, I believe, I have already answered in my observations upon paragraph No. 1.

The fifth paragraph of the petition is—

"That your petitioner's anxiety to see the subsidy sustained by Parliament is perfectly reconcilable with the determination to expose and punish false and fraudulent proceedings, alike injurious to the Government of the country and to the public."

Mr. Lever

The Directors and Shareholders of the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company understand their own interests and possess full power to order any investigation they deem necessary. As far as I am concerned, I shall only be too happy to meet any inquiry from whatever source it may come.

The sixth statement is—

"That false and fraudulent pretences have been practised by Mr. John Orrell Lever, and the officials and managers who were introduced into the Company by him, in circulating under the name of the 'Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company's New Line of Steam Ships to America,' imaginary ships which never had existence, with fictitious tonnage and fictitious horse-power. That your petitioner sustains this charge by extracts from the publications and advertisements of the Company, which were extensively circulated in 'October' and 'November, 1858,' after the Company had been duly constituted, and after the articles of copartnery had been executed on the 24th of the previous month of September, 1858; and which were as follows:—'Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company's New Line of Steam Ships, to America,' &c., carrying Her Majesty's Mails, and taking passengers and cargo," &c.—

Steam Ship.	Captain.	Tons Burden.	Horse Power.
'American Empire.	Johnson.	3,000	1,000
'British Empire.	Williamson.	3,000	1,000

'For freight or further particulars apply to John Orrell Lever, Corn Exchange, Manchester, &c., as by reference to said advertisements and publications themselves, and to your petitioner's letter, published in 'The Times,' of July 18th, 1860, stating that the above ships never had existence, may more fully appear. That no attempt has been made to answer or refute even a single charge so publicly made and widely circulated."

To that I answer that I publicly repudiated the statement, not that I should answer anything that appeared in a paper from such a source as that, but I felt it due not only to myself but to the Company which I had originated to give an explanation, and it was on that account that I made the speech to which I have called the attention of the House. I wrote a letter to the brokers of the Company who had the charge of all the advertisements, and in answer to that letter this is their reply with respect to the allegations of the petition charging "fictitious names of captains," "fictitious tonnage," and "fictitious horse-power."

"London, July 22nd, 1861.

Sir,—In answer to your note of this day with reference to the advertisements which we inserted in the London daily papers in October, 1858, of the steamships British Empire and American Empire, of 3,000 tons burden and 1,000 horse-power respectively, we beg to state that said advertisements were drawn up by us; that we were then arranging for the purchase of Transatlantic steamers of that burden and effective horse-power; that it was intended to transfer those vessels from foreign to the British flag, and change their names when transferred. The names of the commanders, you will remember, were officers in your own employ. We may add that we distinctly remember answering to the above effect Mr. Irwin's inquiry as to the steamers in question at the time the advertisements appeared, and we can only express our surprise that Mr. Irwin should now have the audacity to make such groundless charges.—We are, Sir, your obedient servants, BAKE, ADAM, and CO. John Orrell Lever, Esq., M.P., 40, Cannon Street."

Therefore I think that a letter from such eminent shipowners and shipbrokers must be a perfectly satisfactory answer to these charges of Mr. Irwin.

Now the 7th paragraph is—

"That your petitioner has observed with regret and alarm, although some changes are alleged to have taken place in the direction of the Company and said Mr. John Orrell Lever has ceased to be a Manager or Director, that the other officials and Managers referred to who were introduced by him and cognizant of and participators in the false and fraudulent pretences are in many instances retained."

Now this is a charge against the present Board of Directors, and not against myself. I ceased to be a Director of the Atlantic Royal Mail Steam Navigation Company some twelve months ago, being very much engaged in a great number of mercantile pursuits of an important character, and I at that time believed that I was transferring the management of that Company to better and more able hands. I am sure that I need not make any observation upon the character or position of the present Board. Suffice it to say that they have not only discharged their duties and carried out the service in a manner creditable to themselves (although I am not a Director), but also beneficial not only to the mercantile community but to the people of Ireland generally, and that they deserve not only the thanks of the mercantile community but the thanks of the people of Ireland.

Sir, the eighth paragraph of the petition is—

"That both the Government and the public, as well as your petitioner, his friends, relatives, and numerous Irish farmers, have been deceived and defrauded, and will still further be deceived and defrauded unless there shall be a searching inquiry into the false and fraudulent pretences practised by the said Mr. John Orrell Lever and the other officials and Managers who were fully cognizant of and participators therein."

Mr. Irwin and his friends, under the Limited Liability Act, possess the power of calling the Directors to account and of bringing forward their charges. Mr. Irwin does not produce the name of a single shareholder who has demanded investigation, nor has he a single share in the Company. Here is a certificate to that effect which I have obtained from the Secretary to the Company:—"Mr. George O'Malley Irwin is not a shareholder in the Atlantic Company, nor has he ever held a single share in the Company since its formation." So that he never was affected in any way whatever. I think, therefore, that that is a perfect answer to anything that can be said upon that head.

Sir, the ninth and last paragraph is—

"That said false and fraudulent practices have thwarted and brought disgrace on this great national enterprise, and eventually caused and have been the grounds of the termination of the Company's contract by the Postmaster General, the Right Hon. Lord Stanley of Alderley."

Now, all that I have to say in answer to that is that this is not the reason which is given in the Postmaster General's Report laid before Parliament for the abrogation of the contract.

Now, I think that the House ought to know something of the antecedents of Mr. Irwin, and it might be very useful that I should furnish them. My information has been derived from official documents which have been obtained at very considerable expense from the Courts in Dublin, and which will exhibit to you the character of this individual who brings these charges against me. In November, 1834, Mr. O'Malley Irwin was indicted for forgery. The trial came on on the 28th and 29th of November, 1835. The charge was for having forged a letter purporting to come from Mr. Johnston, Assistant-Barrister, of the county of Mayo, containing the resignation of that gentleman, and contriving by such means to obtain the appointment of Assistant-Barrister for himself. Mr. Irwin was sentenced to nine months imprisonment and fined £50. Mr. Irwin brought an action against me, which came on for trial on the 4th day of December, 1860, when the plaintiff seeing that the verdict would be in my favour agreed to a nonsuit. In the same month the costs in this action were taxed. On the 25th day of May, 1861, Mr. Irwin was taken in execution. On the 12th day of June, 1861, he came up for hearing before the Insolvent Court upon a petition, and obtained his discharge from custody. Mr. Irwin is now under process of passing through the

Insolvent Court to liquidate the costs of the trial which he has put me to, amounting to many hundred pounds. The case is to be heard on the 30th of the present month, and I believe this petition has been brought forward for the purpose of influencing the conduct of the Judge on that occasion. I shall now read a curious passage from the Appendix to the second Report of the Select Committee on packet and telegraphic contracts. During the course of the trial to which I have referred, Mr. Serjeant Shee put the following questions to Mr. Irwin:—

"Were you not in Kilmainham Gaol for nine months for forgery?"—"Mr. Irwin: No."

"Mr. Serjeant Shee: Were you not in Kilmainham Gaol for nine months, on the sentence of a Judge of a superior Court in Ireland, for forging the name of Mr. Johnston, the Assistant-Barrister in Mayo?"—"Mr. Irwin: Certainly not."

But Mr. Irwin, finding that Mr. Serjeant Shee had the necessary proofs in his possession, made, a few minutes after his explicit denial, the following extraordinary admissions:—

"Mr. Serjeant Shee: Just listen to me; I will not ask you any question which it is not my duty under the circumstances to ask you, and I will ask the question in as little an offensive manner as I can. Were you indicted for the forgery of that letter which I read?"—"Mr. G. O'Malley Irwin: Certainly."

"Mr. Serjeant Shee: Were you convicted?"—"Mr. G. O'Malley Irwin: Certainly."

"Mr. Serjeant Shee: Were you sentenced to nine months imprisonment in Kilmainham Gaol?"—"Mr. G. O'Malley Irwin: Certainly."

"Mr. Serjeant Shee: Did you remain the nine months in gaol?"—"Mr. G. O'Malley Irwin: Certainly."

Now, Sir, I leave this case in the hands of the House. I only regret that the Committee could not be appointed—if it is not to be appointed—because it would have afforded me ample opportunity to give an answer to these most impudent, audacious, and untrue allegations. My own wish is that there should be an inquiry, because I want to show by undeniable proofs that there is no ground whatever for the charges which have been brought against myself; and that the Government of Lord Derby, in granting the subsidy, conferred a boon on the mercantile classes of both Europe and America.

MR. SPEAKER:—The hon. Member having made his statement will now be pleased to withdraw.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Mr. Speaker, I think it was quite natural, but altogether superfluous, for the hon. Member for Galway to go into the statements he has made with reference to this petition, because I cannot for a moment think that the House will seriously entertain this Motion. I was very glad, indeed, to hear what was stated by so high an authority as the right hon. Baronet opposite, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I entirely agree with what fell from the right hon. Baronet; and, undoubtedly, looking to the nature of these transactions, and the precedents bearing on the case which have been alluded to by the right hon. Baronet, I do hope and trust that the unanymous feeling of the House will be that there is no occasion to refer this petition to a Select Committee.

MR. ALDERMAN SALOMONS : — Mr. Speaker, I beg to explain that I merely seconded the Motion of my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton, as no one else seemed disposed to do so, in order to enable the hon. Member for Galway to make the explanations which he has now done to the House.

MR. CONINGHAM :—In placing this notice on the paper, I certainly acted in deference to what I conceived to be the express desire of the House; but having presented the petition, having seen the documents which are referred to in it, and having heard the explanation or statement of the hon. Member for Galway, I must now say, while it is entirely in the discretion of the House to decide whether it is desirable that the petition be referred to a Select Committee for investigation; and while I am perfectly ready, as I was before, to be guided by the judgment of the House, that unless I hear a very distinct expression of opinion against the reference to a Committee it will be my duty to persevere in my Motion. I certainly do not desire to place myself in a hostile attitude, but I confess for my own part that this is a matter which can be best dealt with and brought out by investigation. Unless I hear a very distinct expression against my Motion, I am afraid I must press for the appointment of a Select Committee.

COLONEL DUNNE : Mr. Speaker, the petition which has been presented to the House by the hon. Member for Brighton, if I understand it rightly, brings charges of fraud against the hon. Member for Galway. I apprehend that it is perfectly clear that the allegations contained in that petition are totally untrue—and under those circumstances it would be worse than a mere waste of time to refer the petition to a Select Committee. It appears from the documentary evidence which has been referred to by the hon. Member for Galway, that Mr. Irwin the petitioner never had a single share in the Company—and I apprehend that his name if connected with any company would be sufficient to ruin the undertaking. The Galway Contract, which has so often formed the subject of discussion here and out of doors, was not given to Mr. Lever, but it was given to the Irish people. That contract was a real bond fide undertaking; and any allegation to the contrary might be carried by Mr. Irwin to a competent legal tribunal. I contend that this House ought not to interfere in such an investigation. The allegations contained in this petition are now brought forward by the same party that caused the shipwreck of the steamer in Galway Bay, and the death of the unfortunate pilot. It is patent to everybody—it is perfectly clear that the intention is to disparage the company, in the same manner as the object at first was to disparage the Government that granted the contract.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS : Mr. Speaker, I think it must be quite obvious to the House that we have to choose between two alternatives—namely, either to appoint a Select Committee to investigate this question, or not to discuss this question in the House. It is quite clear that we have no materials for discussion before us. A petition was presented. The hon. Member for Galway denied in the most distinct manner the truth of the allegations in that petition, so far as they bore upon him. He did what appeared to me a superfluous thing in going into details of these statements, because it is impossible for us to know the grounds upon which these statements rested. It is sufficient for this House that the hon. Member for Galway should give a general denial to the allegations of the petition. If this petition bore upon the conduct of the hon. Gentleman as a Member of this House—if its allegations imputed to him, for example, that he abused his powers as a Member of a Select Committee upstairs—if they impeached his character in any way in his legislative capacity, I think it would have been incumbent upon the House to take notice of the petition, and to appoint a Committee to investigate it. But, Sir, that is not the case. The act, imputed do not concern the hon. Gentleman in his character of Member of this House; and they, moreover, took place before he was elected. Therefore, it is doubly clear as it seems to me that there are reasons why we should not interfere. Therefore, I shall give my vote unhesitatingly against the Motion of my hon. Friend, if he should think it necessary to go to a division. I cannot, however, but hope that, seeing the general sense of the House is against taking any further notice of this subject, he will hardly think it necessary to press his Motion to a division.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM and Mr. GREGORY rose together, the latter giving way to the former.

Sir JAMES GRAHAM: Mr. Speaker, it is my intention only to interpose for one minute between the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) and his wish to address the House.

Now, Sir, having voted for the reception of this petition, and agreeing with what has just fallen from my right hon. Friend, the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I trust that the hon. Member for Brighton will not press this matter to a division. I have had long experience in this House, and my recollections and impressions entirely concur with those of the right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. I do not think that in modern times inquiries have been instituted into the allegations of a petition affecting a Member of this House, unless they touch his conduct as a Member of this House, or are founded on some conviction of conduct unworthy of his character and position. I have read this petition very carefully, and I do not see any allegation in it affecting the hon. Member for Galway, except antecedently to his taking his seat in this House; and these allegations are capable of being substantiated before a legal tribunal of competent jurisdiction and thoroughly capable of dealing with them. If prosecution before such a tribunal should be instituted and conviction ensues, of course it would be open to call upon this House to proceed against one of its Members who had been convicted of being engaged in fraudulent transactions, but in the absence of such conviction, and in the absence of allegations affecting the conduct of a Member of the House as such—although I am as jealous of the honor of the Members of this House as any one can be—I would certainly advise my hon. Friend the Member for Brighton not to persevere in his Motion, which on the whole, I think, would not be in accordance with the ends of justice or conduce to the honour of this House.

Sir George Lewis

Mr. SPEAKER put the Motion which was negatived without a division.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL LORDS' AMENDMENTS.

Order for resuming further consideration of the Lords' Amendments read.

Clause 2 (Appointment of Chief Judge).
THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he presumed, after the decision arrived at the other night for restoring the clauses relating to the appointment of the Chief Judge, that the House would not think it necessary to discuss at any length the other subsidiary Amendments consequent upon that change. He would, therefore, merely move that the Lords' Amendments to Clause 2 should be disagreed to.

Sir HUGH CAIRNS said, that as the House had already decided to disagree with the Amendments relating to the Chief Judge, it would not be necessary to raise any discussion upon the other clauses which related to that point.

The Lords' Amendments disagreed to.

Clause 21 (Official Assignees).

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was not aware of the reasons which had induced the Lords to make an increase in the number of the official assignees from five to eight. Each official assignee was to receive £1,000 a year, in addition to an allowance of some £700 for clerks, offices, and other expenses. As the provisional assignee of the Court for the Relief of Insolvents would, by the 26th Clause, be constituted an official assignee of the Court of Bankruptcy, if the present Amendment of the Lords were agreed to, and eight were substituted for five, the number of official assignees in London would, in fact, be increased to nine. That would, he thought, be entailing useless expense on the country, the principle on which the Bill had originally proceeded being that there should be one official assignee to each Commissioner. He, therefore, begged to move that the Lords' Amendment be disagreed to.

Mr. MONTAGUE SMITH said, the Bill originally established creditors' assignees, and the Lords thought it was better that a bankrupt's estate should remain in the official assignee, and they accordingly made the Amendment in question. He would suggest that it would be better to defer the discussion of the Amendment until the subject of creditors' assignees came before the House.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, the Government had given notice of two cardinal points on which they proposed to disagree with the Lords' Amendments. The one referred to the Chief Judge, which had already been settled, and the other, which had still to be determined, referred to the official assignees. The House of Lords had regarded the Bill, in the shape in which it went up to them, as defective, because it took away from the official assignees a considerable amount of the business which they had hitherto transacted. The present Amendment had been introduced by the Lords in consequence of the general view they took with respect to the official assignees. It would, therefore, be more convenient now to discuss and dispose of the whole question relating to official assignees, as that question was raised by the present Motion. He thought the House of Lords had hit a blot in the Bill that was not sufficiently considered when the measure was passing through that House; and he was quite willing to take any share of responsibility which might attach to him on that account, for he freely confessed that when the Bill went up to the other House, he had not considered the inconvenience of the course which was suggested by the measure in regard to the duties of the creditors' assignees. Hitherto all bankrupt estates had been vested in the official assignees and the creditors together, who acted through one and the same solicitor in realizing the whole of the estate and dividing it among all the creditors. No doubt there had been a great deal of complaint in the commercial world on the subject of the official assignees. But the House must endeavour to see what was the origin of that complaint. It did not originate because the official assignees did not do the business properly, or collect the debts and divide the assets with rapidity among the creditors, but rather because the official assignees were entitled to take a very large percentage from the sums recovered, and thereby the amount divisible among the creditors was very much diminished. Those objections were got rid of by the Bill, because it placed the official assignees upon salaries instead of percentage, the five official assignees in London receiving £1,200 a year, reducible to £1,000, and those in the country £1,000 a year, reducible to £800. The Bill also provided that a bankrupt's estate should at first be vested in the official assignee, but that when the creditors' assignee was appointed all control of the estate should be taken from the official assignee, except that he was to collect the debts due to the bankrupt under £10, while the debts of a larger amount would be collected by the creditors' assignee. In the House of Lords exception had been taken to that arrangement, and it was urged that the consequence would be that the official assignee and the creditors' assignee would have to employ separate solicitors, of course entailing upon the estate two bills of costs. Another difficulty would arise from the proposed arrangement. The official assignee would require the bankrupt's books to enable him to collect the debts under £10, while the creditors' assignee would want them for the purpose of collecting the larger debts. That state of things would lead to inconvenience and antagonism, as well as to confusion and expense. There was an idea which was prevalent in the commercial world that if the Lords' Amendments were agreed to there would be no mode by which the creditors could get rid of the official assignee if they desired to place the management of an estate in the hands of trustees selected by themselves. That, however, was a mistake, because under the arrangement clauses any body of creditors desiring to wind-up an estate without the assistance of an official assignee could do so. But he would ask whether it was judicious to have five official assignees at £1,200 a year, and seven or eight at £1,000 a year, solely to collect debts under £10? It might be said, on the other side, that official assignees might be chosen as trustees by the creditors; but if that were so, he thought those officers should stipulate for their remuneration with those who employed them. The suggestion that they might be sometimes chosen as trustees by creditors rather militated against the assertion that official assignees were extremely distasteful to the mercantile community. He submitted, therefore, that there was much force in the opinions expressed by the House of Lords; but, looking at the period of the Session, and considering that the point was not absolutely essential to the success of the measure, he should not invite the House to divide in opposition to the hon. and learned Attorney General's Motion.

MR. MALINS said, that from the first he had doubted the prudence of getting rid of the official assignee, as he was of opinion that it would be a great advantage to have an official person to collect the debts and manage the estate of a bankrupt. He believed, however, that the official assignee would be bound to employ the solicitor of the creditors' assignee, and, therefore, the inconvenience to which his learned Friend referred would not arise. As the Amendment of the Lords referred to a matter of detail which had been fully considered by the Lord Chancellor, he thought that upon the whole the wisest thing would be to restore the Bill to the state in which it left the House of Commons.

MR. HADFIELD said, it would be very easy at a subsequent period to increase the number of official assignees if it should be necessary, but he believed that under the Bill there would be less for them to do than at present.

MR. VANCE said, he regretted that his hon. and learned Friend did not intend to take the sense of the House upon the question. At present the largest creditor was usually chosen assignee, but that could not be the case under the Bill, and the management would probably be left to persons who had not much interest in the good management of the estate. The Chamber of Commerce of Leeds had observed that the clause vesting the estate in the creditors' assignee deserved serious consideration.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that the manufacturing districts of Yorkshire were opposed to the Amendments of the Lords, and desired to restore the measure to the shape it was in when it originally passed. They trusted, however, that the House would not restore the clauses in such a shape as to too strongly fetter the creditors' assignee.

MR. MURRAY said, he wished to state the reasons why he disagreed with the Lords' Amendment in reference to the official assignees. He remembered when there were eighteen in London, three being attached to each Commissioner, of whom there were six. By deaths and resignations the number of the official assignees became reduced to ten, and subsequently to eight; and he thought that it would be sufficient if one official assignee was attached to each Commissioner. In fact, during the whole of last year and the greater part of this, in consequence of the decease of two of the official assignees, the whole business before two of the Commissioners in Basinghall Street had been transacted by one official assignee attached to each Court. He had concurred in thinking that it would be imprudent to give the official assignee a fixed salary of £1,200 per annum, but that in accordance with the Bill proposed in last Session, and the evidence given before the Royal Commissioners, it would be sufficient if the official assignee had £800 a year secured to him, and that whatever he had in addition should be due to his personal exertions; the House, had, however, determined that he should have a fixed salary of £1,200 a year. As a matter of practice, in all estates which were under inspectorship there was no difficulty in obtaining the assistance of gentlemen and merchants to act as inspectors or trustees, but they would not act as creditors' assignees with the official assignees. He thought the time was come when the creditors should take the management of the estates of bankrupts into their own hands and wind them up themselves, the expenses incurred under the present system were far greater than any bankrupts' estate ought to bear. There was no proper audit of the accounts by the Commissioners. He could state to the House that in one case an official assignee was allowed and paid £4,802 for his services rendered between Sept. 15 in one year and July 19 in the next. His accounts were audited and allowed by the Commissioner; some months afterwards the accounts were looked into, and then it was found that the ingenuity of the official assignee had been most extraordinary. In the course of his duty he had to receive from the Admiralty a debt of £8,668 due to the bankrupt. The Admiralty paid him at once in three bills of £3,668, £3,000 and £2,000. Regarding the transaction as a single debt, the official assignee would have been entitled to have received according to the scale prescribed for his remuneration £58 6s. 10d.; treating it as three debts, he would have been entitled to £73 6s. 10d. The transaction had reference to an order given by the Admiralty to the bankrupt for five mortar boats, four dispatch boats, and four gun boats, in all thirteen; so the official assignee ingeniously apportioned the sum of £8,668 among these thirteen vessels, making thirteen debts instead of one, and by this mode he increased his remuneration to £215 3s. 8d. On the matter being subsequently explained to the Commissioner, and the accounts examined, it appeared other overcharges had been allowed, and the result was the official assignee had to refund to the estate £2,546, he being allowed for his services £2,256 instead of £4,802, the amount previously paid. He could state another case, in which an official assignee charged for services during four months a sum of £2,681 1s. 8d. On investigation it was found he had overcharged the estate £1,699, and he was only paid a sum of £981. He thought these were strong reasons why the creditors should have an opportunity of looking into those matters themselves. It had been said that the examination of accounts in 1831 showed that the creditors' assignees were everything but honest men, but he thought much about the same state of things prevailed now as in 1831. He believed it had been said that when the official assignees took office in 1831, they secured about £2,000,000, which the creditors' assignees allowed to remain in private banks instead of distributing it to creditors. He thought if a change took place now about the same result would be found—the only difference being that instead of the money lying at private bankers it would be found in the Bank of England. There was, he believed, now nearly £2,000,000 in the Bank of England which should have been distributed. He did not see how, if the official assignees had done their duty to the creditors, there could have been so large a sum as that, and he did not think creditors' assignees could have done worse. Under the management of official assignees creditors were apt to fancy that everything was being done that ought to be done, whereas estates were very much neglected, and the interests of creditors left to suffer. On these grounds he was opposed to the Lords' Amendment. He entirely approved the appointment of a Chief Judge, and had voted for restoring the clause struck out by the other House. The Chief Judge, if he were appointed, would exercise a supervision over the conduct of the officers of his court like that exercised by the Vice-Chancellors over the chief clerks of their office. At present there was no control or supervision. He hoped the House would place the Bill in such a form that it might be rendered satisfactory to the mercantile community, for without that the Bill would be of little avail.

MR. GLYN said, the feeling of the mercantile community in the City of London was strongly against allowing the management of the assets in bankruptcy to pass into the hands of official assignees. They would no longer tolerate such a system. Although there had been the greatest legal difficulty in carrying out arrangements by means of trustees, creditors had exposed themselves to those difficulties rather than allow assets to fall into the hands of the Bankruptcy Court. He thought the objections which might be raised to the power given to the creditors' assignees entirely obviated by the clauses which gave to the official assignees a new character. They were now to assume that of auditors, whose duty would be to look after the proper distribution of the assets, and to watch the operations of the creditors' assignees. In that capacity they might be of considerable utility; he, therefore, assented to the proposition of their being put upon a fixed salary. But if they were to be the collectors of all the debts and dispensers of all the assets, nothing could be more preposterous than to put them on a fixed salary, as their only stimulus to collect debts with efficiency would be the percentage they received. Statements had been made in that, soon after the official assignees were appointed, under the Act of 1831, the sum of £2,000,000 was recovered from private bankers. When the word "recovery" was used, it might be supposed that but for the official assignees that money would never have been distributed. But the fact was that the greater part of that money was at the time in process of being distributed, and that, so far from assisting that process, the Act of 1831 caused a postponement in the distribution of some of those assets. The amount of assets not distributed and now held by the Court of Bankruptcy, was by the Return before the House, nearly as large—indeed, it was perhaps unavoidable under any system. He did not deny that certain creditors' assignees had misconducted themselves formerly, but by the clauses of this Bill securities would be taken for the proper discharge of their duties and for an efficient check upon them.

MR. AYRTON said, that there was nothing upon which bankruptcy reformers were so fully agreed as the necessity of restoring to the creditors the right of managing the estates in which they were interested, leaving to the official assignee the duty of auditing the accounts of the creditors' assignee.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the question immediately before the House had reference to the 21st Clause; but if it was wished to discuss the question as to creditors' assignees, he desired to make one or two observations. The official assignees, as was well known, were brought into existence by the Act of 1831, the intention being that they should co-operate with the creditors' assignees, but it turned out that, virtually, the latter was almost entirely supplanted by the former. The evils connected with the carriage of insolvent estates by creditors' assignees were no doubt considerable, but in endeavouring to avoid those evils they fell into others. The creditors' assignees were not subject to a proper audit, and, no doubt, they neglected their duty; but the appointment of official assignees, while it had superseded the old system, had not removed the evil. It had been found that although the official assignee collected the whole of the debts and had the management of the funds of a bankrupt's estate, yet that, in point of fact, there was no proper audit. The accounts of the official assignee were audited in point of form by the Commissioner, but the Commissioner had not such a knowledge of matters of business as would enable him to discharge that duty satisfactorily. What had been the consequence? The hon. Member for Newcastle-under-Lyme (Mr. Murray) had informed the House of some cases which had occurred and been discovered. It might very well be supposed that similar conduct had been pursued in numerous other instances which had escaped detection. But from a return in 1858, as to official assignees, it was shown that four in London and one out of London had been defaulters, and the House would probably be surprised to hear that the amount of their defalcations was a sum of not less than £110,000. The creditors' assignee it was to be observed would bring to the fulfilment of his duty a commercial knowledge and personal interest in the matter, which would greatly tend to ensure the efficient administration of an estate. The official assignee would be retained with certain duties, one of which was that of a constant and vigilant supervision and audit of the accounts of the creditors' assignee; and he thought it might be fairly anticipated that, the creditors' assignee being appointed by the creditors themselves, and acting under the supervision of the official assignee, the abuses formerly complained of would cease to exist. That a very general desire was felt, on the part of the mercantile community, that this portion of the Bill should be passed would be evident from the fact that petitions had been presented from Belfast, Birmingham, Bradford, Coventry, Gloucester, Hull, Sheffield, Southampton, Wolverhampton, Sunderland, and other places, all of which were unanimous in favour of the appointment of creditors' assignees.

MR. BOVILL said, that official assignees had been appointed because it was found that creditors' assignees did not perform their duties. This matter was fully considered on the second reading, and various mercantile bodies had expressed a strong feeling for the clauses which passed that House he should not oppose their restoration to the Bill. The memorials which had been referred to, however, represented no doubt the opinions of those who would be interested in the management of large bankrupt estates; but, as the Bill would now bring under the operation of the bankruptcy law estates ranging from £5 to £30, it would be a strange mixture of things if there were to be two different sets of assignees to collect the debts. It must necessarily much increase the expense. He would suggest, instead of saying that all debts under £10 should be collected by official assignees, and all above by creditors' assignees; that the creditors in every case should determine the amount up to which the official assignees should collect debts. Such an alteration would obviate many of the objections with regard to the employment of creditors' assignees.

MR. HENLEY observed that, as it was the wish of the House that the general question should be decided on that clause, he was disposed to agree with the Government and to disagree with the Amendment of the Lords. He thought it was impossible for anyone who paid attention to what passed not to know that the commercial body wished to get rid of the official assignee to a great extent, to have a greater facility for making their arrangements, and if they thought that they could manage their affairs better than the lawyers he did not see why they should not be allowed to do so.

Lords' Amendment disagreed to.

On the Clause substituted by the Lords for the 97th Clause.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to call the attention of the House for a few moments to the effect of that clause, which, though with some reluctance, he felt constrained to move that the House should disagree with, and which, entirely ignorant as he was of the reasons which had induced their Lordships to insert the clause, he professed his utter inability to comprehend. The Bill as it stood enabled every debtor, whether trader or non-trader, to pe-

tion the Court for an adjudication of bankruptcy against himself; but the Amendment introduced by the Lords went to this effect—that no debtor who was not able to show assets to the amount of £150 should be allowed to petition for an adjudication in bankruptcy. It was impossible to imagine any reason for the distinction. As the law at present stood any debtor who was unable to pay his debts, whatever the amount of his assets might be, was entitled to apply to the Court for Relief of Insolvent Debtors, and by giving up his property he was able to obtain relief. But if the Bill were to pass, a debtor—whether a trader or non-trader, who was unable to pay his debts—it might be from the most unforeseen misfortunes, from a fire, or from the failure of other parties, if he could not show assets to the amount of £150, would not be allowed to petition for an adjudication of bankruptcy; but if he were sued by a creditor would be thrown into prison, and might remain there a prisoner for life. It was true that by the 112th section of the Bill a power was given to the registrar to visit the prisons, to examine the prisoners that he might find confined for debt, and, if he thought fit, to release them; but the House would observe that the exercise of that power was entirely optional on his part, and that the provisions were at variance with the general tenor of the Bill. He hoped, therefore, that the House and the Government would concur with him in the opinion that that was not a provision that ought to remain in the Bill, and he moved that the House disagree with the Amendment.

MR. MALINS said, he would second the Motion. If the Bill were allowed to pass with the clause as it stood it would entirely deprive small debtors of the benefit of the Act.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he entirely agreed with the objections of his hon. and learned Friend. Indeed the objections to the clause as it stood were so obvious that he could only attribute its insertion to some oversight, or, at any rate, to the want of due consideration. Its effect would be that, even on the most favourable consideration, a debtor who was unable to show assets to the amount of £150 would have to be in prison at least five or six weeks before he could obtain his discharge. He did not believe that could be the intention of their Lordships, and he would very cordially support the Amendment.

MR. BOVILL said, he believed the in-section of the provision had arisen in this way. By the law of bankruptcy, as that law once stood, no man was entitled to be declared a bankrupt whose estate would not yield 5s. in the pound. That was felt to be a hardship, and an alteration was made requiring the debtor to show assets to the amount of £150. It was probably the recollection of this provision that induced their Lordships to insert the present clause, which he cordially concurred with his hon. and learned Friend in thinking that the House should disagree with.

MR. HADFIELD said, he was afraid that if the clause were removed the machinery of the Bill would often be set in motion, and great expense incurred, which there would be no assets to defray. He was not favourable to imprisonment for debt, but he did not think the mode proposed by hon. and learned Gentlemen would remove the difficulty.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would admit there was some weight in the argument of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield; but if any inconveniences arose from the course proposed they must trust to experience to amend them.

Lords' Amendments disagreed to.

Clause 10 (Debts contracted before the Act not to support an adjudication in case of a non-trader),

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL stated that paragraph C had been inserted by the Lords with respect to debts contracted or liabilities incurred after the passing of the Act, on which considerable difference of opinion prevailed; but with a view to the passing of the Bill he was not disposed to ask the House to disturb the principle of that Amendment. The Lords, however, appeared to have overlooked the fact that, by the law as it now stood, if a debtor not a trader lay in prison, any execution creditor was at liberty to apply by petition to the Insolvent Debtors' Court and obtain a vesting order, the effect of which was to vest all the present and future estate of the debtor up to the time of his discharge, real and personal, in the assignee of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, to be administered for the benefit of creditors. He proposed after the word "trader" to insert these words: "And not being at the time a prisoner against whom the creditors would be entitled to obtain a vesting order in insolvency if this Act had not passed." With a view to carry into effect the object of the Lords in this clause, he would also add a proviso to the 164th Clause, to the effect that no person shall be liable, by virtue of this Act, to any criminal charge or penalty in respect of any matter which may have occurred before the passing of the Act to which he would not have been liable if this Act had not passed. He had had the advantage of communicating these Amendments to his hon. and learned Friend, the Member for Belfast, and he was authorized to say that he had no objection to them.

Mr. HENLEY said, he had taken great interest in that part of the Bill, and he must say that he thought the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman quite a fair one. He had not heard of the proposition before, but he thought it a just and equal one, as it left all parties—if he might call them so—exactly as they were before the Bill passed, and that was all he contended for. He hoped his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) was not about to renew the discussion they had before on this subject. They were all perfectly satisfied with the conclusion to which the Government had come, when the hon. and learned Member took advantage of the House being at dinner, moved his clause, and carried it in a thin House.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MALINS said, the opinion of the right hon. Member for Oxfordshire had always great weight with him, and he never differed from him without distrusting his own judgment. But he had given great deliberation to the matter, and he felt he should not discharge his duty if he did not move that the clause be disagreed with. As what had taken place in that House on the 101st Clause of the Bill had been misrepresented by a noble and learned Lord in "another place," he wished to state what had actually occurred. That clause provided that no nontrader should be made bankrupt in respect to debts incurred previous to the passing of the Bill. In Committee he opposed that clause, but the attendance in the House was then thin, and he did not divide against it. He, however, gave notice that on the Report he would move that the clause be expunged. The question was then fairly discussed in an average House, which was not in a state of syncope, as had been represented; and instead of the hour being the dinner hour, it was at 9 o'clock. On the question being put by the Speaker there was not a single voice for the clause. So far from it being the fact that the then Attorney General "threw away his scabbard," that eminent authority said that the clause would have the effect of preventing the present generation from enjoying the benefit of the proposed change in the law, and with his consent it was struck out. The hon. and learned Member for Belfast afterwards attempted to undo what had thus been done by proposing, in the interpretation clause, that a nontrader's debt should mean a debt contracted after the passing of that Bill. On a division taken at eleven o'clock, the hon. and learned Member for Belfast's proposal was rejected, the numbers for it being 125, and those against it 150. When the Bill was before the Select Committee of the House of Lords an unsuccessful effort was made to restore the 101st Clause; although, subsequently, in a Committee of the whole House, upon an erroneous representation of what had taken place on the subject in the Lower House, the clause was reinserted. That clause would enable a rich debtor to set his creditors at defiance and to keep his property while his debts remained unpaid. It was said that it would be unjust to allow the new remedy which that Bill would afford to creditors to be available against nontraders for past debts; but a distinction of that kind had not been admitted in the analogous cases of Lord Eldon's and Lord Hardwicke's Act for bringing new classes of persons under the bankrupt law, nor in the case of the Act 3 & 4 Will. IV. c. 104, making real estate assets for the payment of simple contract debts. The principle was plain, that no man had a vested right in dishonesty, and, therefore, he said that a nontrader, with ample property to meet his debts, ought to be made to pay them, and the law should hold out no inducement to him to remain abroad in order to evade payment. He was inclined to move the rejection of the clause, if he thought he could obtain the general support of the House. The question was placed in rather a singular position. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had stated that he proposed to disagree from two of the chief alterations made by the Lords in the Bill, but with respect to that particular clause he had no proposal to make. He (Mr. Malins), however, did not understand that the Government had at all changed their views upon this point, and the present Lord Chancellor certainly held a strong opinion upon it. He should take the opinion of the House, and, therefore, moved that the Lords' Amendment be expunged.

The Solicitor General

MR. HENLEY said, he thought his hon. and learned Friend had omitted one important circumstance from his consideration. In former Sessions of Parliament there was great difference of opinion about introducing any non-trading clause at all. When the present Lord Chancellor introduced the Bill he distinctly stated on the part of the Government that they had come to the conclusion that it was right to have what was called the "retrospective clause" in the Bill. When the Bill was brought in it did contain this 101st clause. It was a highly technical matter, and could any one believe that when that statement had been formally made on the part of the Government, and the clause actually inserted in the Bill, that the Attorney General, upon the suggestion and after the speech of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford alone, would have thrown the whole matter up. Every one knew that nine o'clock was about dinner time, and the House was generally thin at that time. His hon. and learned Friend referred to what had been attempted to be done upon the interpretation clause by the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, but it could not be expected that the House would, on the same evening, undo what it had just done with all the strength of the Government on one side. The instances referred to by the hon. and learned Gentleman hardly applied in the case, because until lately the law of bankruptcy had been regarded as one in favour of the trading classes, in mitigation of the common law of debtor and creditor, and, therefore, it was not the same thing to bring new classes within the operation of a new and stringent law. He hoped the Government would support the clause as recommended by themselves, and that they would not, by agreeing to the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford, endanger the passing of the Bill.

MR. VANCE said, that a considerable alteration had been made in the mode of service of non-traders who might be abroad, constituting a very considerable relaxation in their favour. It was in consequence of the alteration that had been made in the mode of service, making it personal instead of substituted, and also in consequence of the advantages they obtained during the progress of the Bill, that the hon. and learned Attorney General agreed to the proposition by the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Malins). He thought the adoption of the proposition would tend to the purification of that House. The Session before last, the House refused to place its own Members on a level with the rest of the community in regard to the law of arrest; but, if that were done, they would get rid of some Members to whom objection was very properly taken, because they did not pay their debts. It would force persons in high positions, who defied their creditors, to liquidate the claims upon them.

MR. HADFIELD said, he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman would take the sense of the House on his proposal. It was outrageous to make a distinction between traders and non-traders in regard to the moral obligations to pay their debts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would remind the House that when his noble Friend at the head of the Government stated the course which the Government intended to take with regard to the Lords' Amendments, he observed that, with respect to the particular Amendment now under discussion, they had no proposal to make. In consequence of that statement, and the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Malins) having given no notice of his intention to bring the subject forward, he believed many hon. Members were now absent under the impression that the decision arrived at by the House of Lords was not to be disturbed. In these circumstances, and looking at the thinness of the House, he could not with propriety accede to the proposition of his hon. and learned Friend. He would say nothing as to the soundness or justness of his views; but would simply state his belief that if this Amendment were disagreed with the Bill would be lost, and legislation on that important subject would be put off for an indefinite period.

MR. MONTAGUE SMITH said, his hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Malins) assumed that every person who incurred debts and went abroad, went there to spend, whereas a great many persons so encumbered were nursing their estates for the benefit of their creditors by living abroad. Many owners of large estates who had fallen into the hands of designing speculators, and who had gone abroad, would be liable if the clause were made retrospective to be made bankrupts—a liability which, when they formed these arrangements, they could never have contemplated. The measure was in its nature penal, and to make it retrospective was a violation of the first principles of the law of England. He should vote with the Attorney General.

Mr. ALDERMAN SIDNEY said, that the House had twice disaffirmed the clause, and he regretted that the hon. and learned Attorney General now asked the House to stultify its former votes.

Mr. WALPOLE said, he would recommend the House not to admit that hon. Members who voted against making the law retrospective wished the debts of non-traders not to be paid. He looked upon the Bill as a great benefit to the non-traders. The Bankruptcy Law was passed for the benefit of the trader, and the non-trader remained liable to be detained in prison until his debts were paid. While the bankrupt obtained a clear discharge, and might begin the world again unencumbered, the future property of the insolvent was liable for the payment of his debts. He objected to making the clause retrospective—among other reasons, because Parliament would be taken by surprise if the change were forced upon it. Moreover, the second reading of the Bill had been greatly facilitated by the pledge which had been given by the Government that that portion of the measure should not be retrospective, and he did not think that they ought to violate that pledge.

Mr. MALINS said, that under all the circumstances of the case, and as he had not given notice of his proposal, he would not press it to a division.

Motion withdrawn.

Lords' Amendment agreed to.

Clause 119 (Meeting of Creditors),

Mr. PAGET moved the insertion of the words in "number and value," instead of value alone.

Mr. VANCE moved the addition of the words "representing three-fourths in value."

Amendments agreed to.

Clause 134 (The Official Assignee to collect debts under £10).

Mr. BOVILL said, he would propose to introduce words into the clause, giving permission to the official assignees to collect other larger sums with the assent of the creditors.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he hoped the Amendment would not be pressed. If it were it would provoke further dissent from the Bill.

Mr. VANCE said, he thought that the Amendment would be a great improvement. It left the dealing with the collection of debts more in the hands of the creditors.

Mr. MURRAY said, he hoped that the House would not agree to the Amendment. It would only lead to jobbing. Every creditor would be canvassed by the official assignee to obtain permission to collect the debts of an estate.

Amendment negatived.

Lords' Amendment disagreed to.

Clause 164 (Criminal Prosecutions by order of the Court),

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he proposed the addition of the words "That no person shall be subject to prosecution under this Act for any offence for which they were not previously liable to prosecution."

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 200 (Trust Deeds),

Mr. MOFFATT said, he would move that—

"The House disagree with the Lords' Amendment in Clause 200, making the assent of three-fourths in number of the creditors necessary to the validity of any deed executed by a debtor, and that the clause be restored to its original shape by the insertion of the words 'a majority in number of the creditors representing three-fourths of the value.'"

Motion agreed to.

Schedule.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should move that the House disagree with the Lords' Amendments in the third column, under Schedule G, which recited the Acts repealed by the Bill. The extent and nature of the repeal would depend on the shape the Bill would ultimately take, and, therefore, he hoped the House would leave to the Solicitor General and himself the task of seeing that the proper figures in reference to the schedules were duly inserted, and of making any other corrections.

Mr. BOVILL said, he would suggest to the hon. and learned Gentleman, that a consolidation of the Bankruptcy Law should be undertaken as soon as possible, for the benefit of the County Court Judges who were to administer it, as many of them had no previous acquaintance with it.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed.

"To draw up Reasons to be assigned to the Lords for disagreeing to the Amendments to which this House hath disagreed:—Mr. ATTORNEY GENERAL, Mr. SOLICITOR GENERAL, Sir GEORGE LEWIS, Sir GEORGE GREY, Mr. MURRAY, and Mr. MALINS:—To withdraw immediately; three to be the quorum."

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES—BRITISH MUSEUM.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.
House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

£75,414, British Museum.

MR. WALPOLE : This Vote is the difference between the sum granted on account and the sum constituting the whole amount of the Estimate asked for on the part of the trustees of the British Museum this year. The gross Estimate for this year—£100,414—will be found about £400 less than the total sum voted last year. There are several small increases and decreases upon the different heads included in this Estimate which I do not believe it necessary for me more particularly to notice ; but there are two large items, the one of increase and the other of decrease, upon which I think I ought to make a few observations. The increase amounts to £3,300, under the head of salaries ; the decrease to £2,700, on the Vote for special purchases. The increase of £3,300 arises in consequence of alterations made in the Museum, partly, I may say, by recommendation of this House, and partly in consequence of the retirement of the keeper of antiquities which, has led to the department being placed under three keepers instead of under one. The House may recollect that a strong pressure was put from different quarters upon the trustees of the Museum, about two years ago, to induce them to take into consideration the propriety of giving longer vacations to the clerks in the institution, and also the propriety of giving them some increase of salary. The vacations were extended in the course of last year, and an increase in the salaries of the assistants will be made this year. In both of those respects—namely, vacations and salary, the assistants of the Museum are now put more nearly on a footing with certain other departments of the State than they were before ; and if the House wishes the same able gentlemen to fill the offices in this establishment who have hitherto filled them it cannot expect them to remain in the service of the trustees unless they receive salaries somewhat proportionate, not only to the labours they have to undergo, but proportionate also to the knowledge and the acquirements they are required to possess. Now, the great improvement effected is that the assistants are divided into two classes, an arrangement which affords quicker facilities for promotion than have heretofore existed. The only other observation I have to make on this increase is, that the Department of Antiquities is now placed under three different gentlemen of great ability and high attainments. I may mention that Mr. Birch, whose reputation for a knowledge of Egyptian antiquities is not only European, but is unrivalled in Europe, will for the future be entirely employed in the charge of those antiquities. The keeper of the classical antiquities is a gentleman known probably to every hon. Member of this House for his energy and enterprise in excavating at Budruom the ruins of what was once one of the seven wonders of the world—the ancient Halicarnassus. Unfortunately, the specimens which he obtained remain under a glass shed, which is a discredit to the nation ; but I hope that before I sit down I shall say enough to induce the Government to promise that some better accommodation shall be provided for these works of art. The other large item which I mentioned is a decrease of £2,700 for special purchases. Last year I had to ask for no less than £3,700 on that account. One of the purposes for which that sum was asked was the purchase of part of the collection of the late Lord Northwick, another was the purchase of one of the most valuable sets of manuscript which we have obtained of late years, belonging to the Duke of Lauderdale, and illustrating the history of the reign of Charles II., and the third, and most important, was the obtaining, at a cost of £2,000, of a most beautiful collection of minerals, which will, I believe, make the collection of mineralogy in the Museum always unequalled. This year we only ask for £1,000 for the purchase of some Oriental manuscripts, the property of Colonel Taylor, which I am told are valuable not merely on account of the quarter from which they come, but because they contain materials for history with which we were previously unacquainted. [Mr. LAYARD : Hear, hear !] As the hon. Member cheers that statement, I presume that I am rightly informed. In accordance with the practice which has usually been adopted by those who have moved these Estimates, of informing the House of any events which have occurred in the previous twelvemonths, I ought to mention that we have during the past year lost two trustees—the Earl of Aberdeen and the Duke of Sutherland—but eminent as those Trustees were, their places have been filled by the election of a nobleman and a gentleman who will worthily occupy them—I allude to the Duke of Northumberland and Sir Thomas Phillips. The only other observations which I will make have reference to the Reports of two Committees which were appointed last year to inquire—the one into the South Kensington Museum, and the other into the British Museum. The Report of the first-named Committee recommended that certain institutions in the Metropolis, including the British Museum, should be opened in the evening for the benefit of persons who are employed all day. The Trustees were most anxious that that should be done if possible, and seriously considered the practicability of carrying out the recommendation. I hope that the members of the Committee have read the valuable report prepared by that unfortunate gentleman, the late Mr. Braidwood, of the Fire Brigade—a man whose loss the country must seriously and sincerely deplore. The Trustees referred to Mr. Braidwood and the architect to consider whether it was possible to open the Museum in the evening consistently with the safety of the collections. Mr. Braidwood in his report, which contains most valuable information, pointed out that if the Museum was to be lighted with gas, with which alone it could be lighted so as properly to display its contents, these inconveniences would follow:—That it was a property of gas to dry everything within a room in which it was burning, especially the roof, the ceiling, and any timber which there might be in it, and that if a fire took place in a building so desiccated nothing could stop the progress of the flames; that the gas would materially injure the animal and vegetable collections; that it would greatly discolour the stones and marbles, and that that discolouration when once it had taken place could not easily be got rid of; and that if an explosion ever took place, against which absolute security could not be provided, it would be attended with most destructive consequences, to the risk of which such valuable collections as those contained in the British Museum ought not to be exposed. Upon this report the Trustees came to the conclusion that, however anxious they might be to give the benefit of these collections to the humbler classes, it was impossible to open the Museum at night. So much for the Report of the Committee on the South Kensington Museum. Another Committee was appointed to inquire into the British Museum itself. I think that the objects of my hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) in moving the appointment of that Committee were twofold—First, to ascertain whether it was necessary that the collections should be separated; and secondly, to discover whether accommodation could not be provided for the collections which are now in the Museum without such separation. After the Report of that Committee was made, it was the duty of the Trustees to consider what could be done to provide additional accommodation for the collections which are still undivided. They referred to the Government—as the sum to be voted for such a purpose must depend upon the Executive Government—to ascertain what is their opinion as to the propriety of separating the collections or keeping them together. The Government have not been able, and, considering the pressure which has been put upon them this year, I am not surprised that they have not been able, to give a specific answer to that question, but having regard to the collections which are now in the Museum, and to the valuable collection which has within the last three days arrived from the ancient Cyrene, I am sure that it will be impossible that such important and interesting works of art should be left under the glass shed and should not be exhibited, as the public have a right to demand that they should be. It is not for me to express my opinion upon this subject. It will be for the Government to say what they recommend should be done, in order that the Trustees may consider the question of providing additional space, with reference not merely to what they have to accommodate now, but also to what they may have to accommodate in the future. If any of the collections should be separated from the rest, of course, less accommodation will be required; if they should all be kept together the accommodation which will be required will be of very considerable extent. Of one thing, however, I am sure, and that is, that for collections so valuable as those in the British Museum the country will not grudge any reasonable sum that may be required. The right hon. Gentleman concluded by formally moving the Vote.

MR. GREGORY said, he had hoped that at the commencement of the Session some announcement would have been made by the Government upon the subject of enlarging and rearranging the British Museum. The state of congestion in which that establishment found itself was apparent to every one. He was aware of the pressure upon the financial resources of the Government, and he had such an objection to shreds and patchwork, that he would prefer allowing matters to remain as at present rather than to adopt any temporary expedient that would not be creditable hereafter. Rather than see another sculpture den he would prefer to see the present conservatory round the portico of the Museum, ugly and unsightly as it was, continued and extended, and he sincerely hoped that no plan for removing the grand staircase, and constructing two rooms of sculpture, which must be badly lighted and unfit for the purpose, would be adopted by the Trustees. Next year he hoped the Chancellor of the Exchequer might be able to adopt the suggestion made by the Committee which sat last year, and of which he (Mr. Gregory) was the Chairman—namely, to buy up the block of houses around the Museum. That would not only be a good investment, but it would enable the Government to lay down a plan admitting of gradual enlargement, and at the same time carrying out the system of rearrangement which was urged upon the Committee by all the witnesses—a systematic chronological arrangement of the statues. An hon. Friend near him, whom all received as a high authority in all matters pertaining to art—the hon. Member for Lambeth—he begged pardon, for Southwark (Mr. Layard)—that hon. Gentleman recommended a sculpture hall, but, if this were found too difficult or too expensive to obtain, then lateral galleries. He (Mr. Gregory) believed a hall would be difficult and expensive to construct, but lateral galleries would not. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Walpole) had alluded to the removal of some portion of the collections. Upon that point great difference of opinion prevailed, but throughout London there was great anxiety in different parts of the Metropolis to have local museums, and he thought that portions of the collections in the British Museum, if it were resolved to remove them, might be handed over to one or other of the local museums, the Trustees still retaining a proprietary right, and exercising a supervision over them. The Committee thought the ethnographical collection should be removed, and it was also suggested that the drawings of ancient masters should be removed to the National Gallery whenever the nation possessed a gallery capable of receiving them. With respect to prints the case was different, as they afforded instruction to the archæologist and the student in history. Upon the question of removing what was called the mediæval portion of the collection, there was great difference of opinion. He, as Chairman of the Committee, prepared a Report in the sense that the mediæval portion of the collection should be removed to whatever place Parliament should decide, but the Committee did not agree with him, and a recommendation to enlarge the British Museum was adopted. He still adhered to his own opinion upon that point, both upon the ground of economy and for the interest of the collections themselves. It was not fair to call upon the country to pay for two similar establishments in close contiguity with each other. It was said that the objects of the South Kensington Museum and the British Museum were different—that the latter was archæological and historical, while those of the Kensington Museum were educational and for the improvement of art. Practically, that appeared to him to be a distinction without a difference, the means of educational improvement were to be found in the British Museum and the materials for archæological and historical research could be found at Kensington. He adhered to his former opinion that the mediæval collection should be removed from the British Museum. He was aware that there was great difficulty in separating what ought to be placed in the British Museum from works of mediæval art. But Mr. Newton had thrown out a hint, showing that a canon might be laid down—perhaps rather a vague one—but still effectual for the purpose. He proposed to draw a distinction between Christian art and Pagan art. The line of demarcation might be difficult, but still it was only in a few instances that any doubt could be entertained. But in any case he thought the British antiquities representing the history of the nation ought to be retained in the British Museum, whether they were ante-Christian or post-Christian. But he had heard rumours that it was the intention of the Government next year to remove the whole or part of the natural history collections from the British Museum. He was satisfied that any attempt to transfer the natural history collections from their central position at Bloomsbury to a remote and less accessible situation at Kensington would give rise to great dissatisfaction. The weight of the official and scientific evidence taken before the Committee was against such a course, and if attempted it would be met as the proposed removal of the national collection of paintings to Kensington was met on a former occasion—by an adverse vote. The proposal was disapproved by Messrs. Gray, Marshall, Waterhouse, Professor Huxtable, and others. Professor Owen himself, the only name which those in favour of separation could quote, declared that he should infinitely prefer Bloomsbury, if he could only obtain sufficient space for his collection. The great arguments in favour of retaining the natural history collection where it was were three. First, the popularity of the collection with the middle and lower classes, a fact capable of being proved by a reference to statistics. In the next place, the importance of a central situation for such a collection had been strongly insisted upon. Lastly, there was the question of economy. If they built a natural history gallery at a distance from the great national library they would have to form a new library, the first cost of which, Professor Owen admitted, would be £30,000; and it would require a large annual sum to keep it up, and to purchase books of the same kind as they were also purchasing for the library in Bloomsbury. Then, the risk to many fragile articles which it contained, and which it was admitted could not be removed without great peril, ought not to be forgotten. He wished to open the eyes of the public to the outrageous proposition which the Government had apparently entertained in 1859. On the 10th of July in that year Professor Owen submitted a plan to the Trustees, in which he said that with the utmost economy of space he should require for the present wants of his collection, and for its probable extension within the next thirty years, a building of one story covering ten acres, or a building of two stories covering five acres. On the 21st of the following January the Trustees actually voted, by a majority of 9 to 8, that it would be cheaper to provide for the natural history gallery upon a site not contiguous to the Museum. That crazy, rash, and extravagant scheme was actually in contemplation last year. It was calculated that the expense of five and a half acres at Kensington would be £27,500, and at Bloomsbury, £240,000, the building on either site costing £567,000, making thus a total of £594,500, against £807,000. But that estimate was erroneous. It was proved before the Committee that the price of land at Kensington was misrepresented in that calculation, and that it should have been £53,000, and not £27,500. There was a space of 61,155 superficial feet in the British Museum which was devoted to natural history, and which could not be used for antiquities, as it was on the second floor. The space of 61,155 superficial feet represented £122,310—that was to say, it would cost that sum to provide buildings which they had already. Mr. Smirke, the architect of the Museum, declared that, beside that, the fittings alone would cost £80,000, as the old fittings in the Museum would not be available. Taking into account these figures, the 5½-acre plan at Bloomsbury would cost £656,000, and the plan at Kensington was estimated to cost £730,000, but he really believed it would cost £1,000,000, to say nothing of the large staff requisite for such an enormous building. But he would ask was all the space necessary which Mr. Owen required? The student of natural history who wished to go through the whole of the galleries would have to traverse a distance of nearly five miles. Professor Owen contemplated a great hall for the exhibition of whales. It was shown that the skins of whales could not be procured, and that, if they were procured, the stench would render it totally impossible for any one but a professor to enter the place where they were kept. He could fancy a notice being posted, “Shut at present on account of the stench.” Even if the natural history collection were removed, not an iota of space would be gained for the antiquities, and, in his opinion, the plan was the most extravagant, the most useless, and the most unpopular which could be devised. It was proved before the Committee last year that scientific men did not require the exhibition of all the specimens, and that it would weary and disgust the public. There were nine species of crows, some of them so closely allied that only the most scientific men could distinguish them. Mr. Gould, and a host of scientific witnesses said, the public did not require to have in the galleries nine specimens of crows and thirty-nine specimens of warblers, all resembling one another. What was required was a liberal collection of type specimens. He regretted that a man whose name stood so high as Professor Owen’s should connect himself with so foolish, crazy, and extravagant a scheme, and should persevere in it after the folly had been pointed out by most unexceptionable witnesses. A plan was proposed which struck every one in the Committee by its simplicity, its artistic and scientific character, and, above all, by its economy. Mr. Oldfield proposed a plan which was approved by the architect of the Museum, to make a chronological arrangement of the sculptures, and to provide at the same time for the perfect exhibition of the natural history specimens, by giving up the whole of the second story of the British Museum for the purpose. It would separate the natural history collection from the exhibition, and save the enormous expense which was clearly intended by the removal to Kensington. He congratulated the trustees on the changes which had been made, and on the liberality which had been evinced by Her Majesty's Government in improving the position of gentlemen who well deserved the increased salary and liberty accorded to them after long delay. But, while giving that praise, he must be allowed to qualify it with reference to one gentleman, who, he regretted, to say, was no longer connected with the Museum. He could not speak too highly of Mr. Oldfield. He believed that every member of the Committee appreciated the knowledge and taste displayed by Mr. Oldfield in the evidence which he gave last year, and the labour which he must have undergone in preparing a plan which was, in his opinion, the most perfect ever submitted for the rearrangement of the British Museum. Mr. Oldfield was a gentleman who was examined before every Committee and every Commission which had inquired into the subject. He was the person who arranged the Assyrian Gallery, the Egyptian Gallery, and the Greco-Roman and Roman Galleries, and the Temple Collection, and every one who had seen the admirable manner in which he had succeeded in those arrangements must be satisfied that the loss of his services would be a serious loss to the institution. Mr. Oldfield was most anxious to remain in the Museum, and offered to take any office, provided he was directly responsible to the Trustees and had an opportunity of submitting his views to them instead of submitting them to his superior officers, who might refuse to allow them to go before the Trustees. He even offered to serve gratuitously, if he were placed in this position with regard to the Trustees. In choosing Mr. Newton, the Trustees had chosen a very learned and a very worthy man, but the Trustees ought to have made such arrangements as would have continued the services of a man who had done such good service as Mr. Oldfield. He joined in the congratulations of the right hon. Gentleman at the additions which had been made to the Museum. He rejoiced particularly at the accessions which it had received from Africa, and, as M. de Chaillu had been very much abused, it was only fair to him to say that he had behaved in the fairest and most liberal manner. He had acceded at once, without any cavilling, to the valuation which had been put on his collection by the Trustees. Mr. Panizzi also deserved great credit for the zeal which he had shown in forwarding all plans for obtaining accessions to the Museum, and the Admiralty also ought to have their meed of praise for the assistance which they had given. Another matter he wished to allude to was the Campaigna collection. At the close of last year the Russians were in negotiation for this collection, and the Trustees, when they heard of this, sent Mr. Newton to Rome to purchase it. Some understanding was entered into between him and the French agent with regard to the particular things which each wanted. The next thing they heard was that the French Government had purchased the whole of the collection for £192,000. Through Mr. Robinson the Directors of the Kensington Collection had secured all that portion of the mediæval collection which they required, but the British Museum had not obtained one single solitary thing. It was notorious that Mr. Robinson had had many difficulties in his way; but he was not a man to be easily overcome by difficulties. He went from Cardinal to Cardinal and from Monsignore to Monsignore until he obtained what he required, and if the British Museum had not a man at their command whom they could employ in negotiations it would be well if they would put their commissions in the hands of a gentleman like Mr. Robinson. He hoped next year when the Government came forward with a plan it would not be a thing as of shreds and patches, but that it would be one which would make the Museum a real pride to the country. Above all, he warned them against any attempt to separate the natural collection from the other collections, for that proposition, he was convinced, would meet with strong opposition both in London and the country at large.

Mr. LAYARD said, he was not at all surprised at the opinions expressed by his hon. Friend who had just sat down. In the Committee of last year, over which the hon. Gentleman presided, there were no less than seven Gentlemen who as Trustees were, in fact, on their trial in reference to the management of the Museum, but who, nevertheless, on the most important divisions came down when several independent Members were absent and outvoted them on almost every material point. The consequence was that his hon. Friend as regards the Report of his Committee was made to stand in the position of parent to a child which was not his own. In 1850 a Royal Commission was appointed to inquire into the management of the British Museum, but not one of the most important recommendations of that Commission had been carried out. It recommended, for instance, the abolition of the trustee system, and the creation of a Board—a recommendation in which he fully concurred, for it was impossible to carry on a large Museum under the trustee system. What was wanted was one man, one idea, and one controlling intellect. The Commission also pointed out how inadequate the present building was for the purposes of the Museum, and it appeared to him that the trustees were responsible for this state of things. At present the front rooms of the building was nearly useless on account of the portico which excluded the light. An enormous hall had been built merely to show the backs of books. Two galleries had been constructed to contain the Assyrian marbles, and when they were done it was found that the marbles could not be seen. Then the portico, which was probably intended for the Trustees to walk under and dispute, had been enclosed in a hoarding, within which were placed the marbles from Halicarnassus, from Budruum, and from Cyrene. There they were virtually excluded from public view, and were suffering injury from the soot and rain which beat in upon them. Day by day, as one thing was built it needed to be patched up in order to adapt it for the purpose for which it was really intended. These things were discreditable, and no saving was effected by such a policy. On the contrary, money was thrown away for nothing. With regard to the proposed separation, he thought it far better that art should remain at the British Museum, and that science should be transferred somewhere else. In no country in the world were the two brought together. Even, if the collections were retained under the same roof there should be a separate and dis-tingent administration for art and science; the two collections should be kept distinct, with a separate staff, a separate establishment, and separate entrances. He quite agreed that the worst thing they could do was to patch. To do so was to throw away money, and in the end have to do the thing over again. As to the removal of the ethnological collection, that might be advisable, and some witnesses went so far as to recommend its transfer to the east of London, where it could be seen by seafaring people to whom it was asserted, it would prove of especial interest. Original drawings should not be kept in the Museum. They should be in the National Gallery, near the pictures for which they were frequently the first sketches; probably few hon. Members knew that over the cases containing the birds and other objects of natural history was one of the most interesting collections of portraits in England. £2,000 a year was actually being spent in the purchase of portraits many of which might be had for the asking in the Museum. Why not transfer them to the National Portrait Gallery? As to the removal of the mediæval collection, he did not agree with his hon. Friend, for it was almost impossible to draw the line between ancient and mediæval art. The reasons for giving mediæval art to Kensington were rather extraordinary. It was said that that was an educational establishment; but, if art education were desired, he would rather take a student to an Etruscan vase than to a bit of Palissy. At the same time it was marvellous to see what had been done at Kensington by Mr. Cole within a period of seven years. A very eminent French artist M. de Triqueti, in an article in the Revue Nationale, had expressed his surprise at what had been done there, and said that if the British Museum had only such a head as Kensington, France and every other country might despair, for England would have the finest art collection in the world. As far as the history of art was concerned, no collection could compare with that in the British Museum, but it was almost useless on account of its bad arrangement. Under the present system, the recommendations of those best calculated to judge of the requirements of certain collections were set aside, and it was in vain that they protested. It was, indeed, a bad system, and he trusted something would be done to reform it. At the beginning of the next Session he would bring the whole question before the House, and move distinct Resolutions with a view of reforming the administration of the Museum and of getting all the collections put under one responsible head. He must say he thought Mr. Oldfield's plan for the enlargement of the Museum perfectly feasible, and he believed that by adopting it in a few years a great deal might be done at no great expense. Mr. Oldfield was a most valuable servant, and he deeply regretted the cause of his having left the establishment. He (Mr. Layard) only wished that gentleman could again be employed, and he believed if it depended on his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) Mr. Oldfield would soon be there again. As to constructing a building adapted to the purpose required, they need only look to the new reading room to see what could be done when they were not trammelled with an architect. Mr. Panizzi had given them a magnificent hall in every manner admirably calculated for its purpose: He had not shown it to a single person, whether Englishman or foreigner, who did not so consider it. With regard to the enlargement of the Museum, he trusted that some definite scheme would be laid down, which, if it could not be carried out at once, might at least be carried out as adequate means were found, and which in time might produce a complete building worthy of the nation.

MR. MONCKTON MILNES said, he had taken part in the Commission referred to by the hon. Member for Southwark, and he was of the opinion that the Resolutions of that Commission were of a most useful character. The noble Lord the Member for London, who was not in the House that night, and whom, perhaps, they might never see again in the House, but whose absence they would all regret, appointed that Commission, which sat for about two years, and recommended a distinct division between the departments of science and art, and pointed out the necessity of each being governed by a separate head. He had never been able to understand why the Resolutions of that Commission were not carried out. He was aware, however, that several of the Commissioners, and perhaps in that capacity they did not see the same necessity for carrying out their recommendations as before. Still, year after year passed away without bringing the desired conclusion nearer. The same confusion and the same congestion of articles existed, and the same want of accommodation to the public for the purposes of information. No one change had taken place of any considerable benefit, except the construction of that great room, for which they had to thank Mr. Panizzi. He believed that the reason no advance was made was because they did not boldly and at once confront the question of separation, the collections in the Museum being, from the confusion of subjects, repulsive to people of taste. He trusted that the Government in examining the matter would look the question of separation boldly in the face, and decide upon it one way or the other. With regard to the lighting of the library of the British Museum in the evening he could not admit that the evidence of that much-lamented gentleman, Mr. Braidwood, was to be taken as conclusive. As long as gas was unscientifically made the injury to books was very great, but when gas was used, such as that consumed in the House of Commons itself or in the library of the Athenæum, in a chamber separated from the building by thick glass, no injury whatever need be sustained by the books. If the great dome of the British Museum were lit with gas in this manner the library might be made accessible to the population of this Metropolis on winter evenings without danger. He hoped that this subject would again come under the consideration of the trustees. He adhered to the opinion that a more efficient government of the Museum was required. The Trustees were most diligent in their attendance; but, after all, it was a government of amateurs. A government of amateurs was a very good thing in its way, but this was an institution too great to be governed by amateurs. Then look at the patronage of the Museum. Who were the personages who appointed every clerk, and, he believed he might even say, every housemaid about the building? The Speaker of the House of Commons, the Lord Chancellor, and the Archbishop of Canterbury. He had felt quite ashamed to write to these personages when he wished to recommend some young man for appointment or promotion in the British Museum. Of course, in such cases it always ended in a delegation of some kind or other, in which the names of these high functionaries were, no doubt, sometimes improperly used. He agreed in all that had been said in regard to the character and conduct of Mr. Oldfield. The officers of the Museum were gentlemen of great attainments, and the small addition made to their remuneration had been in every respect well merited.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the discussion of the evening had traversed rather a large field, but in the few words which he wished to address to the Committee he would not attempt to touch upon the great variety and diversity of the topics which had been introduced into the debate. He was bound to say, however, that the view presented to the British public and to the Government was most disheartening if the pessimist sentiments of hon. Members who had spoken that night were to be generally adopted. The Museum contained the richest and most magnificent collection in the world. But they had been assured the Government was bad, the building was bad, the arrangement of the collection was bad, the Museum never could do well as long as an architect had to do with it; and lastly, the principal librarian, in the opinion of one hon. Gentleman, although he believed he stood alone, was bad also. Well, the Government were of opinion that the case of the British Museum was one that called, and had long called for consideration; and the reason it had not had practical consideration was, not that the Government were unwilling to entertain it, but on account of those abundant differences of opinion of which the discussion they had had afforded ample evidence. They were all agreed that something ought to be done, but not what that something was. The hon. Member for Southwark did not agree with the hon. Member for Galway, except in one proposition, that there ought to be no patching, and nothing could be easier than to subscribe in general terms to such a doctrine. But when they came to consider what was meant by "patching," they would find one Gentleman meant exactly the reverse by that opprobrious term of what another meant. If, for example, a body of gentlemen called before them the greatest living naturalist, whose splendid genius and high character ought to have exempted him from being the object of the terms indulged in by the hon. Member for Galway in speaking of Professor Owen's plans—if they had heard from that Gentleman that a space of five and a half acres for the exhibition of his specimens of natural history were required, and then cut down that five and a half acres to two acres—he should consider that not altogether unlike patching. No doubt the pressure for space acted injuriously and caused great inconvenience. He would admit that it had reached a point that was scarcely compatible with the character and credit of the country. The Government were sensible of the evil, and they were of opinion that the difficulty ought to be faced without "patching," but by the adoption of some plan giving large and complete provision for a great length of time. But in order to fulfil that condition it was essential that there should be a separation of the collections, and that this separation should be drawn between the natural and scientific objects and the objects of art. The Government had thought it right to do something to elicit the opinion of the House of Commons. The Committee had made a Report, but he doubted whether it expressed the general sentiment of the House, and the Government were not prepared to act on that Report. The tendency of the Report was to keep the collections together, yet the Committee were not absolutely and uniformly of that opinion, because they thought that the ethnological collection had better be kept elsewhere. Those who were for keeping the collection together might be divided into two classes—those who advocated it on grounds of prudence and expediency, and those who favoured it on grounds of principle. Those who held the latter view maintained that, as the Museum had its origin in a private bequest, it would be to profane the intentions of its founder to separate or remove it. Of that opinion there seemed to be a few advocates. The Committee had abandoned it, and the hon. Member for Galway abandoned it because he proposed to give up the mediæval and ethnographical collections, and would also give up the drawings. That being the state of the case, he thought it was the duty of the Government to consider what course was dictated by prudence, public convenience, and a due regard to public feeling. He agreed with those who entertained the opinion that whatever was done ought to be done in such a manner as that it might not require hereafter to be undone. If, therefore, the Government were not prepared now to adopt the largest plan which had been laid before them, their endeavour must be so to adjust their present measures that they might do nothing which they would have to retract hereafter, or which would cross and traverse public feeling. The hon. Member for Galway had adverted to some plan which he seemed to think was in contemplation, and which he had aimed at prevented from being carried into effect; but he could assure him the Government, neither alone nor in conjunction with the trustees, sought to do anything without the approval of the House. He must at the same time distinctly tell his hon. Friend that the Government would not found their proceedings on the Report of the Committee, because, although in principle it gave up the idea of union, yet it contemplated that which the Government thought was unreasonable and inconvenient—an indefinite extension for an indefinite period on one and the same spot of vast and heterogeneous collections. The buildings connected with the British Museum admitted, he believed, in many parts, of considerable architectural improvement, while there were portions of the ground within the precincts of the present site not occupied which might be occupied for the purposes of the Museum. There were two sources of increased accommodation, while he believed it was admitted that certain branches in the Museum could be and ought to be removed. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway threatened to raise popular emotion, which, he hoped, might not end in popular commotion, with respect to the removal of the natural history collection. Now, he was disposed to admit with him, that, whether owing to tradition, or custom, or positive convenience, there was a certain amount of public feeling which would welcome the preservation of the zoological collection on the present site, and he might observe that no absolute necessity for entertaining the question of the removal of that collection existed at the present moment. But without raising any question which may hazard the future solution of the points in dispute, he thought it was open to Government very greatly to enlarge the accommodation afforded by the Museum. The present hour was not the time to enter into details on the subject, but he might state it to be the opinion of the Government that no necessity now existed for raising the question connected with the removal of the zoological collection. Improvements in building and the occupation of unoccupied space would, he believed, be useful so far as they went, and would afford increased accommodation for a considerable period. He might add that he did not think his hon. Friend's allusion to Professor Owen involved any want of respect for that distinguished man, any more than what had fallen from him might be construed into a want of respect for the hon. Gentleman himself. He would, therefore, say veniam petimusque damusque vicissim, and would assure his hon. Friend that the Government would take the proper opportunity during the recess of bringing the subject under the consideration of the Trustees, and endeavouring, in concert with them, to hit upon some plan which would so relieve and improve the British Museum as to render its condition satisfactory to the House and the country.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), if he could state, with any degree of certainty, whether it was intended to render generally accessible the drawings of the ancient masters in the British Museum, and whether they were to be displayed there or at Kensington? To the working artist they were of the utmost importance.

MR. TITE said, he could not conceive how any alteration of the natural history collection was to take place. The solution of the question appeared to him to consist in the adoption of Mr. Oldfield's plan, which, by the arrangement he suggested, gave the whole of the chronology, the archæology, and the architecture in a very complete system. He was afraid that, however the so-called system of patching was decried, he did not see how they could progress satisfactorily without it. But with all its faults they might well be proud of the Museum collection, which was one of the finest in Europe; and as for the library, probably it was the finest in the world. With regard to the Campana collection he admitted they were outbidden upon it; but at the same time he believed if a Minister of the Crown were to rise and ask for a Vote of £100,000 for such a collection, hon. Gentlemen would be somewhat unwilling to grant it.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he gathered from the speech of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that he was going to do what many of them so much disapproved—namely, to carry out the plan of Professor Owen and those who supported him. He would, no doubt, first remove the mineralogy and the palæontology, and then the zoology must follow. That would be an underhand mode of working. They ought to be told plainly what was intended. Kensington Museum was an admirable thing; but they were not to be treated as children, and to have a good object revealed to them only bit by bit. There should be some distinct determination of the House upon the subject before the divisions of the collection were attempted to be carried out. The government of the British Museum was admitted on all hands to be defective, but many persons had left their collections to the nation upon the understanding that they were to be in the charge of trustees, and the trustees could not be at present got rid of. He should like to see these national collections under the control of a responsible Minister of education sitting in that House; but as the Committee of Council were at present without a responsible head in the House, he objected to this duty being entrusted to them.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he wanted to know whether it was intended that the archæological collections of the British Museum, the finest in the world, were to be broken up? The reason why the British Museum was overcrowded was that they were omniverous, and were not satisfied with having a perfect national collection, but filled up the rooms with useless articles.

MR. KINNAIRD asked whether there was any probability of the Museum being opened of an evening, an advantage which a great number of working people desired?

MR. WALPOLE said, he would remind the Committee that nothing was more easy than to find fault, and nothing more difficult than to find a remedy. If the Trustees of the Museum needed any justification in respect of the censures aimed at them, it was to be found in the conflicting opinions delivered that night, which showed that whatever the Trustees had done, they would have been blamed for something. Upon the retirement of Mr. Hawkins it was arranged that three keepers of departments should be appointed, and the question was who should they be. Mr. Birch, the senior of his department, had been appointed keeper of the Egyptian department; Mr. Newton, who had been in the Museum many years, and who was one of the most intelligent gentlemen alive, was appointed as keeper of the classical antiquities, and he (Mr. Walpole) would stake his existence that a better appointment could not have been made. The keeper of the coins also was a gentleman thoroughly conversant with that matter; and if Mr. Oldfield had been appointed instead of any one of these gentlemen an injury and an injustice would have been done. Nobody took greater pains than he (Mr. Walpole) personally took to preserve Mr. Oldfield's services for the public, and he believed that unless Mr. Oldfield had thought that he would not be in so independent a position as that to which he naturally aspired he would have remained. The hon. Member for Southwark had made a serious attack, as he had often done before, upon the constitution of the government of the Museum. And if he were to respond to the hon. Gentleman's question of what sort of government was best, he might, as an abstract principle, prefer the government of a single authority; but the Trustees had been working for many years, and working in a way which had been attended with great advantage to the establishment, and he thought it would be a serious thing to disturb that government. His opinion was that it would not be desirable to change the Trustee management. Each head of a department was responsible for his department; so that the public had undivided responsibility in each department, subject only to that control which must be always exercised in establishments which were composed of several divisions. As to the Campagna collection, the non-purchase of that collection was not owing to any delay on the part of the Trustees. With respect to the additional space required, an expression of his personal opinion on any particular plan would now be premature; but he might say that all the plans which might be submitted to them would receive the attentive consideration of the Trustees, and he hoped that such an arrangement would be made as would contribute to the better exhibition of the very valuable collection, for the due arrangement of which the existing accommodation was decidedly insufficient.

MR. AYRTON said, that, even without opening the Museum by gaslight, a great deal might be done to afford the people greater facilities for visiting it. It was at present closed at six o'clock in the evening, though there was daylight till nine. He should like to hear some explanation from the right hon. Gentleman on that point.

MR. WALPOLE said, he could assure the hon. Gentleman that the matter had been most carefully considered. The Trustees had gone into the minutest details. He himself had recommended that the Museum should be kept open till half-past eight in the evening during the summer months, when he found that it could not be opened by gaslight; but, on referring to former experience, it appeared that when it was kept open till eight o'clock the people would not come between six and eight, and that the number who might be expected to visit it between those hours would not be at all commensurate with the additional expense which would be incurred by keeping it open till eight.

DURHAM UNIVERSITY BILL.
COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee).

Clause 2 (Appointment of Commissioners),

MR. FENWICK said, he objected to the name of the Bishop of Durham, and should move that it be omitted. The right rev. Prelate was not only Visitor of the University, but he had the appointment of the whole of the governing body, and being deeply interested in the existing state of things, he was not a proper person to be named one of the Commissioners.

Amendment proposed, in lines 10 and 11, to leave out the words "the Right Reverend Father in God, Henry Montagu, Lord Bishop of Durham."

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the situation of Durham University was peculiar, as having been constituted by an act of the Bishop and chapter. As the Bill proposed to give a legislative and remodelling power to the Commissioners it seemed desirable that there should be some person upon the Commission connected with the Church. He had applied in the first instance to the Archbishop of York, who had been a member of the Oxford Commission, but the numerous avocations of his Grace unfortunately prevented him from serving on the Commission. Under these circumstances he hoped the name of the Bishop of the diocese would be allowed to stand.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 30: Majority 45.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 3, 4, and 5.

Clause 6 (Powers of Commissioners),

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he would move, as an Amendment, to leave out from the beginning of the clause to the word "furthering," and to insert "in order to promote useful learning and religious education." That would place the words in the sequence in which they stood in the Act from which the Bill professed to be taken. The fault of the University of Durham was, that it was only a seminary for curates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the principal effect of the Amendment would be to leave out the words "practical knowledge," though the hon. Member wished to make the education generally useful.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, that was not the object, but that religious education should not stand first.

Amendment negatived.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 (Restrictions on Exercise of powers by Commissioners),

MR. FENWICK said, that at present the Durham University was under the sole control of the Bishop of Durham. He had been informed by a letter he had lately received that the Bishop of Durham was a near relative of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, that the Dean of Durham was a brother of one of the Under Secretaries of State for the Home Department, and that the drawer of the Bill was a nephew of the Professor of Divinity in the University, who received £4,000 or £5,000 a year for lecturing four or five times a week to eight or ten young men. Of course he (Mr. Fenwick) did not believe a word of this statement, and he only brought it forward on the present occasion for the purpose of giving the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of giving it a direct contradiction or a fit explanation. The Bill, however, as it stood, did nothing to alter the state of things to which he had alluded—namely, the absolute control exercised by the Bishop of Durham over the University; and as long as that continued it was quite impossible that the University could answer the purpose for which it was originally founded. The present Bill gave no real power to the Commissioners, and they would, in fact, prove utterly useless. He would, therefore, move as an Amendment the omission of the words in the clause which, if left out, would obviate the objection he had referred to.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the very coarse imputations and personal motives which had been scattered upon the promoters of this Bill did not offer much encouragement to bring forward measures of the sort, which he believed was a measure dictated by a liberal and comprehensive spirit. The hon. Member said he (Sir George Lewis) had been influenced by motives of personal relationship—[Mr. FENWICK: No, no!]—to the Bishop of Durham, in order to give him some sort of advantage. Then that an Under Secretary of State was brother to the Dean of Durham, and that there was some relationship between the draftsman and officers of the University. Now, he would take upon himself the entire responsibility of the measure. He had no objection to omit the paragraph which was opposed; but he did not think its omission would have the slightest effect.

Mr. HENLEY said, the debate was very instructive. The University of Durham founded the University out of their own funds, and the hon. Gentleman said they did it because they found they were an object of envy. That was charitable at least. It was objected to ecclesiastical persons founding a University out of ecclesiastical funds that they made religion their principal object. He thought the discussion was a warning to individuals as to corporate bodies, however wealthy they might be, never to do anything for anybody.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.
Remaining Clauses agreed to.

Mr. MOWBRAY said, he would then move the insertion of a clause similar to one contained in the Oxford and Cambridge University Acts, declaring that it shall not be binding upon the person taking a degree to make any declaration whatever, but that until he shall have subscribed a declaration stating that he is a bond fide member of the Church of England he shall not be eligible as a member of the Senate, or to hold any office for which such a degree heretofore constituted one of the qualifications.

Clause (Oath, Declaration, or Subscription not to be required)—brought up, and read 1^o.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought it would be better to leave this matter to the discretion of the Commissioners.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the Clause be now read a second time,"

The Committee divided:—Ayes 26; Noes 64: Majority 38.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

WINDSOR SUSPENDED CANONRIES BILL.—COMMITTEE.

right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would show sufficient determination to persevere with the Bill.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Appropriating the profits of the Seventh Canonry to the Military Knights of Windsor),

Mr. DEEDES said, he strongly objected to the clause as inconsistent with the existing law relating to capitular estates.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the Chapter of Windsor was dissimilar from the cathedral chapters generally, and that the Military Knights once formed an integral part of the Chapter of Windsor. The Bill proposed to take two of the canonries, and give the profits of one of them to the Military Knights, assigning the other to increase the endowments attached to local livings.

Mr. DEEDES said, he also objected to the application of the funds of one of the suspended canonries to the increase of the two livings in Windsor.

Mr. VANSITTART said, there were no livings in England which had a greater claim to have their endowments increased than had those of Windsor.

Clause agreed to, as was also Clause 2.

ANNOYANCE JURORS (WESTMINSTER)
BILL.—COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD LLANOVER said, that the Act of Elizabeth entitled "An Act for the good Government of the City or Borough of Westminster," amended by subsequent Acts, appointed, amongst other things, an Annoyance Jury, whose duty it was to inspect annoyances, obstructions, and weights and measures. The object of the Bill was to abolish the Annoyance Jury, and to vest its powers in the "Court of Burgesses" which constituted the local government of Westminster, with power to appoint inspectors to summon offenders, and to inflict penalties, which were to be paid one half to the Bailiff of Westminster, the other half to the Court of Burgess, for the purpose of defraying the expenses of the Act. The object of the Amendments he proposed to move was to place the duty of punishing offences of this kind in the hands of the stipendiary magistrates, as was the case in the other metropolitan districts; and to direct the fines to be paid over to the Bailiff. The noble Lord said that the inhabitants of Westminster objected to the continuance of this power in the hands of the Court, which was a self-elected body; and, while admitting that more persons were fined for having deficient weights and measures in the City of Westminster than in other parts of the kingdom, explained that circumstance by stating that in Westminster the fines were not, as they were elsewhere, paid to the county treasurer, but were paid to the burgesses and applied by them. The noble Lord then moved an Amendment in Clause 5 to strike out the words "the said Court of Burgesses," and to insert "two Justices of the Peace for the County of Middlesex."

LORD CHELMSFORD defended the constitution of the Court, which he said had been established three centuries, and which had always attending its meetings a town clerk, who was usually a lawyer, and who was appointed by the High Steward. The Annoyance Jurors, as they were called, though their object was rather to prevent annoyance, had the power to enter into shops and examine the weights and meaasures, and defacing or destroying those they found defective, and amercing offenders in penalties to the amount of 40s. But the Court of Burgesses, assembling once a month, had power to mitigate the fine. This jurisdiction had been conferred upon the Court of Burgesses by an Act passed in the 27th year of the reign of George II., and had been exercised most beneficially for more than a century. As the humble classes were those who suffered most from fraudulent weights and measures, it was necessary that there should be constant supervision over the traders in particular districts. A return published in 1858 showed that in the previous year there were a greater number of convictions for improper weights and measures in Westminster than, with one exception, in any other division in the country. The fines received by the Court of Burgesses amounted to £50 or £60 a year. He left it to their Lordships to consider whether the Court was more likely to discharge its duties more diligently and painfully in consequence of this amount of revenue. No complaint had ever been made as to the practical working of the Court, but it had been objected by many of the inhabitants that the being compelled to serve on this Annoyance Jury was a very great burden. Accordingly, a Bill had been introduced to abolish the jurisdiction of the Court of Burgesses, and to substitute for them an Inspector of Weights and Measures. The Court of Burgesses themselves did not object—they considered the measure to be a relief and a benefit. No doubt it was most desirable that the Inspectors should act under a constant and vigilant superintendence, and if the Inspectors were not to be answerable to the Court of Burgesses he thought the door would be open to a great deal of connivance and partiality. There was nothing in his noble Friend's argument beyond this, that the Court of Burgesses was a self-elected body.

THE EARL OF POWIS was of opinion that it was better to transfer the jurisdiction of the police magistrates than to continue it in the hands of the Court of Burgesses. It would, of course, be open to any of the inhabitants who thought they had reasonable ground for complaint against the Inspector, to prefer such complaint before the magistrates. It was but reasonable that the jurisdiction should be placed in the hands of the police magistrates, rather than in those of a self-constituted body like that of the Court of Burgesses.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON thought that the police magistrates had quite enough business thrown upon them without being saddled with those additional duties of looking after the Inspector of Weights and Measures and hearing complaints respecting him.

LORD LLANOVER said, he thought it would be a great improvement to have this jurisdiction transferred to the stipendiary magistrates; but he would not trouble their Lordships to divide upon the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Amendment made; The Report thereof to be received on Thursday next.

UNIVERSITY ELECTIONS BILL.

SECOND READING.

THE EARL OF POWIS said, this Bill was introduced into the other House at the beginning of the Session in consequence of the Resolution of a Committee which sat last year, that it was desirable that votes for the election of Members for the Universities should be recorded in a prescribed form before a justice of the peace. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee, and, after considerable discussion, passed the House of Commons in its present form. The reason for the Bill was the non-residence of almost the whole of the University constituencies. They numbered respectively 3,500 and 5,000 voters, and only about 250 were resident either in Oxford or Cambridge. A great deal had been done by the multiplication of polling places to render it more easy for the voters in other constituencies to record their votes, and a majority of those voters were resident in the borough or county for which they possessed a qualification. The Bill sedulously avoided anything like voting by proxy, and would greatly diminish the cost of contested elections for the Universities. He, therefore, hoped their Lordships would assent to the second reading.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

Motion agreed to;

Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Thursday next.

SALMON FISHERIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY, in moving the second reading of the Bill, the object of which was to preserve the breed and growth of salmon, said, that a Commission which was appointed last year examined witnesses as to the state of the rivers in England, and ascertained the undoubted fact that salmon which formerly existed in them in great abundance had diminished in some, and in others had almost ceased to exist. The causes were the establishment of fixed engines, the pollution of the waters, the complication of the law, the non-observance of a closing season, and illegal modes of fishing. The Commission made a Report, and this Bill was founded upon its recommendations. From the time of Magna Charta down to the 11 & 12 Vict., Parliament had constantly recognized the duty of protecting the salmon. At present all kinds of obstacles were interposed in the way of the salmon when they attempted to ascend the rivers for the purpose of spawning, and every possible effort was made to capture them by means of fixed engines, fixed nets, and other contrivances. It had been the uniform object of the Legislature to give the salmon a constant and ready access to the upper waters, and with this view it was now proposed to prohibit the continuance of any fixed engines except where a fishery of this kind existed by ancient charter or grant of the Crown. It was also proposed that in the case of dams and weirs a constant and ready access should be provided for the salmon to the upper waters by means of a gap or "free pass," and it provided a weekly close time from eight p.m. on Friday till six a.m. on Monday. Spearing and "burning the water" would be prohibited, and a penalty would be inflicted on any person who permitted deleterious matter to flow into a river so as to kill or poison fish, subject, however, to exemption from the penalty if he proved to the satisfaction of the Court that he had used the best practicable means, within a reasonable cost, to render such matter harmless. He believed that as the law now stood an action might be maintained against any person who thus poisoned the fish, but this was a costly process, and the Bill provided for the infliction of a penalty if the offence were proved to the satisfaction of two magistrates. The Bill inflicted penalties for the capture of unclean fish, for taking the young of salmon, and for disturbing the fish when spawning. It was proposed to declare a close time between the 1st of September and the 1st of February, and to make it illegal to sell or offer to sell any salmon during that time. There might be objection to some of the provisions of the Bill, but he hoped their Lordships would assent to the second reading. It was naturally of interest to all sportsmen, but it had also a wider interest, since it was calculated to insure a valuable supply of fish, which was now almost destroyed. This country possessed some excellent rivers for fishing, but the quantity of fish there seemed to be gradually becoming smaller. He did not expect ever to see salmon sold for a penny a pound, or to find a clause again inserted in the indentures of apprentices providing that they should not be made to eat salmon oftener than three times a week. But he did expect through the operation of this Bill that salmon would become more plentiful and cheaper than it was at present.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, he had not proved a true prophet when he warned their Lordships that a rather extraordinary and somewhat amusing Bill would come before them on this subject. The House of Commons were entirely of his opinion, for in the Select Committee they had deprived the Bill of its singular and objectionable features, and this was now a practical measure, which, with some alterations, might be very fairly passed into a law. There would, however, be some difficulties in carrying out the Bill. He thought that their Lordships, however well versed they might be in natural history, would be very much puzzled if they should ever have to apply the definition of a salmon as given in the Bill. For example, it seemed that a magistrate before whom an offender under this measure was brought would be expected to know the difference between "a salmon, cock or kipper, kelt, laurel, girling, grilse, botcher, blue cock, blue pole, fork tail, mort, peal, herring peal, May peal, pugg peal, harvest cock, sea trout, white trout, sewin, buntling, guiniad, tubs, yellow fin, sprod, herling, whiting, bull trout, whitling, scurf, burn tail, fry, samlet, smoult, smelt, skirling or scarling, parr, spawn, pink, last spring, hepper, last brood, gravelling, shed, scad, blue fin, black tip, fingerling, brandling, or brondling." Now, he thought that most of the magistrates of this country would be rather puzzled when a delinquent was brought before them to know to which of these fish the offence applied. This must be simplified in Committee. He hoped, too, before going into Committee that his noble Friend would look at some points which rather seriously affected property. He entirely agreed that all fixed engines and obstacles to the passage of the fish up the river should be removed. There were, however, two clauses in the Bill which he thought were highly objectionable—namely, that which prohibited fishing with nets within fifty yards of a mill dam or fishing weir, and that which provided that the fishing should be closed from eight o'clock on Friday evening till six o'clock on Monday morning. As long as dams or weirs were obstructions to the passage of the salmon there might be reasons for prohibiting fishing in their neighbourhood; but as it was intended by this Bill to provide that a free passage should be allowed for the fish over such structures, it would be absurd and unjust to prevent proprietors from fishing as near such dams or weirs as they pleased. In some rivers in the south of England, as, for instance, in that at Christchurch, the enforcement of such a provision as that contained in the Bill would entirely destroy the fishing, because the pools near the dams and weirs were the only places in which fish could be caught. As to the weekly close time, it would, in his opinion, be quite sufficient to forbid fishing between six o'clock on Saturday night and six o'clock on Monday morning; and he hoped their Lordships would not overlook the circumstance that upon persons who had taken fishings as a means of obtaining a livelihood the deprivation of one day's fishing a week would operate as a great hardship. He hoped that the noble Lord would not insist upon retaining in the Bill the provisions to which he had referred.

THE EARL OF LONSDALE said, he did not intend to oppose the Bill, but he thought that some alteration would be requisite in the wording of some of the provisions before it was allowed to become law.

LORD LLANOVER considered that it would be politic to make some concessions to those who were interested in the upper waters, who were, or ought to be, the great salmon preservers.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that this was a subject in which all persons were interested, and he believed that they would willingly give their assistance in carrying out the law. At the same time he had no objection to some slight alterations being made to meet the views of the noble Earl who had raised the objection.

Motion agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD WODEHOUSE moved that the Bill be now read a second time. The object of the measure was to amend the present law with regard to the class called the irremovable poor. This class of poor was created under an Act passed in 1846, which made a residence of five years in a parish to confer a status of irremovability. By another Act, introduced by Mr. Charles Buller, when he was President of the Poor Law Board, the support of the irremovable poor was thrown upon the common fund of the union to which they belonged, the assessment being calculated upon the cost of the relief of the settled poor during the three preceding years. By this law a very large number of poor persons became irremovable; in 1860 no less than 225,000 persons were relieved as irremovable poor, the expenditure on their relief being £780,000. The alterations proposed to be made by the present Bill were these:—It was proposed, in the first place, to diminish the time during which a continuous residence should render a person irremovable from five years to three; and instead of its being necessary that this continuous residence should be within a particular parish, such residence within the limits of any one Poor Law Union should be sufficient to render a person irremovable. It was proposed also to make a change in the mode of raising the common fund from which the relief of the irremovable poor was to be given. Instead of an assessment on the average expense of the settled poor for the past three years, it was proposed that the fund should be raised by a rate on the assessment to the county rate; so that the expenditure from this common fund should be equally distributed according to the county assessment of all the parishes in the union. There were good reasons why those changes should be made, though they would not justify any apprehension or alarm that they would make any great and radical change in the existing law. The present was not a Bill for the abolition of settlement, nor was it a Bill for establishing a union rating. The measure was confined to one particular class of poor, and its object was to remedy certain evils that had arisen out of the law of 1846 itself. Of the two principal changes, one had reference to the ratepayer, the other looked rather to the interest of the poor. It was obvious that the law of 1846 aggravated the inconveniences which arose in parishes which were in the possession of a few landowners. Independently of the natural desire of the proprietors of such parishes not to be burdened with the charge of a large number of poor, an additional reason for removing them was given by the Act of 1846. Under that Act the charge for the relief of the irremovable poor was calculated on the average expenditure for the relief of the settled poor during three years. It was, therefore, the interest of the owners of parishes to diminish as much as possible the number of the settled poor within their limits. This was a grievance that did not rise from the general principle of the Poor Law; it had arisen wholly under the special legislation of 1846. He called it a grievance, for it certainly threw a burden on the ratepayers of open parishes, or those in the hands of many proprietors, and, undoubtedly, it gave rise to cases of extreme hardship among the poor. The question of the effect of close parishes was one that had been much examined and discussed. He would not push any argument to an extreme, but he knew that in some close parishes there had been an actual diminution of the population compared with parishes belonging to a number of owners. When poor people came in to supply a deficiency of labour, not in a particular parish, but in an entire district, it was a great hardship that the whole cost of their relief should be thrown upon what were called the "open" parishes; yet these parishes were overburdened with poor because land could be procured in them on which residences for labourers could be erected; while the "close" parishes, which benefited by their labour, exempted themselves from contributing to their relief, because they refused to permit them to settle within them. As to lessening the period of residence, one of the greatest improvements made in the administration of the Poor Law of late years had been the decrease of the number of removals. Those removals were to the poor the greatest hardships existing under the administration of the Poor Law system. Most of their Lordships must have seen cases of extreme hardship caused by those removals, and he contended it was their duty to diminish the hardships caused by them. It was proposed to render a man irremovable after a residence of three years—not in any particular parish, but within the union. However much they might be in the habit of praising the parochial system of this country, yet they must remember that these parishes were very ancient divisions, made without reference to the relief of the poor, and by adhering to them great anomalies and much hardship had been created. But the union was a recent division, formed with special reference to the administration of the Poor Law. The Bill did not seek to establish a union rating with regard to the settled poor; all that was sought to be established was to make the area of the union the limit within which a residence of three years should render a person irremovable. Owing to the provision in the law requiring residence in a particular parish to make a person irremovable, it frequently happened that after a man had resided for seven or eight years in a particular house, he lost his right to be considered irremovable by merely moving to a distance of 100 yards, or, perhaps, to the other side of the street in the same village, and rendered himself liable to be removed to a distant part of the country. It was to mitigate that evil of the law of settlement that the change provided by this Bill was proposed. He held in his hand Reports of Poor Law Inspectors and other documents, which contained evidence of the practical hardship which the present law entailed. He would quote a single instance. The precincts of St. Katharine's Dock had no poor, because all the labourers who worked within them resided in neighbouring parishes. Those persons became chargeable on the parishes in which they resided, and the place in which they worked escaped from all responsibility for their maintenance in case they became chargeable on the poor rates. It might be urged that this was a matter which had not been sufficiently inquired into; but really about few subjects had there been more investigation. A Committee of the House of Commons sat in 1847 and produced a blue book containing a great amount of information on the question. In 1848 various Inspectors were sent to inquire into the matter, and during the last three Sessions a Committee had been engaged in going through the whole case. It was on the Resolutions of that Committee that the present Bill, with the exception of one clause, had been based. Very grave questions, both as regarded the law of settlement and the area of chargeability, had occupied the public mind; and no doubt those would be discussed hereafter. It would not, however, be a sound argument, that because their Lordships were not prepared to abolish the law of settlement or to adopt a system of general union rating, therefore, they ought not to make any amendment which the existing law required. Looking to the great changes which had taken place in this country—looking to the manner in which the poor moved from one part of the country to another—and looking to the popular feeling with regard to the law of settlement, he ventured to think it was better for their Lordships to make small and well-considered changes than to wait till matters grew to such a head that they might be driven to adopt some sweeping legislation, which, perhaps, might not be so well advised, and which, at all events, would not be so gradual and cautious as those measures which usually marked the progress of legislation in this country.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

VISCOUNT LIFFORD, in moving that the Bill be read a second time that day six months, said that the candid, lucid, and able statement of the noble Lord who had just sat down convinced him that he had formed a just opinion of the measure when he came to the conclusion that it was an attack upon the English parochial system, and the first step—and by no means an inconsiderable one—towards the establishment of union rating. Poor Law legislation must be based upon the principles of political economy; but it must always be borne in mind that this was a Christian country, and that such legislation must also be founded upon principles of Christian charity. That was the wise view upon which the legislation of Queen Elizabeth was based, which succeeded the old monkish system of the relief of the poor by charity, and that was also the principle upon which the first Irish Poor Relief Act was founded, which succeeded the system of relief of the poor in that country by the indiscriminate charity of those who were very little removed above the grade of the people who received relief. But there was only one security which could be given that poor relief should be properly administered, and that was by making the area of rating so small that not only should every ratepayer know how the money devoted to that purpose was expended, but should be able to make his voice heard in case the mode of expenditure should be called in question. Both modes of relief had been tried in Ireland, and it had been found that small districts of rating worked best. The advantage of small rating districts over large ones was especially shown in the counties of Donegal and Clare. In the latter county, where the districts were large, pauperism was as 39, whilst in Donegal, where the districts were small, the pauperism was only 24½. In England, safeguards were far more needed than in Ireland for the pernicious system of out-door relief was eating like a canker-worm into the public resources. Such relief was looked upon as a right, and the natural consequence was that children neglect their parents and parents their children; unless that system were kept under strong check the result would be most disastrous and the only thing that could supply an efficient check was having small areas of rating. The effect of this Bill would be to mulct the parishes where the poor were taken care of for the benefit of those parishes where the poor are neglected, and to induce a cruel system of compulsory migrating of the poor from one parish to another, till the time had elapsed which made them chargeable to the union. Their Lordships were again called upon to stand between the House of Commons and the public interests; last year they saved a large amount of revenue, and on this occasion he hoped they would also confer a considerable advantage. Noble Lords who sat opposite had many traditions connected with their party, but they had none more honourable than that which related to the passing of the Poor Law of 1834, which saved the property of the country, and which measure they promoted in the most generous and unselfish manner, and at a great sacrifice of popularity; and he trusted they would pause before, by passing the present measure, they inflicted a fatal blow upon that useful and beneficial system they had themselves established.

Amendment moved, to leave out "now," and insert "this Day Six Months."

THE EARL OF DEVON said, that having been for many years connected with the Department from which this Bill emanated, he was anxious to say a few words; more especially because the Bill incorporated those principles to which he had always given a ready and cordial adhesion. He thanked the Government for having introduced it. He believed that the working of those principles must prove equally beneficial to the poor and to the ratepayers. In his opinion, the interests of those two classes could not properly be regarded as distinct. Whatever tended to raise the condition of the working classes, to secure to them adequate and just remuneration for their labour, and to mitigate the hardship which must, under the most favourable circumstances, fall to their lot, tended also, in no indirect or remote manner, to promote the interests of employers. As far as he understood the principles of the Act of William IV. and the views of its framers, he drew from them the conclusion that they acknowledged the necessity of, from time to time, introducing measures to extend the privileges of irremovability. He could not, therefore, admit that this Bill was inconsistent with the Poor Law Act, for it was only a just and equitable extension of it. The necessity for facilitating the circulation of labour from one part of the country to another had been recognized by all political economists, from Adam Smith downwards, and was one which need not now be demonstrated. There could be no question that it was of the utmost importance that the labourer should move freely from one part of the country to another, according to the fluctuations of demand and remuneration, and that after the lapse of several years he should not be liable, in the event of sickness or any accident, to be returned to the distant part of the country from which he originally came. In a very able and impressive speech his revered Friend, the late Mr. Baines, pictured in minute detail the hardship inflicted upon the labourers by their being torn from their homes and from the place where they had formed near and dear relations, to be sent to some distant parish; and as that right hon. Gentleman was never inclined to over-colour anything it could not be supposed for a moment that his statements were exaggerated. The hardship was recognized by the Legislature, and in 1846 an Act passed which introduced the principle of irremovability with respect to persons who had resided five years in any one parish. This Bill sought to extend that principle and to make it permanent. The noble Lord who moved the Amendment (Viscount Lifford) referred to the case of Ireland as an argument in favour of retaining small areas of rating. Under the peculiar circumstances of Ireland he (the Earl of Devon) had always been an advocate of the adoption of small areas in that country. Looking to all the difficulties which the new Poor Law had to encounter there, small areas were probably advantageous. If the present proposition had been to substitute a system of union rating he was ready to admit that considerable weight would be due to the argument. It might be that, on the subject of union rating, he entertained views which some of their Lordships would deem impracticable, but at present it was sufficient to say that the Bill contained nothing of so formidable a character as the abolition of the law of settlement and the adoption of union rating, and that a sound and useful measure was not prejudiced by propositions which might raise arguable points. All that the Bill did was to diminish the time and increase the area which was to confer the privilege of irremovability in certain cases; and, with regard to the poor, the benefit would be very great, not merely in diminishing the hardship of removals but in promoting a free circulation of labour. The advantage to the ratepayers was still more obvious, because instead of poor parishes being, as now, often unduly burdened, the burden would be more equally and justly distributed and the amount of litigation would be greatly diminished. The effect of the Act of 1846 was greatly to reduce that most objectionable part of the Poor Law expenditure. In the years 1843, 1844, and 1845 the amount spent in litigation was £285,000, and in 1851, 1859, and 1860 it was only £186,000. Other changes might have had some effect, but from his experience in that Department he was inclined to ascribe the greater portion of that remarkable diminution to the adoption of the principle of irremovability. By this Bill that principle would be extended, and by the diminution of time it would be easier to ascertain the correctness of any claims to settlement, and thus tend further to reduce the expense. The Bill came to them recommended by two Committees of the House of Commons, and by a majority of the Poor Law Inspectors, whose authority must be admitted, and as he believed great benefit would result to the whole community he should cordially vote for the second reading.

THE EARL OF STRADBROKE said, his consideration of the Bill had led him to a different conclusion from that of the noble Earl who had just sat down. It had been described as a measure which did not introduce union rating. That might be so, but he regarded it as a wedge which would lead hereafter to the introduction of that principle. Now, he had never objected to union rating in towns, to which this principle might perhaps be fairly applied. But this was not the case in rural districts—and, indeed, the very reverse was the fact there. At present there existed, he was happy to say, a number of parishes where the owners and occupiers of property took a great interest in their poor, and did their utmost to find them employment, and in which, when there existed a superabundance of labourers, the owners and occupiers subscribed to enable the surplus to emigrate, and thus reduced the poor rates in their respective parishes. In other parishes, however, where property was more divided, or where the owners lived perhaps at a distance, the poor were comparatively neglected, there was a want of employment, and the taxes were far heavier than in the well-administered parishes. The result of a union rating would be to punish the good administrators and to favour the neglectful. It had been said that it was the interest of owners to pull down the labourers' cottages; but such cases were extremely rare—the practice was seldom resorted to and was generally disapproved. He did not say that it was impossible to find one such case; but he believed that six cases of this kind could not be found in the kingdom. The general opinion of landowners was averse to this proceeding, and their aim everywhere was, he believed, to promote the well-being of their labourers—in truth, the general disposition of landowners was to improve the cottages on their estates, and to provide them with three sleeping rooms. No man had advocated the Bill of 1834 more than himself, from the time of its passing this Parliament he had never felt the shadow of a doubt of its great value, but he strongly objected to subsequent alterations which threw the burthen of maintaining the poor when sick on the parishes where they resided, generally adjoining those to which they belonged, and where they worked, in lieu of charging the parishes of their settlement, thus giving an uncalled for, and unfair advantage to ratepayers in parishes having few cottages—this law ought to be repealed. Feeling that the Bill would be prejudicial to the interests of the poor themselves, inasmuch as they would not be so completely employed as they now were, and believing, that it was the first advance towards a system of union rating, he should be compelled to oppose the second reading.

LORD REDESDALE said, he felt extreme regret in having to oppose this Bill, because it contained a great deal which was likely to be of advantage. At the same time he could not at present consent to pass such a measure. Those by whom it was advocated had treated it as a little Bill; but it was really a very large one, and rendered a satisfactory settlement of other questions much more difficult than before. In his opinion the changes now proposed should be considered in connection with the law of settlement altogether. He admitted that the system of settlement in the form in which it now stood must be got rid of; but by introducing this Bill a difficulty was created in the way of complete legislation. The measure introduced important alterations as regarded the burdens upon property. An illustration had been given of three parishes where the rate was very disproportionate, and the change now proposed would, without showing any sufficient grounds, make a difference at once in the value of property there equivalent in one case to the withdrawal, and in the other to the imposition of a new income tax. That was a very great change, and unless their Lordships were convinced of its justice they ought not to make it. He granted that there was an inequality which ought to be removed; but this was too violent a settlement of the question. There was hardly a union in the kingdom in which the alteration here proposed would not make a difference of 1s. in the pound, some gaining to that amount, and others having to pay 1s. more than they did at present. Suppose two men had taken two farms in different parishes on a lease, assuming the respective burdens to be the same, it would be a serious thing in the one case to increase those burdens, while in the other they were possibly diminished to the same extent. Their Lordships ought to pause before they hastily made so great a change in the value and relative position of property. They were asked at this late period of the Session to take in hand a Bill of this importance, involving the principle of irremovability and union rating. Now, if they had sent down such a Bill to the other House late in July, would the House of Commons have consented to consider it? Their Lordships were asked to pass a Bill on imperfect information, that opened large questions which it did not close, and to pass it at a period of the Session when it was impossible to give the measure the consideration its importance deserved. He should be sorry to record his opinion against the principle of the Bill; and, for these reasons, he would entreat those who had charge of the Bill not to press it.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE believed this was an important and beneficent measure, which, if passed in the present Session, would cause it to be referred to hereafter as one that had produced a great public advantage. The noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) in opposing the Bill, stood in a different position from most of the other Members of the House. He said he was prepared to deal with subjects that few of their Lordships and few Members of the House of Commons were prepared to deal with—the two great questions of the law of settlement and the extension of the area of rating. That might be a valid objection to proceeding with this Bill as far as the noble Lord was concerned; but he believed their Lordships were not prepared to deal with either then, or, probably, in the next Session. Was that a valid reason why they should reject a Bill that did modify the evils of the law of settlement and paved the way for dealing with that question hereafter? The noble Lord asked if it was fair that this Bill should be sent up from the House of Commons at a period of the Session when their Lordships would have no opportunity of investigating the subject? That was a plausible argument, but there was still a fortnight or three weeks of the Session to run, and that would give ample time to consider the Bill in Committee. And any investigation of a subject of this magnitude must be made by their Lordships individually; they had great opportunities, as landowners, of considering the subject, and the advantage of reading the results of the inquiries instituted by the House of Commons, that had thrown a flood of light on the question for some years past. If any subject had been fully investigated this was one. He did not refer to the Committee appointed ten or twelve years ago, but the Committee of 1858, of which Mr. Sotheron Estcourt was Chairman. This Committee did not make any recommendations, but wished to continue the inquiry, and it was re-appointed in the following year, and again in 1860, with the present Duke of Richmond as Chairman. Thus it sat for three successive years, and its recommendations were almost precisely embodied in the present

Bill. Every enactment of the Bill was included in the recommendations of the Committee, with one exception; that was as to the mode of making the assessment for the union charge. The Committee recommended that the population should be taken into account, and, by a strange and difficult process, added to the pounds sterling. This recommendation was, he thought, judiciously avoided in the Bill. With that exception all its recommendations were followed. The noble Lord who moved the rejection of this Bill (Viscount Lifford) spoke of this as the first attempt to upset the parochial system of England, and to introduce the principle of a union rating. This was not the first attempt to upset the parochial system, in any respect whatever. That was done by the Acts of 1846 and 1848. This Bill carried the principle no further, but only altered certain details. The noble Lord spoke of the "fine end of the wedge," but that was introduced by Mr. Charles Buller; when the Bill of 1848 made the assessment for the irremovable poor chargeable to the union, instead of the parishes, the principle was initiated of which the noble Lord complained. Nothing was more unjust than the common fund now that the relief of the irremovable poor was charged on the unions. When the Poor Law was enacted the principle was just and fair; then parishes that contributed a large amount to the rates for their own poor paid a proportionate sum to the union charge. There was a reason for it. The object of the common fund was to provide workhouse accommodation for the poor of the union and the officers, and the parishes that had the largest number of poor contributed the largest share; but the irremovable poor were not the poor of the parishes who contributed the largest sum for their own poor. But those parishes were taxed, while rich parishes were exempted from a charge that justly ought to be imposed on them. There were close parishes with irremovable poor that did not contribute a single farthing to the common fund. That was not just to the ratepayers, nor was it just to the poor. In the union of Radford there were three parishes, one rated at 11s. and the other two at 4s. each, though the rateable value of each parish was almost identical and the number of irremovable poor almost the same. According to union rating each would pay alike; under the parochial system one would pay three times as much as each of the other two. It could not be contended that this was a just principle now the irremovable poor were made chargeable on the union fund. He believed the effect of the measure would be very beneficial, and tend to encourage landowners to increase the number of cottages on their property. There had really been a considerable increase since the Acts of 1846 and 1848. Although he felt that the subject was far from exhausted, he would refrain from trespassing on their Lordships' time by discussing the various points that might be raised, particularly as he knew that full opportunity for discussing these matters would be found in Committee. If their Lordships did divide he hoped there would be such a majority in favour of the second reading as would indicate the concurrence of that House with the opinion, not only of the House of Commons, but also of the boards of guardians who had been applied to on the subject, and who had responded in favour of the Bill by a majority of nine to one.

THE EARL OF CARNARVON thought that, considering the enormous magnitude of the question, and the importance of the points involved in its discussion, it was rather hard of the Government to come to that House and ask their Lordships to read such a Bill a second time on the 23rd of July. It was really impossible to understand and read all the Bills brought up to their Lordships' House at this late period of the Session. Since the 15th instant no less than ten Bills had been brought into their Lordships' House, of which five were brought up from the House of Commons only on the previous evening. He understood that there were absolutely Bills in Government offices which had not yet been laid on the table of the other House of Parliament. He was sorry that his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees had not moved the Resolution which he had been accustomed to move in previous Sessions. He thought that Resolution was a very useful stimulus. Although he was not prepared to give his determined opposition to the provisions of the Bill, he did not think their Lordships should be called upon to deal with a question of such magnitude and importance at so advanced a period of the Session, and he hoped the Government would not persevere with the Bill.

On Question, That ("now") stand part of the Motion? Their Lordships divided: Contents, 40; Not-Contents, 31; Majority, 9.

NAVAL MEDICAL SUPPLEMENTAL FUND SOCIETY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that his attention had been called to this subject that afternoon by a petition from some widows of naval medical officers, which he had declined to present because he thought that the petitioners asked for some concessions to which they had no claim. There were, however, some things for which they were anxious, which perhaps the noble Duke might be disposed to concede. One was that a trustee of this fund should be appointed to represent their interests; and the other that it should be understood—as he believed was the case—that the Admiralty would under this Bill have power to increase the pensions of medical officers, if the fund would bear it, to an amount above £26 13s. 4d.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that he was anxious to do all he could to satisfy the wishes of the annuitants, and at the same time protect the public interests. He would communicate with the noble Lord, and see what arrangement could be made to secure those objects.

LORD CHELMSFORD felt very much indebted to the noble Duke for the answer which he had given.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next.

ECCLESIASTICAL DILAPIDATIONS BILL.

BILL PRESENTED. FIRST READING.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON rose to call the attention of the House to the subject of ecclesiastical dilapidations. He said he was extremely unwilling to trouble their Lordships at that hour with any lengthened statement, but the noble Viscount (Viscount Dungannon) having frequently asked what course the right rev. Bench intended to pursue on the subject of dilapidations, he had thought it best, even at that late period of the Session, to ask their Lordships to read for a first time the Bill he was about to lay on the Table. The subject was one of very great importance, and ought no longer to be delayed. Some apology was, no doubt, due to the noble Viscount and to the clergy for the delay which had taken place already with regard to the Bill; but that delay had in a great measure arisen from the extremely complicated nature of the subject with which they had had to deal. How complicated the subject was would be easily understood from the fact that there were no less than 9,000 residences with respect to which this question of dilapidations arose; and the number of these residences was increasing at an average of 125 every year. The last time a survey was taken there were only 6,000 such residences; but during the last twenty-five years they had risen to 9,000 in number, and there was every prospect that they would increase. Their Lordships were aware that by the common law, and by the canon law, every incumbent was bound to keep his residence in repair; but it was only by Ecclesiastical Courts that this duty could be enforced. But the state of the Ecclesiastical Courts was not such as could be desired, and this part of the law was practically a dead letter—it was almost impossible for any ecclesiastical authorities to enforce the law. The result was that, when persons had small means, there was a strong temptation to put off this duty from year to year; and it continually happened that the death of the incumbent, or his removal to another incumbency, took place before the dilapidations were repaired. The only remedy then was a proceeding at common law by an action for damages against the incumbent, if he were living, or the heir, if he were dead. A reference had to be made, and three surveyors had to be employed, one for each of the parties, and a third as referee. In different parts of the country surveyors proceeded on different principles of valuation; they took different views as to what dilapidations were, and the result was the greatest confusion and uncertainty. Moreover, when all this had been done, it constantly happened that there were no assets wherewith to defray the expense of the repairs. The successor in all cases was under the disagreeable necessity either of proceeding against persons who were often of small means, or of putting up with the loss and repairing the residence at his own expense. The property even of patrons was much diminished; it was a great hardship upon those who were appointed to benefices, and a still greater injury was done to the parish from the degeneracy in value of these incumbencies, and the lessened inducements held out to clergymen to undertake the cure, when they must make a considerable outlay, and perhaps become hampered with debt. By the present Bill power was lodged in the hands of the Bishop to insist upon the execution of necessary repairs. The machinery which it was thought most expedient to employ was already in existence—namely, the Board of Queen Anne's Bounty. In some instances a charge would have to be made upon the living, for which Queen Anne's Bounty would furnish the funds. A report from surveyors would have to be made, certifying that the repairs were properly executed. In all cases there must be a power to insist upon repairs being executed. In favour of the Bill it might be said that it was acceptable to a large body of the parochial clergy being based on the recommendations of a Committee of Convocation: but it was extremely desirable that during the recess an opportunity might be given to the Bishops, archdeacons, and rural deans, to have the subject fully discussed. It was further of the highest importance that the clergy themselves should consider what improvements might be made in the measure, in order that they might be introduced into a future Bill. He sincerely hoped that before the end of next Session this great evil might be remedied. The right rev. Prelate then presented a Bill for the Relief of Ecclesiastical Persons in respect of the Maintenance and Repair of Houses of Residence and other Buildings; and moved that it be read 1st.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, it would afford the greatest satisfaction to the clergy to know that this Bill had been laid upon the Table of the House, not with a view of progressing further with it this Session, but of giving them an opportunity of considering its details, and considering what further or other remedies might be applied to the case. The subject was one which very strongly required legislative interference, and personally he begged to express himself highly indebted to the right rev. Prelate, for the great trouble and pains he had taken in preparing a measure which, if it remedied the evil, would earn for him the gratitude of the clergy.

LORD REDESDALE asked out of what fund the expense of the machinery for working the Bill, such as the surveyors and other officers, would be defrayed?

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, that a fund would have to be raised in each diocese, for which it was intended that the archdeacons and rural deans should arrange, by means of an assessment on the value of the several benefices.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE thought that certain cases of dilapidations which were omitted ought to be included in the Bill, and that there would be a difficulty in defining what were ecclesiastical dilapidations. He felt that thanks were due to the right rev. Prelate and his right rev. brethren of the province of Canterbury for the pains which they had taken, and he hoped that in the next Session a satisfactory arrangement would be made.

(In the Committee.)

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would withdraw Clause 57, which might possibly admit of some modification.

Clauses 58 and 59 agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that Clauses 58 and 59 would complete the first Bill, but he wished to make some explanations with regard to the clauses relating to the land tax, which had passed through inadvertence. He thought the Committee would agree that the clauses would prove useful; but if any hon. Gentleman wished to enter into discussion upon them, he would move that the Bill be recommitted for that purpose. The Committee would be aware that every parish was charged with a fixed quota of land tax, and also that in almost every parish there was a great increase in the value of property. That gave rise to a difficulty, because in parishes where the property was large and the quota small it was hardly possible to express the amount by a rate, and a considerably larger sum had to be raised than was necessary for the payment of the year. In these cases the money was not collected annually but periodically, and held over to meet the annual payments. It was obvious that that was inconvenient, and that it would be very desirable to provide a simple and efficient machinery, by which facilities should be given for redeeming the tax. That, however, was not the object of the clause, and it might be said that these were exceptional cases. But there were many parishes which were largely increasing in value, which could not be considered exceptional, and the operation of the law was very inconvenient as regarded them. In these cases a surplus was raised each year over the quota, and by the Act of 6 George IV. it was provided that that surplus should be held over and paid in aid of the assessment of the next year. That gave rise to great inconvenience. It necessitated a minute examination of the collections, and in many cases it was impossible to obtain a satisfactory result. Taking the parish of Brixton, for instance, it was found that the assessment between 1828 and 1855 collectively exceeded the quota by £30,201.

LORD HARRY VANE: In whose hands do those sums remain?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: In the hands of the collector; but he made no charge against any one—the fault was in the system. What was proposed was to provide a means of legally, certainly, and rapidly, applying the surplus to the redemption of the tax. In the first place, the surplus land tax in every parish was to be paid to the Receiver General of the Inland Revenue, and by him into the Bank of England to the credit of the Commissioners for the reduction of the National Debt to the land tax account, and when the amount standing to the credit of any parish was sufficient for the redemption of such tax the Commissioners were to certify the fact in the proper quarter. He would not give an unjust description of the scheme if he were to say that, without interfering with the discretion of the Land Tax Commissioners, or the local machinery with respect to assessment and collection, the effect of it would be to make the Board of Inland Revenue responsible for the management of those surpluses, for their due recovery, and for their application in redemption of the tax. Any remarks that hon. Gentleman had to make might, he thought, be very properly made when the Bill was recommitted.

MR. HENLEY said, it was a matter for much consideration whether the present holders of property ought to pay, however small, any sum for the redemption of the land tax for the benefit of their successors. He was afraid that if the proposed machinery were set up, the collector would be bound to be much more minute and troublesome in his collections than he was at present. He wanted to know, supposing an estate were divided, and the land tax to be apportioned among the separated portions, who was to have the power of apportioning it?

LORD HARRY VANE said, that the object which the Bill sought to effect was a very desirable one. He believed that within each parish there was a power of re-apportioning the land tax. If the Bill should come into operation, he did not think that the Land Tax Commissioners were quite capable of giving effect to its provisions, and he thought that a permanent officer should be appointed who should attend to the different interests involved under the Bill.

MR. BARROW said, that it appeared to him very desirable that when there was a surplus it should be duly accounted for, and employed in the way proposed by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, that according to the plan of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer those who had redeemed their land tax would have no benefit at all. He approved of the object of the measure, but the question was whether the mode proposed was the best and most equitable in which to accomplish it. He thought the proper course would be to have a Select Committee previous to legislation.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must admit there was great weight in the objection, that the collection of the tax, where only small sums were to be collected, might be unduly pressed. At the same time, he thought the general conduct of the Commissioners of the Inland Revenue did not expose them to that charge. It would be observed that he did not propose to meddle at all with the present machinery of the collection—it was only a plan to take care of the surplus after it was collected.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT reminded the Committee that at present the collection was made without any public charge, the collectors considering themselves reimbursed by holding the balances. If the plan were adopted all the collectors must be paid. He thought the clause would create a great deal of difficulty throughout the country, and upon the whole it would be better that the Bill should be re-committed.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask one question. Suppose a gentleman had been paying in surpluses for twenty or thirty years, and then proposed to redeem the land tax, would he get any benefit from the surpluses?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would in this way—when the surpluses had reached a certain sum the land tax would be reduced to that amount, and of course it would be reduced in the case of each landholder.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he would beg to ask what would be done with the surpluses while they were accumulating, and further, whether it was to be left to the discretion of the Commissioners when the redemption would take place?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: The surpluses would remain in the hands of the National Debt Commissioners. The point at which redemption should take place was fixed in the Bill.

Clause 37 (Proceedings for enforcing payment of succession and legacy duties),

MR. BOVILL complained that the power of appeal on the assessment of the tax was too narrow.

MR. PHILIPPS said, there was nothing in the Bill of a mitigatory character. Everything pressed against the landed interest. It seemed as if the right hon. Gentleman was animated with a feeling of animosity towards the landed interest.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had no objection to the Amendment of the clause to meet the objections of the hon. and learned Member for Guildford.

MR. HENLEY asked what was the necessity for this clause, and why the law should be made more stringent than it now was? He should like to know what inconvenience the Crown had sustained by the law as it now stood?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that the clause would substitute a simple and cheap process for the cumbrous and expensive one of proceeding by information, as at present, and would be beneficial not to the Crown only, but to the payers of the duty.

MR. BOVILL proposed the insertion of words by which the power of appeal would be given both for and against the Crown, as the case might be.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, it was not intended to take away the power of appeal, and, therefore, he would consent to introduce words into the clause which would secure that object.

MR. BOVILL also proposed the insertion of words which would make the Crown liable on the cost of proceedings where proceedings against any party were discharged.

Words added.

On the Motion that Clause 37 of the Bill as amended stand Clause 1 of a second Bill,

MR. WALPOLE said, when the succession duties were first introduced the right hon. Gentleman intimated his intention to introduce a law to extend the principle of the Act to corporate property. But nothing more had been heard of such a Bill. His own opinion was that it was not right an exception should be made in favour of any property, and, therefore, he wished to ask his right hon. Friend what were his intentions in regard to the matter?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was true that when he was a member of the Earl of Aberdeen's Government he had stated his intention of considering the propriety of subjecting corporate property to duty. He was not able to consider the subject before leaving office. The question was taken up by his successor, but it was thought the sum likely to be realized was too small to justify action on the part of the Government. It was calculated that not more than £5,000 a year would be got from a duty on corporate property, and, therefore, the matter was not pressed. He was not quite satisfied that so small a sum would be derived from corporate property, but he had not been able to turn his attention sufficiently to the subject to arrive at any definite conclusion. He fully admitted the principle, however, that corporate property ought to be subject, in common with other property, to the payment of duty.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, the longer the discussion lasted the more he was satisfied of the impropriety of going on with legislation at that period of the Session. The succession duties had been in operation for nearly ten years, and there ought to have been an inquiry into their operation. His own opinion was that they operated most unjustly and unequally. He urged that the proposal should be withdrawn—that next Session an inquiry should be made both into the operation of the law and into the state of corporate property, with a view to taxation, and then to legislate with a mature consideration of the whole matter.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that the right

The Solicitor General

hon. Gentleman must feel the difficulty of taxing corporate property, for how could they assess the value of successions on property which never lapsed? If taxed at all, he thought the tax must operate like the land tax. All which had passed convinced him that he was right in opposing the original Bill.

Motion agreed to.

Clause 38 (Certain provisions in 22 & 23 Vict. c. 21, relating to summary proceedings in England, to extend to Ireland),

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT asked whether the succession duties clauses were to form one Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER stated that it was intended to have three separate Bills, of which the clauses under discussion relating to the legacy and succession duties were to form one.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT asked whether it was intended to read the new Bills a second time?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the next stage of the Bills would be the Report.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, it no doubt might be argued that the principle of all these three Bills was discussed when the Inland Revenue Bill was read a second time; but he thought the course proposed to be taken a very inconvenient one.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON observed that the course they were taking was a most unusual and highly objectionable one. He should like to hear from the Chairman whether there were precedents for such a course, and, if so, he should like also to know whether there were good reasons for following such precedents on that occasion. Clauses were to be submitted to them which made very important changes in the Succession Duty Act, and they were told that the next stage would be the Report. He asked whether it was fair to introduce a Bill of that nature at the end of the Session? Financially the Succession Duty Act was a failure, as it deserved to be, and it was detested by the country; and now they were asked at that period of the year to pass a new Bill on the subject.

MR. MASSEY said, that the Committee was acting in pursuance of the instructions of the House to divide the Bill, and it was not proper for the Committee to question those instructions. The course taken was not without precedent. In consequence of the instruction of the House to the Committee to divide the Bill into one or more Bills ; he had referred to the course of proceedings, and he found distinct precedents on their records. In pursuance of those precedents he had ventured to take the liberty of guiding the Committee.

MR. AYRTON said, he was surprised to hear right hon. Gentlemen opposite question the power to divide Bills in Committee, when that was the very course they themselves recommended in the case of the paper duties.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT said, they were not disputing the power of dividing the Bills, but the way in which it was proposed to be done. That point, however, had been decided from the Chair, and he had only to ask whether the Bills would afterwards go through their stages, as if they had been introduced as separate Bills ?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would remind the Committee that the Resolutions on which these clauses were based were passed on the 28th of June, and that they had been delayed only that hon. Members might have a full opportunity of considering them. No objection was taken to the Resolutions when they passed, and it was not necessary, therefore, to go back to the earlier stages to discuss the new Bills. He wished to remind the Committee that he was not responsible for the division of the Bill, which was done in consequence of instructions from the House, in order that the House of Lords might have an opportunity of giving its attention to each of the subjects separately.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he did not question the right to divide the Bills, but he doubted the propriety of dealing with subjects so delicate at that period. He would, therefore, take the sense of the Committee as to the propriety of proceeding further.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the whole object of the present clause was to extend to Ireland certain provisions that had been found to work well in Scotland in the collection of the duties. When they came to the clause relating to the succession duties that would be the proper time for the discussion which his right hon. Friend wished to raise.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, his right hon. Friend did not propose to oppose the present clause, but he objected to going on with the Bill, which in the 40th Clause reversed a decision of the House of Lords.

MR. HENLEY said, they were getting into position in which he had all along expected they would find themselves. The Resolutions on which the present clauses were founded passed through the House without discussion. At the end of the Session they saw an Omnibus Bill brought into the House, and before they knew what they were about it was proposed to make two or three tax carts out of it. He was afraid that at that period of the Session they would hardly be able to pass these measures in a satisfactory shape.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to express his thanks to the Chancellor of the Exchequer for having so divided the Bill as not to preclude the House of Lords from dealing with it. As the House had decided to proceed, he thought the best course was now to go on, but he hoped the House would never again place itself in a similar position. At the proper time, however, he would cordially vote with the right hon. Member for Droitwich against the succession clauses.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, they were told when the Resolutions were passed that the right time for discussion would be when the clauses were before them. They had now those clauses before them, and he hoped no more time would be lost in discussing the present clause, which was of comparatively little importance, and that they would proceed without delay to take up the clause relating to the succession duty, which really was of vital importance.

Clause 38 ordered to stand a clause of the new Bill.

Clause 39 (No return of Probate Duty to be made for voluntary Debts).

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER explained that the clause taken in connection with the Amendment upon the paper had had for its object to render liable to probate duty voluntary debts to be paid upon the death of the person who contracted them, or payable under any instrument which should not have been bona fide delivered to the donee three months before the death of such person. Debts contracted as portions for younger children or by way of marriage settlement were not considered "voluntary debts" in law, but debts for a consideration, and were, therefore, not included within the operation of the clause. What they wished to touch was debts contracted for the purpose of evading the probate duty. The term "voluntary debt" was, therefore, confined to two cases—one where it should be expressly payable on the death of the person who had contracted the obligation, and the other where it should be payable under an instrument which had not been delivered during the lifetime of the deceased. In order to secure bond fides in the case of an instrument, it was required that the instrument should be delivered three months before the death of the person who had contracted the obligation.

MR. BOVILL said, the effect of the clause would be to tax a residuary legatee for property that had actually gone to another. The object of the clause was to prevent evasion of the payment of duty. That object should, therefore, be clearly explained. He proposed that the words to be added should be "any voluntary debt contracted for the purpose of evading payment of the duty."

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, the effect would be to neutralize the clause, for constant litigation would be necessary to decide what was and what was not a debt contracted for the purpose of evading the duty.

MR. NEWDEGATE asked, whether the clause would touch property given to a son in the lifetime of a father?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the clause had no relation to such a case.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS said, he would not oppose the clause, provided the duty were not leviable on the estate of a person who might have died after a date to be fixed by the Bill. The clause, as it stood, would have a retrospective effect where persons died twelve months back, and the duty had not been yet levied.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he would fix the day from which the clause should take effect for the 28th of June, 1861, when the Resolutions on the subject were introduced.

Clause as amended agreed to and ordered to stand part of the new Bill.

Clause 40,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the object of the clause was merely to give effect to what he believed to be the intention of the House in passing the Succession Duty Act in 1853. The principle upon which the Act was framed was that the duty should be paid on the whole estate that was liberated by the death of its possessor, and passed into other hands. But the House of Lords had decided judicially, though after long discussion and deliberation, that where a successor had been previously to the death of his predecessor possessed of an estate, which at the predecessor's death he was bound to relinquish, then he was only called on to pay the difference between the estate he received and that he relinquished. That decision did not, in the opinion of the Government, give effect to the intention of the House in passing the Act. As the law stood, supposing A was entitled on the death of B, his uncle, to £2,000 a year, and that A, possessing some money, bought an annuity of £2,000 upon the joint lives of himself and his uncle B, when B died A might claim to be exempt from paying the succession duty, and, according to the decision of the House of Lords he would not be liable. So that it would be in the power of persons by purchasing annuities to evade the operation of the Act. That was a state of the law which required a remedy. The inheritance into which the man came was the entire inheritance, upon which, according to the view of the Government, it was perfectly plain the duty ought to be paid. He was anxious to have the opinion of the Committee on the subject, and if they thought more time was required for its consideration, he would not press it farther at that time.

SIR FRANCIS GOLDSMID said, that the object of the clause was to repeal the effect of a decision of the House of Lords. He presumed, as the reason for introducing the clause, that the Inland Revenue Commissioners must have persuaded the right hon. Gentleman that the law, as settled by that decision, would enable persons to evade the payment of succession duties in cases in which it was contemplated by the Act that they should be paid. He contended, however, that if the clause were allowed to pass, it would cover cases which did not fall within the reasons stated by the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and in which it would be clearly unfair that the tax should be imposed. The effect of the 38th Clause of the Succession Duty Act was to impose a tax upon any person becoming entitled to property in consequence of the death of another, the amount of tax being proportioned partly to the relationship of the parties, and also to the amount of property itself. The clause, however, proposed to impose a duty not in accordance with that principle; but the effect would be to tax a man whose income increased by £500 a year to the extent of £1,000 a year; in some cases to tax a person whose income did not increase at all, and in other cases to tax a man twice on different events happening in respect of the same property. No plea founded on the ground of evasion could justify the Committee agreeing to a clause which would operate unjustly. He should move that the clause be omitted.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL contended that it was unreasonable to make a deduction from an estate when it fell to a man because that man had been previously in receipt of an annuity, for which he had paid no tax whatever. Yet that was the decision of the House of Lords in the case of Lord Braybrooke, and in the case of the Attorney General v. Sibthorpe. So that if a man in expectation of a large estate, and having property of his own, used that property in the purchase of an annuity of the same annual amount as the rents of the estate and determinable when he came into possession of the estate, he was not bound to pay succession duty on the estate because he lost the annuity. That was not the rule of law with regard to the legacy duty. He did not mean to dispute the decision of the House of Lords in law; but, supposing their judgment to be right, the conclusion to which they must come was that the House had failed to express its own intention. He, therefore, hoped the Committee would not be led away by any appeal to its modesty as to interfering with a decision of the House of Lords, so as to prevent it from correcting what was after all its own mistake.

SIR HUGH CAIRNS contended that the Amendment was entirely unnecessary and very complex, and could only be applicable to whimsical and extravagant cases. At the same time, he would remind the Committee that they need not discuss the remedies for simply evasive practices, because the Act as originally passed contained the singular and remarkable clause, giving power to the Judges to assess the tax where it appeared to them that it was intended to evade the Act of Parliament. It was not either for the Government or the House to decide what their own intention was in passing the Act, but to take the plain meaning of the words. That Act was intended to tax beneficial succession, and the only definition of a beneficial interest was to consider what a man got as compared with what he lost. That was what the House of Lords had done in its decisions, and what the Government now proposed to reverse by the clause. He admitted that the legacy duty was not levied in the same way, but the reason was that the Legacy Duty Act did not make the provision that was contained in the Succession Duties Act.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the case was a very narrow one. He would state a case which had happened in his own experience. A father gave his son during his lifetime a portion of his estate, and at his death left him the rest. He supposed the Government would not make that heir pay for the whole. But suppose the father did not give him the acres, but a rent-charge upon the acres—why should he pay in the last case more than the other? He thought a man ought not to pay for what he had not got.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER remarked, that, notwithstanding what had fallen from the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, he must say that they were bound to legislate for whimsical and extravagant cases, because there was nothing so whimsical or extravagant that certain persons would not do to evade payment of the duty. He had listened to the criticism of the clause which had taken place, and he hoped the Government would profit from it in any future effort they might make to legislate on this subject. After what had passed, however, and in accordance with his declaration when the Bill was introduced, it was not his wish to press upon the House at that period of the Session any provisions that might be thought open to objection. He would, therefore, move that the clause be negatived; but he hoped at some future time to bring in a Bill on the subject.

Clause negatived.

MR. CAYLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer spoke of bringing in another Bill. Did he mean this Session or next?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he meant, as a matter of course, next Session.

On the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the title to the Bill, composed of Clauses 37, 38, and 39, was agreed to.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he would propose Clause 15 (relating to wine licences), with the view of making it into a separate Bill. He did not anticipate any discussion.

MR. AYRTON intimated that there would be a long discussion. [Laughter.]

He meant that it was a long and difficult subject.

House resumed.

Report, That the Committee had divided the Bill into three Bills.

NEW ZEALAND.

QUESTION.

LORD ALFRED CHURCHILL said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary for the Colonies, What is the nature of the Despatches received by the last Mail from New Zealand in respect to the renewal of hostilities?

MR. CHICHESTER FORTESCUE said, the news received by the last Mail from New Zealand was hopeful, though uncertain. An entire cessation of hostilities had for the present taken place, as a season of the year had come round when they could not be conveniently carried on. The Governor was engaged in operations during this season which he hoped would lead to a general acknowledgment of the Queen's authority, but at the same time he could not speak with certainty.

SAILORS' HOMES.—QUESTION.

QUESTION.

SIR HENRY TRACEY said, he wished to ask the Secretary to the Admiralty, If it be true that the portion of the Grant voted by the House "for the encouragement of Sailors' Homes in the neighbourhood of Dockyards" has been withdrawn from the Cork Sailors' Home, on the ground that that Home was not in the neighbourhood of a Dockyard; and, if it is withdrawn, upon what principle it has for previous years been given? He also wished to inquire if there are not other instances of a portion of that Grant being continued to any other Sailors' Home or Homes not in the neighbourhood of Dockyards?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the Admiralty had thought it their duty to withhold the Grant from the Cork Sailors' Home, because, from the Report of the Commander-in-Chief on the station, it appeared not to be made use of largely by the sailors of Her Majesty's fleet. With regard to the second part of the question, he had to state that he knew of no Sailors' Home receiving a Grant which was not in the neighbourhood of a Dockyard, with the exception of the Home at Falmouth, which many sailors from the Coastguard ships made use of.

OPERATIVE MINERS.—QUESTION.

MR. KERSHAW said, he would begin to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he will object to commend Her Majesty to issue Her Royal Commission to inquire into the moral and sanitary state of the Operative Miners in Cornwall and Devonshire?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he had already stated in general terms that he thought it desirable that a Commission should be issued to inquire into the state of the Miners in mineral mines; but the question was one mainly of time, and he should not wish to pledge himself as to the particular period when the Commission could be issued.

THE POLISH DESPATCHES.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, When the Papers relating to Poland will be laid upon the Table of the House? Whether the Despatch (from Viscount Palmerston to Prince Talleyrand), which contains the statement that "the rights of the Czar are incontestible," will appear with the other Papers; and, if not, whether that Despatch is authentic? And what are the reasons which influence Her Majesty's Government in withholding its contents from the House?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, that as the correspondence in question took place at a time when his noble Friend at the head of the Government was Secretary of State for the Foreign Department, he had found it necessary to consult his noble Friend both as to which were the papers that it would be necessary to begin with, and also as to whether it would be necessary to add any other papers. The documents referred to were contained in volumes of former years, and his noble Friend had not yet read them sufficiently to give an opinion. As soon as he had done so, no doubt he would communicate to him (Lord John Russell).

THE TURNER GALLERY.

QUESTION.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he wished to ask the Chief Commissioner of Works, If any plans have been prepared under his sanction for erecting a building behind the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square for the reception of the "Turner Pictures;" and, if so, whether it is in contemplation to commence the execution of any such Plans without previously obtaining the direct sanction of Parliament?

MR. COWPER said, that the improvements recently made in the National Gallery were so arranged as to aid any large plan which might hereafter be adopted for extending the building of the National Gallery to the rear over the site now occupied by the barracks and St. Martin's Workhouse. He certainly had in his possession plans showing how buildings might be extended in that direction so as to provide accommodation for all the pictures, both ancient and modern, which were now or might hereafter be under the charge of the Trustees of the National Gallery; and a single wing might at any time be built over a portion of the barrack-yard, so as to accommodate the Turner pictures; these plans were under consideration, together with other plans, and as the Government had yet come to no decision on the subject he was unable to give any information as to what steps might hereafter be taken.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he would now ask whether the right hon. Gentleman will give an assurance that no steps in that direction will be taken without the express sanction and authority of Parliament?

MR. COWPER said, he must entirely decline to enter into any pledge with the noble Lord. He could tell the noble Lord that he did not contemplate doing such a thing as erecting a building without the direct sanction of Parliament, but he did not conceive that the noble Lord had any right to get up and ask for a pledge that he would not do that which was very unlikely, and which was not in contemplation.

PORTO NOVO.

QUESTION.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he will lay upon the Table of the House a Copy of any Despatches connected with the attack on Porto Novo in the month of May last?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, it was not his intention to lay the whole of the papers upon the Table; but, as far as the Foreign Office was concerned, if he (the hon. Member) would move for any particular despatch it would be produced.

VOL. CLXIV. [THIRD SERIES.]

SUEZ CANAL—GUANO.—QUESTION.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether Mr. Colquhoun, the English Consul General in Egypt, together with the English Consul in Alexandria and other gentlemen, have lately (on the 29th June) visited the works of the Suez Canal, and had expressed his satisfaction with what he had seen and heard there; and whether such approval is to be understood to be qualified by the condition that forced labour should not be employed on the works of the canal, and that the obligations in that respect of the Pacha of Egypt towards the Porte be faithfully fulfilled?

LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he had seen the report alluded to by the hon. Member in a foreign newspaper, but he had received no information on the subject from the Consul General. The Consul General had informed him of his intention of visiting the canal, but had not sent any information as to the result. He would take that opportunity of answering a question which had been put to him a short time previous respecting the exportation of Guano. The question was whether the Peruvian Government had opened the Guano trade? He had received no information to that effect; on the contrary, his information was that, the late contract having expired, it was their intention to invite tenders for a new contract. What Her Majesty's Government had asked was that the Guano should be sold at a certain price, and that the trade should be opened to all nations.

THE GREAT TASMANIA.

QUESTION.

CAPTAIN ARCHDALL said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether an inquiry has taken place into the conduct of the Officers in Calcutta that signed the Inspection Report of the Great Tasmania, previous to her departure from England, who were charged with culpability by the verdict of the Coroner's Inquest which sat upon the bodies of the soldiers who died on board that ship on her voyage home from India, and, if so, if he can state to the House what the result of the inquiry has been?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, an inquiry had taken place at Calcutta, and the result was that the evidence which had been given before the Coroner's Jury in this country had been impugned in seven ral material particulars. Before the inquiry had been instituted the Officer at Calcutta, who was in some respects responsible for what had occurred, had been removed from his command, and had not since been appointed to any other situation. The Officer in charge of the European Troops on board the vessel could only be tried by Court Martial, and that being a process by which it was deemed very little important information could be elicited it had not been adopted.

INDIAN RAILWAY STOCK.—COMMITTEE.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had stated some time ago that it would be necessary for the Government before the end of the Session to take powers to raise money for railway purposes in India, in the event of the railway companies not raising sufficient funds to prosecute their undertakings. He gave notice last night that it was the intention of the Government on Thursday next to ask the House to go into Committee for that purpose, and in order that there might be no mistake as to the object of the Government, he gave notice that the Committee would sit to consider the propriety of authorizing the Secretary of State for India to raise money for railway purposes. He found, however, that the words of his notice differed from those under which money for the same object had before been obtained, and that the proposed stock might suffer a consequent depreciation. He therefore moved that the Notice which he had given should be discharged; and he had to inform the House that he would, as the first business on Thursday evening, bring forward a Resolution on the subject. He wished to make this alteration in the notice publicly, because although it was a change in the form the substance was identically the same as that of the previous notice. It was most desirable the stock so raised should be of the same nature as the old stock.

Order discharged.

PUBLIC EMPLOYMENT (INDIA).

RESOLUTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he rose pursuant to notice, to advocate the expediency of enabling British subjects born in India to compete on the same footing as other British subjects for public employment under the Crown. Previous to 1833 very little attention had been paid to education in British India, but a clause having been inserted in the 3rd and 4th William IV., to the effect that no Native of India, or any natural-born subject of His Majesty, should, by reason only of his religion, place of birth, or colour, be held to be disabled from holding office under the East India Company, a great stimulus was given to the Natives of India to fit themselves for public employment. Schools were accordingly established throughout the country and subsequently cottages were founded, and in 1845, when Lord Hardinge was Governor General, there were under the Government of Bengal no less than fifty-one educational institutions. In that year Lord Hardinge issued a Proclamation, in which it was set forth that in every possible case a preference would be given in the selection of candidates for employment in the public service to those who had been educated in the institutions thus established. Numbers had flocked to the schools and colleges throughout the country, stimulated by that assurance, and they did find employment. In 1854 three Natives of Bengal were sent to England by the Government to be educated at the London University. One of them, Chuckerbutty, carried away the gold medal from all competitors, and was now physician to the medical college at Calcutta. Others trod in his steps at their own expense or that of their relatives. Ten students came over from Madras, and three from Bengal, all of whom obtained their degrees in medicine and their diplomas in surgery, not to speak of other honours, and, as rewards for their professional acquirements, were appointed by the Directors of the East India Company to their regular gradation Military Medical Service as assistant surgeons, and can, therefore, rise with their European brethren to the highest grades of the medical service. Such was the state of things when the Act of 1858 was passed transferring the Government of India to the Crown, and when Her Gracious Majesty declared in a Proclamation that it was her will, as far as might be, that all her subjects, of whatever race or creed, should be fairly and impartially admitted to offices in the Royal service, the duties of which they might be qualified by their education, ability, and integrity faithfully to discharge, and to give the Natives the means of reaching the highest intellectual status, Universities were established in Bengal, Madras, and Bombay, with the usual facilities, curriculum and professional staff, and with power to confer degrees. Last November the Indian students in England saw an official advertisement that on the 18th of February there would be a competitive examination for the office of assistant surgeon in the Royal Army. Those who considered themselves qualified made the necessary application at the War Office, and were all appointed to go up for examination at the period specified in the advertisement. They even got tickets of admission, but two days before the examination they received a communication from Dr. Gibson, Director General of the Medical Department, requesting them to call at his office. They obeyed, and were informed that for the future all employment in Her Majesty's medical service would be for general service, and not for local service in India, and that consequently they could not be allowed to compete. Equally astonished and disappointed they remonstrated, calling attention to the fact that many Natives were now in the regular medical service of the Crown in India, but their remonstrances were in vain, they were told that such was the decision; but how that decision arose at the eleventh hour he (Colonel Sykes) could not say. Matters remained in this state until he presented a petition from Dr. Thompson, one of the rejected candidates to the House, in which he complained of the injustice, of his prospects being blighted, and the very large sum he had expended upon his education in India and England being wasted. In consequence of this petition and of the question raised by him in that House it was decided to send two of the candidates—Dr. Thompson and Dr. Goodall—before a medical board, consisting of Dr. Gibson, Dr. Liddle, and Sir Ronald Martin. These gentlemen reported in general terms that it was their deliberate opinion, founded on experience, that the Native and mixed races of India and other tropical countries would never be able to sustain for any length of time the climate of our northern regions; and they added that Dr. Thompson and Dr. Goodall, though without any marked bodily defect, were constitutionally unfit for service in the various climates in which the British army was called upon to serve. Now, the fact was that Dr. Goodall was not an Asiatic, for his father was an officer in the army, and his mother was a daughter of an half-caste; so that he was three-fourths European. He was sent home in childhood, and had lived nine years in Scotland, where he was educated without his health suffering in the slightest degree from the climate. Dr. Thompson, similarly, had passed the last winter in England, one of the most severe experienced for many years past, without a day's illness. He (Colonel Sykes) would beg to read to the House an extract from a letter addressed to him by a general officer of the name of Fraser residing at Pisa, a perfect stranger, but who had read an account of Mr. Thompson's case in the public papers. He stated that he had formerly commanded the 78th Highlanders, and had for many years in the regiment four Natives of tropical climates, and they were amongst the healthiest men in his regiment. If Indians were to be refused public employment, on the ground that they were unfit to serve in cold climates, the same objection should exclude from the service of the Crown the sons of civil and military servants born in India. Moreover, if Natives were not to be employed in cold climates on account of their health breaking down, there is sad experience that European troops should not be sent to a tropical climate for the same reason. But he altogether discarded the question of colour or race; he called upon the House to affirm the principle that Her Majesty's subjects, whether black or white, or of any intermediate hue, were entitled to the civil rights of other British subjects. The injustice done in excluding these Natives of India from competition for employment in the public service was not confined to the candidates themselves. He had a letter from the father of one, and who was also the uncle of another of these gentlemen stating that he had been ruined by sending his son and nephew to England, on the faith of an Act of Parliament and the Queen's Proclamation. It had cost him from 10,000 to 12,000 rupees, and he could not believe that a British Parliament and a British public would give their consent to a wrong so flagrant. If Natives of India were admitted to compete there was no necessity to send them to Canada or other cold climates. As a mere question of humanity, it was necessary to have acclimatized persons as medical officers to the European troops in India, because tropical diseases could only be successfully treated by those who had acquired considerable experience with regard to them. Ten per cent of the strength of English regiments sent to India died within the first year after arrival, chiefly from a want of knowledge on the part of the surgeons who had accompanied the regiments from Europe as to the treatment of tropical diseases, and as they acquired that knowledge the percentage of deaths fell to 7, 6, 5, and even less per cent annually. On the ground, therefore, of humanity, they should have a permanent medical service in India, thoroughly acquainted with and competent to deal with tropical diseases. He looked with some anxiety to the consequences of disappointing the expectations which had been held out to the Natives of India? We were spending £279,000 a year in educating the people of that country, and with what object? Attaining a high intellectual standard, and feeling that they had the rights of British subjects, it was fatuous to believe there would not be discontent, disgust, and resentment, if the Natives were debarred from serving the Crown anywhere, or if confined to India, that their progress was limited to subordinate rank and paltry salaries of a few pounds per mensem. They would look forward as they had a right to do, to gradation rise in the service of the Crown, and it was his earnest hope that the Secretary of State for India would make such arrangements as would open to the Natives such a system of gradation rise in the medical and other services of India. He asked him to fulfil to the Natives those promises which were held out to them by the Act of Parliament and the Queen's Proclamation. He begged to move the Resolutions:—

Sir Charles Wood

"That on all occasions when Candidates are invited to compete for public employment under the Crown, British Subjects born in India should be allowed to compete on the same footing as other British Subjects."

MR. LAYARD said, he rose to second the Motion. The question was one of very great importance. It was twofold, first whether or not the subjects of Her Majesty the Queen, born in India, should be allowed to compete for employment in the public service, and, secondly, whether the good faith of this country should be maintained. He had presented a Petition from one of these gentlemen (Mr. Colah) belonging to that race who chiefly devoted themselves to mercantile pursuits, and were amongst the most intelligent and industrious of the people in India—the Parsees. That gentleman came to England with the object of competing for the medical service of the army. He passed the College of Surgeons in London, and the College of Physicians at Aberdeen, but when he presented himself for the competitive examination amongst the candidates for employment in the army he was told that, being a Native of India, he could not be allowed to compete. He remonstrated, and the War Office so far gave way that they said they would allow him to compete if he chose to serve as an army surgeon at Sierra Leone. He replied, with great dignity, that he was prepared to take service in any part of Her Majesty's dominions to which his duty might call him; but that he declined to compete if any conditions not authorized by the usual regulations were attached to his employment. It was no use talking of the constitutional unfitness of Natives of India to serve in northern climates; they might as well restrict the competition of Europeans for service in India because Englishmen were known to complain of their livers there. In the Queen's Proclamation the words were most distinct. There was no qualification as regarded race, colour, constitution, or anything else. Every subject of Her Majesty going up to compete had a right, if successful, to be employed in the public service. But the excuse of incapacity from constitution to serve in northern climates did not hold good, as Parsees were settled in all parts of the world, and enjoyed perfectly good health. It was said that medical gentlemen of colour would not be employed by Englishwomen. His experience did not lead him to adopt that view; even the Turks made no distinction of colour, and he had known negroes high in the Turkish public service. But there were cases of gentlemen who had not been allowed to compete for the medical service in the army because their great-grandmothers happened to have a tinge of Indian blood. There was the case of Dr. Thompson, who claimed to be as good a Scotchman as any beyond the Tweed. His mother was an European, but his great-grandmother had a tinge of colour, which was sufficient to exclude him from competition. There could be no doubt that a distinct promise had been held out to the Natives of India, and he would ask whether it was just or politic to depart from that promise? One gentleman had expended between £600 and £700 in educating himself and coming to this country to qualify himself to compete, and when he complained on being rejected, he was offered £200. Another gentleman, a Brahmin, said he was a ruined man; he had lost his caste by coming to Europe, and could not be received again by his family. The young Brahmins gave as a reason for not seeking to acquire European knowledge that, if they came to England they gave up their caste in India, while they were not received here upon the same footing as Englishmen. Such policy was calculated to do much mischief, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India, who was, he believed, sincere in his desire to improve the condition of the Natives of that country, would use his best efforts to do justice to the gentlemen whose case they were now considering.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That," &c.

MR. T. G. BARING did not yield to either the gallant Colonel or to the hon. Member for Southwark in his wish for the education of the people of India, but this question was not connected with that subject. The second part of the Motion before the House was simply a censure on the Secretary of State for War for having prohibited certain gentlemen, Natives of India, from competing for the office of assistant surgeon in the regular army. This was not a question of employment in India, but of employment in all parts of the world. The ground for the prohibition was a letter addressed to the Secretary of State for War by the Secretary of State for India, in which he said that Natives of India were unsuited for the general service of the British Army, and that they ought not to be permitted to compete for the office of assistant surgeon in that army. If they were admitted they might be sent to parts of the world where their health would fail them, and at an early age they would be thrown upon the half-pay list. There were also two or three gentlemen as to whom there was a doubt whether they should be considered Natives of India; those cases were referred to three most eminent medical men—Sir John Liddell, Sir Ronald Martin, and Dr. Gibson—who described them as men of colour with Asiatic features, and said that, although there was nothing to preclude them from employment in a tropical climate, yet they were constitutionally unfit for service in various northern climates where the British Army was called upon to serve. Was it possible, in the face of that opinion, for the Secretary of State for War to allow these gentlemen to compete for the general medical service of the army? He did not think the House could agree in the first part of the Motion of the hon.

and gallant Member, which was one of the most abstract ones which had ever been brought forward. It pledged the House in effect to this among other things—that Natives of India should be entitled to compete for the Artillery and Engineers. If that Resolution were carried the result would be that persons notoriously unfit by constitution for the general service of the army would be admitted into the scientific branches of the army. With regard to the recent Proclamation, it was to be recollected that it was issued in India and addressed to the Natives of that country; it obviously referred to the employment of Natives of India in India, and by no twisting of it could it be made to apply to the general service of this country. He, however, admitted that the case of these gentlemen was a distressing one. In 1853, the medical service of India was open to public competition by Act of Parliament, but last year, in consequence of the amalgamation of the two armies, the Secretary of State for India thought it no longer necessary to keep up a separate medical service for India. Those who before the change had prepared themselves to compete for that service were allowed to compete in certain cases for the general medical service, but those who were constitutionally unfit for it were excluded. It appeared, however, from the papers before the House, that the Secretary of State for India, in Council, had taken steps to secure for the Native gentlemen who had thus been disappointed in their expectations suitable employment in India, and had allowed them a sum to defray the cost of their passage to that country. Upon these grounds he hoped the House would not agree to the Motion.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, it appeared the real reason why these gentlemen were rejected was that they had Asiatic features. He would ask the hon. Gentleman if there never had been a Member of that House who had Asiatic features? These gentlemen were British subjects, and there was nothing to prevent any one of them sitting as a Member of that House if any constituency chose to elect him. In fact they had had an East Indian a Member of that House, Mr. Dyce Sombre. It appeared to him that the Proclamation of the Queen was a delusion. It was a disgrace to the Government that that Proclamation, which was received with such delight in India, was not honestly carried out. As to Asiatics not being able to serve in a cold climate, mate, they were much more able to do so than Englishmen were to serve in India.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that he did not believe that the frame of an Asiatic was calculated to endure the inclemency of many of our colonies. He should have no objection, as an officer, to mix on brotherly terms with the Natives of India; but he doubted whether the English private soldiers would allow a "dark skin" to command them in this country. There was a way, however, of giving employment to Native Indians through which they might attain eminence and considerable positions. Every branch of service in India required extending, and by inducing Natives to come over and study for the Medical Service much good might be effected. But after the statement which had been made by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Baring) he trusted that the hon. and gallant Officer (Colonel Sykes) would not press this question to a division.

COLONEL SYKES said, there was at that moment in the north-west province a deputy collector who was educated in St. Petersburg, and made an officer of artillery there, which showed that the Russian Government was more liberal than ours was. With regard to the Natives of India being incapable of serving in cold climates, if his hon. Friend were to look to the mortality of the Guards in London, he would find that no Natives could suffer so much as did the Guards. He found that out of 1,333 total deaths from all causes, 668 were from consumption, and 350 were invalided from the same cause. Was there anything that the Natives of India could fall into equal to that? He should not trouble the House to divide.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

ECCLESIASTICAL LAW.—RESOLUTION.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he rose to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the state of the Ecclesiastical Law in England and Ireland, and of the Courts in which it is administered, and especially the Act commonly called the Clergy Discipline Act, require to be amended and reformed; and that it is incumbent on the Government

He had to express his regret that the Secretary of State for the Home Department had refused him certain Returns on the ground that they would entail too much trouble upon the officers of the Diocesan Courts. He had asked for Returns respecting the Ecclesiastical Courts, and respecting the fees paid; and he should have thought that there would be no objection to give the Returns, but he was surprised to find them refused. He had, therefore, obtained such information as he found accessible, and it appeared from the Report of a former Committee of that House that in two instances the office of registrar was filled by ladies; that in other cases the duties of Judges were performed by deputies; that as many as seventeen minors had been appointed registrars; that one of the joint registrars of the Principal Consistorial Court at Norwich was appointed at the age of ten years, had performed the duties of the office by deputy, and received an income of £1,427 a year derived from fees; that this gentleman refused to give any details; that in the Consistory Court of London the registrar was appointed by the Bishop of London in 1796, at the age of eight years, and received an income from fees of £904 per annum; that in the Consistory Court of Winchester the registrar, Brownlow North, was appointed by Bishop Brownlow North at the age of seven years, in reversion, and at the age of fifteen years he came into possession, with an income of £860 per annum; that the registrar of the Consistory Court at Norwich was appointed at six years of age, with an income of £85 per year; that the registrar at Llandaff was only five years old; and that the registrar at Sudbury was but three years old when appointed, the duties in both cases being performed by deputies. This was the state of things with regard to the officers, whom the Home Secretary would not compel to return the duties of their appointments and the fees they received at the present time. These fees, it should be recollected, were derived from the poor of the land. Every couple who were married paid £1 or £2 in the shape of fees, which gave a revenue of £30,000 a year, which were given to these gentlemen for the purpose of enabling them to take their pleasure while somebody else performed their duties. He maintained that it was the duty of the Home Secretary not to be so weak as to be deluded by these officers into a quiet acquiescence in their refusal to give the required returns; and if the right hon. Gentleman suffered from such a want of energy that he could not insist upon that being done he had better give up the office he held altogether. With regard to the Ecclesiastical Courts, they had been condemned by the highest authorities in this country. The ecclesiastical law constituted a system by which a body of 25,000 of the most influential persons in this country were specially governed, all cases of bad conduct in clergymen, such as drunkenness, and so forth, being brought within its operation. But the delay occasioned in the administration of that law was terrible. In criminal matters a case was usually disposed of in two months; in civil cases probably four months might be taken as the average duration; but in the Ecclesiastical Courts a case would not unusually occupy two years, as, for instance, did the case of Mr. Bonwell. Then the enormous expense occasioned to the Bishop of the diocese was ruinous, and the result was that sometimes a clergyman who was a scandal to the parish in which he officiated remained unpunished because of the difficulty of getting him removed. The late Bishop of London spent £1,500 on one occasion in trying to unfrock an unworthy clergyman. A very short time ago, when it was desired to use the name of an Archbishop in a suit against a clergyman, the Archbishop obtained a bond for £10,000 to indemnify him for costs before he allowed the use of his name. That was a very irregular proceeding, and only to be justified by the scandalous state of the law. In every well-ordered State the Judges should be bound to perform their duties themselves, and not by deputy; infants should not be promoted to responsible offices intended for persons of more advanced age and competent judgment, and sinecures should be abolished. When the Minister of the Crown knew of the existence of these things, and went on tolerating them, he could not be said to be pursuing a course creditable to the great party which supported him. The present Lord Chancellor, Lord Cranworth, the Irish Prelates in a memorandum to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, and, lastly, the Bishop of London, had all expressed opinions favourable to the Resolution which he had the honour to propose to the House, and it now only remained for him to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department to reintroduce a scheme which had been elaborated by the genius of the present Lord Chancellor, and which it had been deemed expedient to submit to the consideration of Parliament during the pressure of the war in 1856. The Home Office had now for a long time been in a state of classic repose, and the right hon. Gentleman could, therefore, well afford to turn his attention to the subject, and fulfil his professions as a Liberal Minister.

Amendment proposed,

“To leave out from the word ‘That’ to the end of the Question, in order to add the words ‘in the opinion of this House, the state of the Ecclesiastical Law in England and Ireland, and of the Courts in which it is administered, and especially the Act commonly called the Clergy Discipline Act, require to be amended and reformed, and that it is incumbent on the Government to direct a measure to be prepared for that purpose,’”

—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he regretted he had not come into the House until the hon. Gentleman had completed the introductory part of his speech, in which he had been informed the hon. Gentlemen had complained of his having misled him with respect to some returns which he had moved for last Session. The House would, under the circumstances, perhaps, allow him to enter into a brief explanation on the subject. The hon. Gentleman had on Friday last given notice that he would ask him why the ecclesiastical returns which had been ordered by the House last July had not been laid on the Table, and he had accordingly instituted inquiry into the matter at the office of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, believing that the question of which notice had been given referred to certain papers moved for from that office. He had, however, since the occasion to which the hon. Gentleman alluded, ascertained that he had also moved an Address for some very voluminous returns relating to the Ecclesiastical Courts, but he did not understand him in the general description which he had given on a former occasion to point to those returns. Now, the address in question was not an order on the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and it was accordingly forwarded to the Home Office, from which a circular letter was in the usual manner written to Bishops and others who could be called upon to make returns in reply. Remonstrances had shortly afterwards been received from different quarters, stating that the returns were of so voluminous a nature that it could not be expected they would be made without payment, and requesting that intimation should be given by his department as to whether remuneration, in the event of the returns being made, would be given. Having taken the matter into his consideration, he came to the conclusion that he had no funds at his disposal which he could apply to such a purpose, and he had, therefore, caused a letter to be written to the effect that a compliance with the address could not be enforced. He took upon himself the entire responsibility of having adopted that course, and if the hon. Gentleman should deem it right to move for a renewal of the address he should be prepared to state the reasons why he did not think his demand for the information which he wanted was one to which it would be reasonable to accede. Having said thus much for the charge which the hon. Gentleman had brought against him, he had simply to observe, in reference to the general question, that he was by no means disposed to maintain that the present state of the Ecclesiastical Courts, so far as they retained any jurisdiction, was one which was not at all satisfactory. He had, he might add, no doubt that, if the time of the House were not otherwise occupied, it would be very properly employed in dealing with that question. Of course the Government, which had a great many measures to bring forward, must exercise some discretion as to the selection of the subjects on which it asked the House to legislate, and it was, he thought, quite clear that if they had in the present Session introduced a Bill for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts there would not be time for its due consideration, and it must eventually then for the present year be abandoned. The hon. Gentleman had correctly stated that a measure had been prepared on the subject which had been discussed in the other House of Parliament, although it had never been debated in the House of Commons. Now it was, no doubt, quite open to the Government, if they thought the question could be revised with advantage, to lay a Bill dealing with it on the table of the House next Session. To the hon. Gentleman himself, or any other hon. Member who might wish to do so, it was equally competent to adopt that course, but it was impossible for him on the part of the Government to enter into any formal arrangement with the House as to the time when they might deem it prudent to submit a measure of that description to the notice of Parliament.

MR. NEWDEGATE said: Sir, I wish to tender my thanks to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Poole for the great research he has exhibited upon this subject, and for having placed in the hands of the Members of this House the speech he made last year, than which, with its Appendix and the speech he has just delivered, there can scarcely be a more valuable compendium of information on the subject before the House. The hon. Gentleman is entitled to very great credit for the perseverance he has displayed upon this question. The evils arising from the present state of the Ecclesiastical Courts have been admitted by the leading Members of the late and of the present Administration; and the Government must be aware that it is extremely painful to the great body of the members of the Church of England when they see such cases as that miserable case of Mr. Bonwell pending for years, to their disgrace, before the public. It happens that I myself have had reason to feel the utter impossibility of obtaining justice through these Ecclesiastical Courts, and I have felt that the disgrace which attaches to the Church of England is attributable to the negligence that has been exhibited by Parliament, in not enabling the Church to purify herself from the stigma that must attach to her when such cases—happily of rare occurrence—as the one to which I have referred, are kept for years before the eyes of the public. I think that the House will agree with me, that we may trace many cases of disturbance to the lax state of the ecclesiastical jurisdiction. I know well, and I have admitted it in this House, that the agitation against church rates itself originated in the reasonable feeling of the people that they were paying for accommodation which they did not receive in many of the populous districts. But the inhabitants of many parishes have felt that their refusal to pay church rates was their only means of protest against conduct on the part of their pastors which grated heavily upon their consciences. Let the House remember, too, that we have twice had religious worship Bills introduced on behalf of the influential laymen, who have been so annoyed by the manner in which the services were conducted in certain parish churches, that they came here and asked permission of the Legislature to erect for themselves chapels, wherein they

and their families might meet and worship according to the rites of the Church of England, under the ministration of clergymen over whom they could have a more direct control. I rejoice that the House on each occasion rejected those Bills, for I hope never to see in the hands of the lay members of the Church of England such arbitrary control over the clergy as is exercised by some of the Dissenting denominations. I value as much as any man the independence of the clergy, and I value it because I believe it conduces, in the vast majority of cases, to the faithful discharge of their peculiar duties. Still this manifestation on the part of influential laymen is not one which we, the members of the Church of England, can with safety disregard. If it is disregarded too long, we shall see a schism in the Church of England like the schism which took place in the Church of Scotland; but in the case of the seceders attended with all the lamentable consequences that attach to the condition of the Episcopal Church in that country. Sir, that would be an evil so great that the noble Lord at the head of the Government will, I am confident, think me justified in urging the probability of this danger upon him, as a grave reason for the interference of the Legislature in the matter. Let the House look also at the other cases which have arisen. I have stated that I regard the agitation against church rates as often used as a means of expressing annoyance on the part of many parishes. Take the case of St. George's-in-the-East. There the abuses of which the parishioners complained were put down by nothing short of mob law, restrained only by the police from actual personal violence. Then take the case of the rebellion at St. Barnabas, and the conduct of the incumbent, who, after thousands of pounds and many months had been spent in the suit, repudiated the authority of his Bishop, and succumbed only to the power of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, of which that Bishop was a member, and, therefore, the exponent. There was no respect whatever for Episcopal authority in that conduct. It is with shame and regret that I see the record of that conduct standing in condemnation of the present state of the Church of England. Then, Sir, remember the appeal which was made to a civil court in the Lavington case—I mean the application to the Court of Queen's Bench—for the issue of a mandamus. And for what purpose? Merely to enable the parishioners to obtain a hearing which the Bishop had refused, for under the Church Discipline Act the Bishop has it clearly in his power to refuse a hearing to any complaint, and he is justified in the refusal because the condition of these Courts is such, their charges are so exorbitant, and the delay in their administration is such, that it would be actual ruin to most of our Bishops were they always to perform their duty when required by members of the Church of England within their dioceses. Well, all this is a manifest disgrace to the Church. Let the House glance next for a moment at the case of the Essays and Reviews. Why, Sir, the entire Episcopal bench have declared their condemnation of that work, and, in doing so, what did they manifest? They manifested the disgrace of the Church and their own impotence; because, although armed ostensibly, as they ought really to be, with judicial powers, they expressed their opinions upon that grave subject extrajudicially; and I can only think of that protestation, as I have already said, as a manifestation of disgrace to the Church, and a confession of impotence on the part of the Episcopate. The Bishops have, indeed, before told us that judicially they are impotent. As the hon. Gentleman the Member for Poole has stated, they are helpless. Their incomes have been so reduced that it is totally impossible for them to bear the expense of performing their disciplinary and judicial duties at the enormous expense entailed by proceeding in their own Courts. Far be it from me to wish that any arbitrary or uncontrolled power exercised without the checks and safeguards incident to a fair trial in the presence of a competent bar, and with all the due process of open justice, should be placed in the hands of the Bishops of the Church of England, however much I may respect them. For, Sir, it is the peculiar characteristic of the Church of England, that she is united with the State by a bond which secures the emoluments and temporalities of the clergy. The position of the Church is that she is not subordinated, but is co-ordinate with the State in her obedience to the supreme power of this realm. And I hope that in any measure which is introduced upon this subject the characteristics of the Church of England as a branch of the Catholic Church, and at the same time as a national Church, will be borne in mind, and that we shall see no proposal made for vesting in the Bishops an arbitrary power such as that which has been generated by and has increased the abuses which have crept into the Church of Rome, but that we shall see a measure introduced by which whenever any grave and well-founded complaint is made, shall secure that that complaint may be investigated in open Court, with all its attendant ceremonies and safeguards of the law, securing to every incumbent his right of irremovability, and the enjoyment of his preferment undisturbed, unless it can be proved that he has rendered himself amenable to those common maxims of just law which ought always to prevail in the government of the clergy as well as in that of the laity. It is a most extraordinary fact that this House has done more justice to the Roman Catholics resident within this country than it has done to the great body of the members of the Church of England. Last Session, thanks to the Government, and especially to the perseverance of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary, a measure was passed which has given to the Roman Catholics the opportunity of a hearing and a fair trial under the laws of their native country in everything that concerns their property devoted to religious and charitable uses; but to this hour the great body of the Church of England remain practically debarred from many of the benefits which last Session you conferred upon that small minority who profess the Roman Catholic faith. That measure was, in fact, the answer to an appeal which was made as long ago as the year 1851 by the Roman Catholic priests of the district of Hexham; and let me for a moment, in illustration of the nature of the improvement or reformation of our ecclesiastical law which I hope to see, remind the House of what these gentlemen prayed for. They addressed themselves to Cardinal Wiseman, and he asked—

“First, that their ecclesiastical constitution be compounded of these four ingredients—that is, the civil law of England, the Canon law (in spirituals) of the Catholic Church, the common law, and the just and equitable statute laws of their beloved country; for they are convinced that these would constitute, if properly compounded, a safe, salutary, and uniform system of ecclesiastical legislation for the Catholics of England.”

Now, what I would ask for the members of the Church of England is that by the renovation of our system of ecclesiastical procedure, you should revive those benefits for us. But I hope that in no measure which may be introduced we shall meet with such an answer as was given by the committee of St. Thomas of Canterbury, though by anticipation, to this prayer of the Roman Catholic priests. That Committee, of which Cardinal Wiseman is a member, said—

“In the Catholic Church, the Bishop, as your Committee learn, is not merely an administrator; he is a judge, acting sometimes with the ordinary formalities of courts, at other times summarily, and without any formalities whatever. . . . It is not every case of supposed criminality in which a priest is entitled to a trial before suspension. On the contrary, it is the gravest offences of all which, for avoiding scandal give the Bishop the right of suspension without trial, &c., &c. So true is it that a Bishop can, by virtue of the aforesaid decree (Council of Trent, Sess. XIV., 1; De Beyond Diocese), for reasons best known to himself, interdict a priest from the exercise of his sacred functions, that he is not even bound to make known the cause of suspension or the crime to the very criminal himself, but only to the Apostolic See, if the suspended priest shall have recourse to that tribunal.”

Now, Sir, last Session we did all we could to guard the Roman Catholic priests and Roman Catholic laity of this country against this arbitrary control and I trust that no measure which is introduced for the Church of England will give any such arbitrary jurisdiction to the Bishops of our Church, however much they are entitled to our respect. Let us not oppose the clergy; but in seeking justice for the laity, I would seek justice for the clergy also. I claim that the character and the position of the Church of England, as united with the State by a union which until this jurisdiction lapsed was without confusion, shall be borne in mind by those who are to provide for the due administration of her laws. I say this, Sir, because I wish to clear my urgency upon this subject from all imputation of a desire to place the parochial or inferior clergy under a jurisdiction which I feel would be unbecoming the freemen of this country. We seek, Sir, a national reform. We seek a reform in the spirit and according to the constitution of the Church of England; and I will conclude by assuring the Government that, so far as my humble vote will go, should their measure be, as I believe it will be, a measure well adapted to meet the exigencies of the case, I shall feel it equally an honour and a duty to tender them my support.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would strongly urge the members of the Church of England to release themselves from the trammels of the State. There was not a more ndependent body of men in the world than Dissenting ministers, although they were dependent upon the voluntary system. But what was the state of the Church of England? Why, according to the testimony of the Bishop of Ripon, there were 10,000 of its ministers who at that moment were not in the receipt of £100 per annum. Dissenters certainly did not treat their ministers in this way, and he argued that the only remedy for that unhappy state of things would be the adoption of a system which would enable those clergymen to avail themselves of the voluntary kindness of their flocks, and which would free the Church from the benumbing influence of its connection with the State. He would, however, undertake to utter a prophecy in that House, which was that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would never attempt any reform of the discipline of the Church of England. He was too experienced a politician to try his hand at anything of the kind, for he would bring all the ecclesiastical bodies in the kingdom about his ears.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he was satisfied with the opinions elicited from both sides of the House, and also with the perfectly unsatisfactory answer of the right hon. Gentleman, and, in withdrawing his Motion, he would state that he should take the earliest opportunity of again bringing the subject under consideration.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

FIRES IN LONDON.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. THOMSON HANKEY said, he wished to direct the attention of the House to a subject deeply affecting the interest of the Metropolis. He would show the existence of a very great evil, which required the interference of the Legislature—he referred to the state of the law respecting the prevention of fires in the Metropolis. A great fire had lately occurred near London Bridge, and public attention had very naturally been directed to the subject. The state of the Metropolis was not what it ought to be with respect to proper arrangements for putting out fires. The House was perhaps hardly aware of the immense property to be insured against the risk by fire in the Metropolis. Taking the rental within the area of the Metropolitan Board of Works at £15,000,000, and capitalizing it at twenty years' purchase, the value of house property alone was £300,000,000 sterling. Taking the moveable property in houses as at least equal to the house property itself—taking into account also the immense property in the docks, in London warehouses, and shops, independently of pictures, books, and jewellery in private houses, he was sure he did not exaggerate when he calculated the value of the whole at not less than £600,000,000. That property was left practically without any municipal regulations whatever for its protection against fire. The fact, he had no hesitation in saying, was almost unexampled. He did not believe there was another great city in the world besides London that had no municipal regulations whatever in force for the prevention of fire. He would briefly explain to the House what was the present state of the law. Immediately after the Great Fire of London, in the following year public attention was naturally directed to this subject, and an act of Common Council was passed, which he had seen in the library among the records of the City, giving very elaborate directions as to the course to be pursued in London in the event of fire. The municipality, which then formed the greater part of London, took upon itself to make what might at that time be thought admirable regulations for the security of property against fire. They went into very minute regulations. One of these was to this effect, that—"At all such times the Lord Mayor be attended with all his officers, with the marshals and their labourers, the bridgemasters, &c., who are all, upon notice of any fire, forthwith to repair to the Lord Mayor, and to observe such directions as may be given them. The sheriffs, also, will be attended by all their officers upon pain of forfeiting £3 in default of such their attendance. Another clause enacted that—"Every alderman who has passed the office of sheriff shall provide twelve buckets and one hand-squirt of brass, to be kept at their respective dwellings." He had gone lately to the Guildhall, and asked the Town Clerk if he could give him information as to any existing municipal regulations in the City of London on the subject. The Town Clerk told him he was not aware of anything of the kind. All they depended upon was an Act of Parliament of 1774, which required each parish within the metropolitan area to maintain at least one engine and a certain number of ladders. That was the only Act relating to the subject of fire, and any hon. Gentleman who had anything to do with parochial arrangements in London would know that such an arrangement as the one proposed was perfectly useless so far as regarded protection from fire. The engines were kept up in a very inefficient manner, or were not kept at all, except in a few of the larger parishes, and in some instances the keys were in the possession of a parish clerk who resided at a considerable distance from the engine-house. In the year 1844 a measure had been proposed by the right hon. Baronet Member for Carlisle, who was then Secretary of State for the Home Department, by which certain parishes were required to maintain a greater or a lesser number of engines, according to the amount of their population, and a certain number of firemen. The Bill included about 200 parishes, and it provided for the maintenance of about 800 firemen, but those men were to be placed under no kind of organization, and the measure would have been totally ineffective, as the vicious principle of parochial efforts was still to be kept up. There could be no doubt that the present state of legislation upon the subject was unsatisfactory. He might be told there was a brigade, called the fire brigade, in London, which had practically prevented public attention being called to the want of legislation, because they formed a very efficient body. No doubt they were highly efficient for the purpose intended, but certainly not for the general protection of life and property in the Metropolis. The brigade consisted of 108 or 109 men, with sixteen engines at stations in various parts of London, but it was formed out of a previous system by which all the insurance offices of London kept a certain fire establishment of their own, partly as a sort of advertisement and partly to put out fires where the offices were directly interested. That system having been found very expensive, it was suggested that it would be far better to form one brigade by the union of all the men, and from that suggestion originated the fire brigade which had now existed since 1833. He admitted that the present arrangement was a great improvement, but still it was wrong to leave the protection of the Metropolis from fire to the insurance offices. The brigade had rendered great services under its late superintendent, Mr. Braidwood, and he might mention that the insurance offices had shown their appreciation of that gentleman's services by granting an annuity of £300 to the widow, with a reversion of the capital—£7,000—to his children. He repeated, however, that the present system was wrong, for although in one sense it might be to the interest of insurance companies to put out fire, yet their premiums were based upon a calculation of risks, and if the fires doubled in number the premiums would be doubled also. In the late great fire the loss of the insurance offices was estimated at £1,000,000, besides several hundreds of thousands pounds' worth of uninsured property that was destroyed. The whole amount of the premiums received by all the London and country offices for risks incurred within the Metropolis was only £350,000 a year, so that one fire had swept the whole amount of 2½ years' premiums. The brigade was supported by the various companies at an expense of £25,000 a year. That sum, of course, was calculated in the amount of the premiums, and fell upon the insurers, so that the insurers paid for the protection that was afforded to non-insurers—an arrangement that could hardly be regarded as equitable. If anything ought to be taken up as a municipal question it was the protection of life and property against fire. In Paris there were 800 of the Sapeurs Pompiers, a most efficient fire brigade. In Edinburgh, Dublin, Liverpool, and Manchester, the extinction of a fire was a municipal arrangement, and there was no continental town in which the same system did not prevail. In London alone there was no such system, and this important object was left to depend on voluntary exertions. Our public buildings were unprotected, and, considering the invaluable property which they contained, that was a most unsatisfactory state of things. In the Bank of England alone an efficient system prevailed, and so there ought to be in an establishment containing the records of the National Debt and titles of property amounting to £800,000,000; but was it not equally the duty of the Government to protect the public buildings under their charge, remembering that within the metropolitan police area were more than 3,000,000 persons, and between 500,000 and 600,000 houses, there surely ought to be some public system? He did not want to saddle the country at large with any expenditure to accomplish this object. The matter was one of police, and there could be no better time than the present for effecting such a change. He spoke without authority, but he believed that the whole of the existing fire-brigade establishment would be handed over to the public on equitable terms if they would take charge of it, and the companies would be glad to be relieved from a duty which he did not think ought to fall upon them at all. He hoped the matter would be considered by the Government during the recess.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: My hon. Friend was naturally and wisely taken advantage of the present moment, when attention has been directed to the disastrous fire at London Bridge, of which we have heard so much, to bring under notice the defects in the present arrangements for the extinction of fires in the Metropolis. The principal provision on this subject is contained in the 14th of George III., which enacts that every London parish within the Bills of Mortality shall keep up certain fire engines and other appliances for the extinction of fires. At this moment I am not prepared to say what is the aggregate expense which the parishes incur under this enactment; but, no doubt, the expenses of the several parishes, when added together, amount to a considerable sum. Nevertheless, the whole of that expenditure is almost frittered away. It is divided into such minute proportions that no one parish contributes any important assistance to the extinction of any large fire. The Act of George III. was passed at a time when there was no organization for the Metropolis. Each parish was, in 1774, a separate community, excluding the City of London, and they had no common organization. Such organization, however, now exists in the metropolitan police, which, indeed, is independent of the City of London, but is common to the whole of the rest of the Metropolis. It is an obvious remark that if all the expenditure of the separate parishes were thrown into one common fund and were placed under a common management, the expenditure would be far more equally and economically applied for the purpose of extinguishing fires than it is at present. Whether any alteration in the law could be made for that purpose is a point upon which I will not express any opinion; but I agree with my hon. Friend that if these arrangements, which are now simply parochial, were combined, and if the persons who are now employed by the several parishes were brigaded, the means of extinguishing fires would be much more efficient than at present. The existing fire brigade in London is maintained at an expense of £20,000 a year, and is a voluntary force, supported by the various fire insurance offices. And if the whole of the expense is thrown on the parishes it seems but reasonable that some contribution should be made by the companies. However, I merely advert to that subject as one which will require consideration, and I must thank my hon. Friend for the manner in which he has brought this subject under the notice of the House.

IMPORTATION OF GUANO.

OBSERVATIONS.

MAJOR WINDSOR PARKER said, that the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had, by anticipation, answered the question he had put on the paper relative to the importation of Peruvian guano. He would, however, venture to remark that while they had imported last year about £30,000,000 sterling worth of corn the importation of that valuable fertilizer had gradually fallen off. It had been calculated that one ton of Peruvian guano was equivalent to a production of five quarters of corn, and upon that calculation the falling off in the import represented a falling off in the production of corn in this country of 2,000,000 quarters. The Government would, therefore, confer a great benefit on the country if they would give greater encouragement to the importation of guano, so that the country might cease to be dependent on foreign nations for such enormous importations of grain. The House had been reminded by a petition presented by the grand jury of Leitrim that the Peruvian Congress had endeavoured to do away with the monopoly by which the English farmer was charged £2 5s. per ton more than his American rival. If that resolution of the Peruvian Congress should be carried out the English farmer would be saved £500,000 a year. The trade in Peruvian guano was in a most unsatisfactory state, and he trusted that the Government would energetically urge upon the Government of Peru to make some reduction in the present enormous export charge levied on guano.

CIVIL LIST PENSIONS.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. STIRLING* said, that in calling attention to the pensions on the Civil List, he thought it proper to quote the words under which that fund was established. It was an Act of Her present Majesty, the 1 & 2 Vict., c. 2, s. 56, and it provided that the sum of £1,200 should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund as pensions to such persons as had just claims on the Royal beneficence, or who, by personal service to the Crown, or by the performance of duties to the public, by their labours in literature, or by useful discoveries in science or art, had merited the approbation of their Sovereign. The Act directed that a list of the pensions should be laid before the House every year, clearly showing that it was intended that these pensions should be open to the review of Parliament; but no complete return had ever been given till the one he had moved for. The aggregate amount of the pensions now payable was £18,700. He was sorry to see from this list that very early in the history of this civil fund some pensions were granted that partook of the nature of an abuse. In 1840 Lord Melbourne granted to seven persons, instructors of Her Majesty in various branches of education, £700 out of the £1,200. He did not say these persons did not deserve recognition from the Crown; the well-known accomplishments of Her Majesty made it probable that they had faithfully discharged their duty. But it could hardly be said these were services that came within the spirit, though they might come within the letter of the Act. It must be remembered that, in addition to the £1,200 a year, there was a further annual sum of £13,200 at the disposal of the First Minister, under the name of Royal Bounty, Alms, and Special Services. It certainly appeared to him that the pensions he alluded to ought to have been granted out of the larger sum and not out of the smaller. In 1845, Sir Robert Peel granted out of this £1,200 a pension of £1,000 to a member of the Royal Family. Believing that no defence could be made or would be attempted for this pension, he called attention to it merely for the purpose of expressing a hope that nothing of the kind might occur again. Here and there on this list, extending over a period of twenty-four years, he found other pensions hardly less objectionable. The names of several persons appeared there, as it seemed, for no other reason than that they were poor and their relations extremely rich and powerful. Grants of this kind could not be too severely condemned. There was, doubtless, much individual hardship in these cases, and it would be repugnant to the feelings of almost any Member of this House to allude to them by name. But it was behind this natural repugnance that

Ministers sheltered themselves when they perpetrated these jobs. He must say the rich relatives who asked were more to blame than the careless Minister who gave. But it was the duty of Ministers to resist the applications for such gifts, and to make the wealthy aristocracy understand that the fund was not to be made a refuge for their poor relations. The poor had their friendly and benefit societies maintained at their own cost, and it would be well if the rich and titled, following their example, would take upon themselves the burden of supporting some of the destitute persons whose names appeared in this Return. He would now call attention to the literary and scientific pensions. In no grants was it more necessary that caution should be exercised. A literary career was a lottery, in which the prizes in fame, influence, and hard cash were so splendid that it followed in the nature of things the blanks must be very numerous. It was a career which peculiarly appealed to the imagination of youth, and in which the difficulties and obstacles were seldom visible from the starting post. In other walks of life there was generally some point when a man felt he had made good his footing, and from which he was or might be borne onward and upward by seniority, by death vacancies, or by the exertions of others. In the literary career there was no such point; success here implied continual progress; and progress was only to be made by incessant exertion. The result was that the literary profession was crowded with middle-aged men, of considerable abilities, great cultivation, and no little industry, who, nevertheless, found it difficult to make a decent livelihood. When the cares of a family were added to their other difficulties, the position of these persons was forlorn indeed. It was obvious, therefore, if the good character and a fair degree of literary skill were to be the passport to a pension, three times £1,200 would hardly suffice to satisfy the claims of literary men alone. The possible rewards being so scanty and so few, none ought to be granted except to those persons who had rendered real and signal service to English literature. Rightly to select the recipients of these rewards demanded the exercise of the greatest care. Looking through this return, he must say that the selection afforded evidence rather of carelessness than care. In his remarks he would not go further back than five years, fixing that period to show that, while he criticised the pensions given by the noble Lord, he had no wish to exempt from remark those granted by the late Government. In the last five years about forty pensions had been granted for literary services alone; of these he was himself familiar with the names of twenty-five. Some of this number were unexceptionable—such as Lover, Richardson, and the relatives of Robert Southey and of Hugh Miller; but to others he thought considerable objections might fairly be made. Of the remaining fifteen names he had never heard until he read them in this list. He had, therefore, placed the returns in the hands of a number of gentlemen of the highest literary reputation, living in London, and of course conversant with all branches of literature, and especially called their attention to the fifteen names of which he spoke. Respecting one only of these names could his friends furnish him with any information leading to the belief that it deserved to appear on this list. He was, therefore, entitled to say that out of these forty names fourteen were wholly obscure. It had further fallen within his knowledge that of the persons pensioned for literary services, some had taken the unworthy course of attempting to raise further contributions by means of begging letters. As he did not know the circumstances under which the appeals were made, he should not now mention any names; but if he should find that the practice was persisted in, he should feel himself justified in taking some steps to make the names of the offenders known. But if any special example were needed of a mistake in disposing of these grants, he could not refer to a more striking case than that of Mr. Close. The noble Lord had withdrawn the pension of £50 he granted; but as he had allowed him £100 out of the Royal Bounty, he hoped he might take the liberty of giving a short sketch of Mr. Close's career. He was bred as a butcher; but soon gave up that trade to become a printer. From his early years he seemed to have had a fatal facility for writing doggerel verse and ungrammatical prose. It would be altogether a misapplication of the term to apply that of "literature" to anything he had ever written. Most of his productions appeared in the shape of handbills, and were circulated by means of the post. When persons returned him a favourable answer with an enclosure of money they were highly praised; those who did not pay him that attention were ridiculed and satirized. Many of these compositions were really so gross that they would very fairly come under the operation of the late Lord Campbell's Act. Others were attacks on women in his own neighbourhood, of such a nature that he wondered how he had escaped the horsewhip he had so frequently provoked. A volume of his writings was on the table of the library of the House, and those who had seen it could say whether he had drawn a too unfavourable picture of them. One of these handbills or fly-sheets, as they were called by the author—a very gross attack upon the character of a lady now no more—became the subject of an action for libel at Liverpool so lately as 1856. The defence made by the counsel of Mr. Close was not that the libel was true, or that there was any doubt as to the identity of the party attacked; but that his client was not a creditable person—these were the words he was reported to have used—and that nothing he could say or write could affect the character of any man or woman. This defence did not succeed in obtaining a verdict from the jury, who gave £50 damages against Mr. Close; and had it not been for consideration for his circumstances, their foreman stated that they would have given a larger sum. But this was not all. The plaintiff, who seems to have been a good-natured man, remitted the damages, on condition that Mr. Close should print a paper, confessing that what he had previously written was slanderous. Mr. Close accepted the condition. He confessed what he had said of the lady was slanderous. But in many subsequent flysheets he had spoken of the trial as an occasion when he was mulcted for writing the truth. Was such a man deserving either of a pension or of a donation? He regretted that the noble Lord, on withdrawing the pension, should have given a donation out of the Royal Bounty Fund, which donation seemed to have been allotted as a solatium to Mr. Close for having been found out to be an impostor. The pension was given in the first instance in consequence of a memorial which the noble Lord produced to the House on a former occasion, when he (Mr. Stirling) had called attention to the subject. The noble Lord then stated that Mr. Close was a self-taught genius, that his works deserved to be placed in the same category as those of Burns, and that a pension would be particularly valuable to Mr. Close as a mark of the Royal favour. The noble Lord finished by flourishing the memorial over the box on the table, stating that it was signed by

Lord Carlisle, Lord Lonsdale, and many other persons, and sat down, as usual, amid the cheers of the House. By the courtesy of the noble Lord he had had an opportunity of seeing the memorial, and as far as he could perceive it was signed by nobody at all. Towards the bottom of the list there might be some signatures which were real, but the greater part of the signatures—certainly all likely to weigh with the noble Lord—were exactly in the handwriting of the memorial, which was that of Mr. Close. The noble Lord informed the House that the pension was given upon the memorial, and if so that proved his case; because it proved that a pension had been given upon a document which ought more properly to have been transmitted to the Mendicity Society. The pension being withdrawn, the final result of the memorial was the £100 granted out of the Royal Bounty Fund. In taking leave of Mr. Close, he hoped he would employ this £100 better than those talents of which he was perpetually boasting. He must admit that this Westmoreland bard possessed one of the attributes of a great poet—the gift of prophecy. Last year he wrote in one of his fly-sheets—“Had I been a pugilist instead of a poet, Lord Palmerston would have given me £10 out of the Royal Bounty Fund.” This year, although it was proved that, instead of being a member of the comparatively respectable fraternity of the Prize Ring, he was the writer of doggerel verse and obscene prose, a convicted libeller and a confessed slanderer, he had received not £10, but £100, from the improbable source which he had so impudently indicated. The question now was—how were mistakes of this kind to be prevented in future? He submitted to the noble Lord and the House whether it would not be desirable that there should be in the printed list of pensions a short indication of the services and works for which the pensions were granted, for it might happen that in some instances the obscure pensioners had been the anonymous authors of meritorious publications. Might it not also be said that some of the pensions were of too small an amount? The smaller the pensions were, the greater the chance of their being carelessly given. He saw in the list the name of a lady as the recipient of £30 a year. He never had the advantage of hearing her name before, and was, therefore, unable to say whether her services deserved recognition; but if she was so poor that £30 were of importance to her, would it not have been better to give her a little more? With the exception of the pensions for literary and scientific services, some department of the State might be said to be responsible for the pensions granted. For those given to soldiers and sailors, for example, the War Department and the Admiralty might be held responsible, and he had no doubt the responsibility was real and the supervision effective. In the case, however, of the bestowal of literary and scientific pensions there was no responsibility except that which rested on the Prime Minister, who, having so much to occupy his time, must necessarily leave the choice of these pensioners in a great measure to others. He ventured to say that if the noble Lord made a rule of appending to these grants the names of one or two persons of acknowledged literary eminence, who undertook to vouch for the value of the services for which the pension was given, many chances of abuse would be removed. There was no doubt but that many applications which ought not to be entertained were made to Ministers by persons who did not themselves choose to refuse them, and who very improperly throw upon the over-worked Minister the task of examining the flimsiest claims. If a Peer, with a taste for poetry, or a Member of that House, who was versed in geology, wanted a pension for a poet or a geologist, would it not be an excellent answer for the noble Lord to make—“Well, I will see if I can grant it; but if I do, remember that I shall probably give your name in the return as a guarantee for the propriety of the grant.” He believed such a practice would have a great effect in checking abuses. Many men would make applications who would be far from desirous of being put down on the pension list as the godfathers of such pensioners as Mr. Close. He thanked the House for the patience with which it had listened to his statement on a matter which, so far as money was concerned, was a small one, but which, nevertheless, had an important bearing on the interests and the honour of literature.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was not at all aware that these pensions to which the hon. Member had referred, were granted to necessitous members of wealthy families, who ought to look to their relatives for support. Some of these pensions were so small in amount that they could not be an object to any one moving in that sphere of life in which persons belonging to wealthy and aristocratic families would move; and, so far as he was concerned, the hon. Member's observation could not apply to the mode in which he had disposed of the pensions. As the hon. Member truly stated, the pensions allotted to persons of literary and scientific attainments were so small that it was almost a wonder how they could be of any great value to the receivers; but he could assure the House that the gratitude expressed by many very deserving persons for the assistance which those small pensions, varying from £50 to £100 a year, afforded, was exceedingly gratifying to him, as showing that in dispensing that amount which the law enabled him to dispense he was able to relieve a great deal of individual anxiety and privation. With respect to the particular case of Mr. Close, he thought that the hon. Member was mistaken in saying that the signatures to the memorial were in the same handwriting as the memorial itself, though undoubtedly the two first names—those of the Earl of Carlisle and Lord Lonsdale—were evidently not written by those noble Lords. So far as the Earl of Carlisle and Lord Lonsdale were concerned he found that the former had given his sanction to Mr. Close to use his name as a patron, although he had not authorized him to use it as supporting his application for a pension, while the latter noble Lord had done so. It was clear, therefore, that there had been no great amount of misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Close with reference to those two signatures. The reason, he might add, why he had taken away the pension from Mr. Close was that the hon. Gentleman opposite had communicated with him, and proved to him that Mr. Close had been convicted of having written a libel. Having ascertained that fact, it at once occurred to him that a man who was open to such a charge, whether he believed the libel to be justified or not, was not exactly the sort of person who was entitled to receive a pension from the Crown. Taking into account, however, the circumstance that some time had elapsed between the period of the announcement that the pension would be granted and its withdrawal, and it having been represented to him that Mr. Close had taken steps in expectation of receiving the pension which would entail on him considerable pecuniary loss, he certainly did not think it right—the fault resting, perhaps, in some measure with himself in not having examined sufficiently into the particular case—that Mr. Close should be allowed to suffer to so great an extent as he must have done if he had received no pecuniary assistance. The hon. Member, indeed, seemed to think that if he were disposed to render that assistance he ought to have paid the money out of his own pocket. [Mr. STIRLING: No, no!] That was the inference he drew from what had fallen from the hon. Gentleman; but, be that as it might, he had not felt called upon to adopt that course. He could, moreover, assure the hon. Gentleman that he paid great attention to the distribution of the grants in question; that he examined carefully the grounds on which recommendations for them were made; that the names of the persons making the recommendations were duly sent in to him, and that he had granted pensions to several upon whom—even according to the admission of the hon. Gentleman himself—they were properly bestowed. The hon. Gentleman had, indeed, stated that there were fourteen cases in which he had not been able to learn on what grounds grants had been made, and he, therefore, seemed to assume that in those cases the public money was not wisely and fairly distributed. He might, however, turn the tables on the hon. Gentleman, and say that his want of knowledge in these particular instances was no good reason why he should not be wrong, while his own acquaintance with the grounds on which those fourteen pensions were granted furnished no good reason why he should not have done right in conferring them. He could at all events assure the hon. Gentleman that he believed he could satisfy him that the claims in the fourteen cases to which he alluded were just ones, if he would only bring the circumstances of each case under his notice. In many instances, it was true, the recipients of pensions were persons not known to fame. They were not persons whose works had enabled them to arrive at that high degree of reputation and emolument which distinguished literary success secured. On the contrary, they walked in the humbler ranks of literature. They were men who struggled without avail to acquire wealth by the exercise of their talents, but who, nevertheless, possessed natural genius and great industry, and to whom the grant of the smallest allowance was a great boon, inasmuch as, however trifling it might be, it sometimes precluded the necessity of their being obliged to seek refuge in the workhouse, or to depend on the casual support of friends or relatives. Those grants had at all events, he believed, done great good. They resembled the distributions made by the Literary Fund, which were very small, but which, as everybody knew, had produced, in some instances, in cases of distinguished men, great relief in moments of distress. He had simply, in conclusion, to assure the hon. Gentleman that he should feel it to be his duty to take every precaution against the recurrence of such a case as that of Mr. Close.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY — CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee,

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £145,140, to complete the sum for Superannuation Allowances and Compensations.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that the Vote was increasing every year. He found several instances in which allowances had been granted upon the abolition of establishments, but with proper economy those persons, instead of being thrown on the public as pensioners, might have received appointments in other departments. There was, he observed, the case of a person who had been receiving £320 a year on account of ill-health since 1831; and another in which £700 a year was paid for "infirmity of body" since 1820—that was for forty-one years. There was an item of £2,000 for the Queen's coroner which needed explanation. He should like to know what the duties of that office were?

MR. PEELE said, that no doubt the Act of 1859 granted more liberal allowances, and embraced a larger number of public servants than the previous Superannuation Act, and that accounted for the increase in this Vote. With respect to the allowance of £2,000 a year to the Queen's coroner and attorney, he (Mr. Peel) was not aware that the hon. Gentleman intended to draw his attention to this allowance, and he did not know the particular circumstances under which it was granted. He did know, however, that an Act was passed abolishing this office and otherwise effecting a considerable reduction in the Vote for that department of the Queen's Bench.

Vote agreed to, as were also the four following Votes:—

(2.) £10,000, Commutation of Probate Act Compensations.

(3.) £1,040, Toulonese and Corsican Emigrants.

Viscount Palmerston

(4.) £325, Refuge for the Destitute.

(5.) £3,210, Polish Refugees, &c.

(6.) £3,951, Miscellaneous Allowances.

SIR MORTON PETO said, there was a charge included in this sum for a pension of £500 granted to Sir Thomas Clarges by Charles II., and he wished to know who received that money now.

MR. PEELE said, he supposed it was the representatives of that person. The question of continuing the payment had been submitted to the law officers of the Crown lately, and they were of opinion that the payment could not be discontinued.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he should move that the amount of the grant should be struck out.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped that the Motion would not be persisted in, for the grant had been made by the Crown and charged upon the old coal duties, and was as much private property as was the subject of any other grant from the Crown.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following six votes:—

(7.) £2,539, Public Infirmaries (Ireland).

(8.) £1,900, to complete the sum for the Westmoreland Lock Hospital (Dublin).

(9.) £700, Rotunda Lying-in Hospital (Dublin).

(10.) £200, Coombe Lying-in Hospital (Dublin).

(11.) £5,200, to complete the sum for the Hospitals of the House of Industry (Dublin).

(12.) £1,800, to complete the sum for the House of Recovery and Fever Hospital (Dublin).

(13.) £600, Meath Hospital, Dublin.

MR. BRADY said, he did not intend to oppose the Vote, for he did not believe that a more valuable institution existed; but he conceived that the course which had been pursued of late years by the medical officers of the institution, in selecting their colleagues instead of allowing them to be chosen by election, was likely to bring the institution into discredit.

MR. CARDWELL explained the circumstances connected with the recent acts of which the hon. Member complained, and pointed out that the gentleman who had been appointed was in every respect qualified for the office to which he had been elected.

MR. HENNESSY said, he considered that the mode of appointment was one which required some alteration.

Vote agreed to, as were also the following Votes:—

(14.) £100, St. Mark's Ophthalmic Hospital (Dublin).

(15.) £900, to complete the sum for Dr. Steevens' Hospital (Dublin).

(16.) £265, Superintendence of Hospitals (Dublin).

(17.) £58,700, Merchant Seamen's Fund Pensions.

(18.) £17,400, to complete the sum for Distressed British Seamen Abroad.

(19.) £5,121, to complete the sum for Charitable Allowances, &c. (Ireland).

(20.) £29,747, Nonconforming, &c., Ministers in Ireland.

MR. HADFIELD said, he objected to the Vote. There were constant accessions to the claimants upon the fund, though the census showed that the body to which they belonged had in thirty years decreased 20 per cent. New claims, too, were being added. The Presbyterians of Ulster, moreover, he contended, did not require that assistance, inasmuch as they were rich, having in one year raised £30,000 for houses and £10,000 a year for missionary enterprises. They paid their ministers, however, very badly, and the system of granting them public money encouraged that practice. The grant was really an injustice to the class who received it, for a larger amount might be secured by the voluntary system. The Established Church, the Regium Donum, and the Maynooth Grant were like a three-legged stool. If any one of the three were taken away the others would tumble. He believed that a sum of £10,000 had been already taken on account. He, therefore, begged to move that the Vote be reduced by £28,000.

MR. CARDWELL said, that the question had been substantially decided last Session after a debate upon the Regium Donum. The House then resolved to continue the Regium Donum. On the one hand, the Government would not propose any new endowments; but, on the other, they were of opinion that those, which had been continued for a long time should not be withdrawn; and he knew of no body of men who were more entitled to the grant than the Presbyterians of Ireland.

MR. DAWSON said, that all parties in Ireland were in favour of the grant, and he would for his part desire to see it increased, so that the salary of each minister would not be less than £100; and in order to prevent these annual discussions, he would place the charge upon the Consolidated Fund.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £29,747, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Expense of Non-conforming, Seceding, and Protestant Dissenting Ministers in Ireland, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 78; Noes 18: Majority 60.

Vote agreed to.

(21.) £3,750, Ecclesiastical Commissioners.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he objected to the Vote, on the ground that the Commissioners were rich and did not want it. In four years they had spent £98,000 upon lawyers and surveyors, and in the year 1858 alone £32,000. He would certainly take the sense of the Committee upon it.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the sum was voted for the expenses incurred by the Ecclesiastical Commission in the performance of duties formerly discharged by the Church Building Commission, which had been dissolved.

MR. HADFIELD said, he objected at the time to the transference from the Church Building Commissioners to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. What had the Commissioners to do? He believed absolutely nothing.

MR. CAIRD said, he could not help making an observation on the great amount paid by the Commissioners for surveyors and receivers. In 1858 no less a sum than £10,814 was paid to two firms of land surveyors in London for commission, and in 1858 the sum had grown up to £20,546. It appeared to him that the better plan would be for the Commissioners to appoint some person at a sufficient salary to do that work. In the year 1858 there was also paid to lawyers £11,992. He certainly thought that was an expenditure which should be inquired into.

MR. DEEDS explained the duties which devolved on the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in connection with the Church Building Acts. They were of a most onerous and important character, and the Commissioners would be glad to be relieved of them. The money asked for would, therefore, be well applied. As to the solicitors' and surveyors' charges, the Commissioners were not afraid of a full investigation into these matters. The Commission had charge of large estates and vast sums, and the charges were necessarily heavy. It had always been their earnest desire to keep down their legal and professional expenses as much as possible.

MR. PEELE explained that the duties of the Commission under the Church Building Acts were to receive the conveyance of sites where persons were willing, at their own private charge, to build churches, and when the churches were built to separate for ecclesiastical purposes from the existing parishes those districts which were to be assigned to the new churches. The cost of these duties under an Act of Parliament could not be defrayed out of the funds of the Ecclesiastical Commission.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £3,750, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray a portion of the Expense of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 34: Majority 32.

Vote agreed to; as was also

(22.) £12,606, to complete the sum for Temporary Commissions.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £29,005, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Fees, Salaries, Expenses, and Compensations, payable under the provisions of the Patent Law Amendment Act, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. W. WILLIAMS called attention to the large amount of fees received by the law officers of the Crown.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, he should move the reduction of the Vote by £9,166, the expense of fees payable to the law officers of the Crown. He complained that the operation of the law was most unjust, as bearing upon working men who were desirous of obtaining patents. There was a charge for travelling expenses to obtain the Lord Chancellor's seal when he was out of town. Surely if the Lord Chancellor went out of town for business or pleasure it was his duty to leave some officer in town who could affix the seal. The amount of fees payable by a working man to get a patent made out was no less than £50, which was excessive, whereas in America a patent could be taken out for £3 or £4.

MR. PEELE said, the law officers of the Crown received certain fees in respect of patents, in return for which they were expected to examine specifications, and sometimes had to call persons before them. The aggregate sum appeared a large one; but the law officers only received two guineas upon each provisional protection, and one guinea upon each grant of a patent, and, considering the large incomes made by barristers at the head of their profession, it was not excessive. A reduction in the charge, of taking out a patent had within the last few years been made, and the charge, which used to be £300, was now £25 for a period of three years. The Commissioners of Patents did not recommend any further reduction of the fee, which they said would increase the number of speculative and useless patents.

CAPTAIN JERVIS said, that the fees for a three years' patent were £50, not £25.

MR. CONINGHAM said, the reduction of the fees to a low amount would be a great boon to inventors.

Motion made, and Question,

"That the item of £9,166, for Fees payable to the Law Officers of the Crown, be omitted from the proposed Vote,"

—put, and negatived.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £13,018, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Fisheries in Scotland, to the 31st day of March 1862."

MR. CAIRD said, he objected to the system by which a charge was made for the use of a particular brand. It would be better if the trade were left entirely to protect itself. As matters stood the careless and the careful curers of fish were placed on the same footing. He also wished to ask whether orders had been given to the war steamers engaged in protecting the fishery, so that no such catastrophe as that which had recently resulted in the death of a fisherman should again occur?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the policy of the Fishery Board had been frequently under consideration, and a Commission was issued three or four years ago, who inquired on the spot and reported to the Treasury, in consequence of which report an Act was introduced by which certain fees were charged for branding. He was partly responsible for the Bill, but confessed that he entertained considerable doubt as to the policy of the provisions. There was, however, a strong feeling in Scotland on the subject, and if efforts were made to abolish the Fishery Board, corresponding efforts, he believed, would be made to maintain it, the brand being regarded as of essential service to the foreign trade. With regard to the unfortunate occurrence connected with the Jackall, the Fishery Board were fully aware of the gravity of the circumstances, and, no doubt, would give the necessary instructions to the commander of the vessel, so that no occurrence of this sort might happen again.

MR. LOCKE said, that as all parties seemed agreed that that was a most objectionable payment, he would move that the sum of £13,018 be omitted from the estimate.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS explained that last year upwards of £3,800 had been received by the Board in the shape of branding fees, and is also obtained by other means £3,000; so that if these two sums were deducted from the Vote, it would be seen that the money actually to be paid by the country for the support of the Board was only half of the Vote.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he trusted that the Committee would not entertain the proposal of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Locke), especially as some portion of the Vote was distributed in pensions.

MR. CAIRD said, he believed that there was a general feeling in Scotland that the Fishery Board would disappear altogether. At the same time what had been done to improve the fishing ports was advantageous to them, and he hoped the hon. and learned Member's Amendment would not be persisted in.

MR. WHITE said, that a more rotten piece of protection was never known. It was usual, however, in such cases to vote the pensions, and he trusted that his hon. Friend would amend his proposal accordingly.

MR. COLLINS said, he also objected to the Vote, on the ground that there was no more reason for expending the public money in branding herrings than in making roads and bridges in Scotland.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that so far from the money being expended in the improvement of harbours it was mainly spent in nets.

SIR JAMES FERGUSSON said, he must deny the accuracy of the statement made that the Vote was asked for the purpose of protection. The Commissioners reported that it was a national interest, and by no means an improper object to foster this branch of industry, in which a large number of the poorer classes were engaged. The grounds stated in opposition to the Vote were altogether inefficient to maintain that argument.

MR. LOCKE said, he did not wish to strike off the salaries and pensions, and was willing to reduce the Vote to £8,711. He objected to voting money for mere local matters, and they were often enough reminded of that when there was any money required for metropolitan improvements.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £4,247, be granted to Her Majesty, to pay the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Fisheries in Scotland, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 31; Noes 55: Majority 24.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

(25.) £2,000, Trustees of Manufactures (Scotland).

MR. HENNESSY said, that the Vote involved a greater job than the last. It was the only Board of manufactures supported out of the public money, and he would propose that the Vote should be negatived.

Motion made, and Question put,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge on account of the Annuity to the Board of Manufactures in Scotland, in discharge of Equivalents under the Treaty of Union, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 13: Majority 50.

Vote agreed to, as were also the three following Votes:—

(26.) £35,000, Local Dues under Treaties.

(27.) £3,500, Inspectors of Corn Returns.

(28.) £1,000, Boundary Survey (Ireland).

(29.) £11,930, to complete the sum for the Census of the population.

MR. CAIRD inquired why it was that the expense of the census in Scotland was proportionally greater than the expense in England or Ireland?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that the reason why the expense of the census in Ireland was less was because the police were the enumerators in that country. The greater area of Scotland in comparison with the population, and the greater difficulty of travelling, in consequence of the want of railways and the nature of the country, rendered the census proportionally dearer in Scotland than in England.

MR. PERL said, that another reason which increased the cost of taking the census in Scotland was a Motion proposed by the hon. Member himself last year, requiring the enumerators in Scotland to take an account of the number of occupied and unoccupied houses, of the number of houses building, and of the windows contained in the houses.

Vote agreed to.

(30.) £26,457, Telegraph Companies Subsidies.

In reply to Captain JERVIS,

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the Red Sea Telegraph Company might be said to be reduced to a state of neutralized existence; but it did not appear to the Government desirable to proceed at the present to any definite conclusion with respect to the financial arrangements involved. They were, however, of opinion that it would be desirable to ascertain at a moderate cost the condition of the line, and his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Trade had received some reports which he hoped would enable him shortly to apprise them more precisely as to the mode and extent of the inquiry which it would be expedient to undertake, in order that they might arrive at the root of the matter. So far as his information at present went he did not think the circumstances of the case very favourable.

In reply to Sir MORTON PETO,

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the Turkish Government were now employed in establishing a telegraphic line along the Euphrates from Brusa down to Bassora, by means of which he hoped communication would be opened with India.

Vote agreed to, as was also

(31.) £36,000, Malta and Alexandria Telegraph.

CHURCH RATES—LAW AMENDMENT
(No. 2) BILL—[MR. CROSS].

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CROSS said, that in rising to move the discharge of the order for the second reading of the Church Rates Law Amendment (No. 2) Bill, he had no wish to raise any discussion on the measure. He was anxious, however, to say a few words in explanation of the reasons which had induced him to bring forward the Bill and the reasons why he was about to withdraw it. It had not been brought in from any whim or fancy of his own; for he should very much mistrust his own judgment in bringing forward such a measure. The House would remember the tone in which the debate on the proposal to go into Committee on the Church Rates Abolition Bill was carried on, and it would also be remembered that the same tone was continued in Committee in the discussion of the Amendments which he had put upon the paper. It was in accordance with that tone that he had brought forward the Bill. He had frequently been asked why he had introduced the Bill when there was already one introduced in "another place" by the Duke of Marlborough, and one also in that House by the hon. Member for Buckingham (Mr. Hubbard). His answer was that the Bill of the Duke of Marlborough could never be discussed in that House; and as regarded the Bill of the hon. Member for Buckingham, so far as he could see in its then shape, it was impossible to hope that it would ever pass a second reading. The general tone in which his (Mr. Cross's) Amendments had been discussed, together with the expressed opinions of several hon. Gentlemen who had done him the honour to confer with him, had induced him to embody those Amendments and opinions in the Bill which stood in his name. That there might be exceptions to that Bill he thought would be gathered from the tone of the bench of Bishops in the discussion of the Bill of the Duke of Marlborough, and, perhaps, it would be viewed with alarm by extreme sections on both sides of the House. But he had introduced the Bill under advice, and, acting under the same advice that he withdrew it. The main reason for his decision was that at so late a period as the 24th July it would be impossible to get a House sufficiently large to discuss so important a measure. He must say he was one of those who thought the House of Commons was open to the rebuke that it was always willing to discuss the affairs of every nation under the sun, while it sometimes neglected the affairs of its own country. He was not sure that if the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary were asked some question as to the state of Madagascar or Lapland, there would not be a much more serious debate than there would be on a question as to church rates in this country. He withdrew the Bill against his own will, but, as he had said, acting under advice. A very serious question, however, remained. He hoped during the recess hon. Members would consider among themselves, and in consultation with their constituents, as to whether some wise and prudent measure could not be framed to settle the question. If a better measure than that he had proposed could be advised he should be glad to withdraw from the contest; but if nothing could be produced, then he should think it his duty to bring forward the Bill in the next Session. The conciliatory tone which had pervaded the debates on the church rate question during the Session was certainly encouraging, but a conciliatory tone only would not settle the question if the harmony was to be broken up whenever a proposal of any kind was put upon the papers. He hoped the Dissenters who wanted to see the question settled would be content with a measure which really took away the grievance of which they complained. On the other side he would ask hon. Members to consider whether the question in which they were interested, and in which he was himself deeply interested, namely, the maintenance of the national church, might not be assisted by such a Bill as that he had brought forward? The question was well put by the late Dr. Arnold in 1837, when he said the real problem was, how the grievances of Dissenters could be removed without at the same time destroying the nationality of the Church of England. And he added in 1837 what was almost enough to make them laugh in 1861—

"I for one do not regret the postponement of this great question for one more year, because it seems to me that we ought not when the interests are so large to attempt rashly to settle the question in a manner which might turn out again to be mischievous."

No one could accuse the House of Commons of having been rash in dealing with the question. Before he sat down he would remind the House that if they wished to preserve the nationality of the Church they must, as Dr. Arnold wisely expressed it, do all in their power to make it practically as well as nominally the Church of the nation at large. When church rates were first established the parish churches were open to all. Now, he would ask, who was to maintain the parish churches? At present the poor people of England were thrust into the farthest and darkest corners of the churches.

MR. SPEAKER said, he must remind the hon. Member that the question before the House was the discharge of the order.

MR. CROSS said, he would conclude by saying that if they desired to maintain the nationality of the Church the people ought to have the full use of the parish churches.

He trusted that hon. Members would during the recess apply themselves to the subject in such a way that the question might be settled next Session.

SIR MORTON PETO said, that he was not anxious to revive the discussion on the Bill, but he could not refrain from expressing his satisfaction that it had been withdrawn. Anything more objectionable could not be presented to the House than the Bill of the hon. Gentleman. It was infinitely worse than the present state of the law, either having regard to the Non-conformist community nor to the Church of England itself. It proposed the revival of church rates in all the large towns where they had been abolished, and to throw on the rates about 2,000 district churches which were at present sufficiently supported without them by voluntary contributions. In fact, there would be about 9,000,000 of people who were now exempt who would be brought within the meshes of the law by the Bill. The Bill would expose all the rural districts to social persecution. Every hon. Gentleman knew that there were but few men in those districts who were able to say what they wished in the matter without subjecting themselves to persecution, and the fact that they would have to send in a written notice of dissent every year was placing them on the horns of a dilemma more galling than the rates themselves. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Home Department said the other day that it was a generally recognized principle in their discussions on the subject not to give the Church a stronger remedy than she had at present, but the Bill would do so. On the other hand he could not conceive that the national Church, if it were a national Church, approved of the Bill, because it would denationalize that Church and reduce it to the level of a sect. If the hon. Gentleman wished for the settlement of this question, and if he wished that members of the Church of England alone should pay the rate, he had simply to bring in a Bill of a few lines to exempt all persons who did not themselves desire to pay, and that would practically give the hon. Gentleman more money than the Church at present received. There was a practical example of that in Manchester, Rochdale, and other towns where the rate had been abolished. If the hon. Member and those who thought with him would take that course, they would do that which was most consistent with the character of the Church of England itself, she would retain all that she had of her national character, Dissenters would have nothing to complain of, and they would all have the happiness of acting together in a harmony which ought never to have been disturbed.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he wished to remind the House that the Motion before them was a Motion for discharging the first of thirty-three orders that stood on the paper. The question of church rates had been amply discussed during the Session. He hoped, therefore, that desultory and profitless debate would not be carried on any further, and that they would not convert that House into a mere bobating society. He thought the question of church rates would be more profitably discussed in the newspapers during the recess, than by unpremeditated speeches in that House.

MR. HENLEY said, there was much force in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman, but he wished to make a few remarks in consequence of what had been said by the two hon. Members who had gone before. His hon. Friend (Mr. Cross) recommended that all persons during the recess should carefully consider the subject, and put their views in writing, and then they would be able to see how they differed. He agreed with his hon. Friend that they would see how they differed, and he thought that the speech of the hon. Baronet opposite did not look very favourable as regarded a compromise.

SIR CHARLES DOUGLAS said, he wished to explain that he had never said, as had been misreported, that he was in favour of a compromise, but simply he thought it desirable that hon. Gentlemen opposite should be allowed an opportunity of bringing forward their views. He denied that the withdrawal of the Bill of the hon. Member for Tavistock was owing to the introduction of the Bill of the hon. Member.

MR. DARBY GRIFFITH said, he hoped the Conservative Members would not fall into the error of carrying matters with too high a hand, and insisting upon reaction on this question. There was some danger of their raising their biddings—that was the rock on which they were likely to split. He would not follow the Conservative party into any course which had merely for its object to defeat measures brought in on the other side of the House without introducing some really good and efficient measure of their own.

For himself, he should refuse to follow the leaders of the Conservative party in any bigoted reaction on the subject, if such were attempted, as he believed that the time had come for a moderate and reasonable settlement of the question.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that although he did not agree with the hon. Baronet in his unqualified admiration of the voluntary system, yet it was his firm impression that that was the principle which must be adopted with respect to the large towns, but that its application to the Church of England in those towns should be guarded, so that it should not weaken the parochial system. He was decidedly of opinion that a totally different remedy was required for the rural districts and places where church rates were now maintained. He (Mr. Newdegate) regretted that it was totally impossible for him to express any approbation of the principle of the Bill before the House. As the House well knew, he had always maintained that the principle upon which the Church of England was based, that the only principle upon which the nationality of the Church, and her right to the property, which she held, could be maintained, was the principle of inclusion; that she is the Church of all who choose to accept her ministrations. The Bill of the hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Cross) was based on opposite principle, upon the principle of exclusion, and would operate to the destruction of the national character of the Church of England if passed into law. Taking the case of such a town as Birmingham, if the Bill became law, and if there was an attempt to enforce its provisions, it would do more to break up the growing good feeling which existed than any measure he could conceive; it would have this effect, that it would register the majority of the population of that town, including Dissenters, Nonconformists, those who had any personal difference with the clergy, those who merely objected to pay, and the poor, in a category which would be available for those who desired the subversion of the Church. The Bill would literally form in every parish of England a register for the use of those who desired to agitate against the Church, and that register would be formed at the expense of the Church itself. He would beg the friends of the Church of England to take that warning. He was convinced that the only safety for the Church of England was that she should adhere to the broad principle of her nationality, and that she should claim still to be by her constitution what she was by her principles, the Church of the poor. He begged the House to remember that if any ratepayer were poor he must claim the exemption from church rate tendered by the Bill, and he would then be excluded by the Bill from his common law right to a seat in his own parish church.

SECOND READING. ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment on Second Reading [3rd July].

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that he was favourable to the measure, but in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman who had charge of the Bill (Mr. Walpole) he would move that the order be postponed until the following Wednesday. At the same time, he did not think it likely the Bill would pass during the present Session.

Debate further adjourned till Wednesday next.

INDEMNITY BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

MR. HADFIELD said, he should oppose the Motion, on the ground that it was an Indemnity Bill for one class of Her Majesty's subjects, and not for all. For three consecutive years they had passed Bills of that nature, none of which had been printed. The right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, had said that those Bills were printed, but from inquiries which he had made he believed the right hon. Gentleman was mistaken. [Mr. BOUVIER handed the hon. Gentleman a printed copy of the Bill.] Well, he believed he might say that the Bill had never reached himself or hon. Members before. Why should it be rendered necessary to pass an indemnity Bill to protect persons omitting to make a declaration that was perfectly obsolete, useless, and ought to be blotted out of their statute book? He called the declaration which parties were called upon to make on taking certain offices a test, which had the effect in many instances of preventing men of fine mind from accepting office. The mere fact that it was necessary to pass an Indemnity Bill every year for protection of persons who did not make the declaration was a strong argument in favour of abolishing all tests of this description.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'this House, having, during each of thirty-one consecutive years, passed a Bill, which became Law, for indemnifying persons liable to make and subscribe, but who had not made and subscribed, the Declaration imposed by the Act of the ninth year of King George the Fourth, chapter seventeen, and having during each of three consecutive Sessions passed a Bill for abolishing such Declaration, will not be satisfied with any measure respecting such Declaration, except one for its abolition,'—instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Member had taken a very singular mode of benefiting the class whose cause he advocated, as his Motion, if carried would have the effect of rejecting the Indemnity Bill. He could not suppose that was his object, as the Bill indemnified persons who, by omitting to make the declarations required of officials and others, rendered themselves liable to penalties. He hoped the House would persist in the policy it had pursued for a number of years, and consent to go into Committee. The hon. Member really wished to engraft on this Bill that measure which he had passed through the House in the early part of the Session, but which had been rejected by the other House. It was a rule of the House that no Bill which it had passed could be re-introduced in the same Session, and the hon. Member, therefore, sought to evade that rule by the course he now adopted. His Bill was rejected in the Lords upon the second reading, by a majority of 49 to 38, and the more legitimate mode of proceeding would be to bring forward the same Bill in the next Session.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would remind the right hon. Baronet that the Test and Corporation Act was repealed upon the ground that, instead of passing annually an Indemnity Bill, as they had done time out of mind, to shield persons who did not take the declarations under that Act, they ought entirely to erase the Act from the statute book. He did not understand why, in the present case, the same argument should not apply to the wiping away entirely the test to which his hon. Colleague referred.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he would strongly advise his hon. Friend (Mr. Hadfield) not to divide the House upon his Amendment. At the same time he would express a hope that the Government would take up in the next Session the Bill which had three times passed the House.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, there was a vast difference between the declarations formerly required by the Test and Corporation Act which were declarations of religious belief, and that imposed by the Act to which the hon. Member's Motion applied. The latter declaration was only to the effect that a person admitted to any corporate office should not use the power thus accruing to him for the purpose of attacking the Church of England. That was not a grievous restriction, and he could not participate in the objections which had been urged to it by the hon. Member. He trusted he would, therefore, not interrupt the passing of the Indemnity Bill, which he himself admitted was necessary in other cases.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

LUNACY REGULATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he rose to move the second reading of the Bill. It was the same in substance as that which was read, pro forma, a second time by the House in 1858, and, on the Motion of the then Solicitor General, the hon. and learned Member for Belfast, referred to the Committee on Lunacy. That Committee made a report in July last year, and their recommendations had in some respects been followed in the present measure. The object of the measure was twofold—to provide for the more frequent visiting of lunatics under the care of the Court of Chancery, and to diminish the expense of the procedure. Upon one point the Bill did not adopt the recommendations of the Committee. It did not, as they suggested, propose to transfer the care of Chancery lunatics from the visitors in lunacy to the Lunacy Commissioners. There were under the care of the Court of Chancery 626 lunatics, and their aggregate incomes amounted to £333,000 per annum—a sum abundantly sufficient for defraying the expense of visitation by the present visitors; and it would be found that the duties cast upon those visitors were abundantly sufficient to occupy the whole of time at their disposal. It would be also found that the time of the Lunacy Commissioners was fully occupied. They had under their care at present 35,955 patients in asylums and public institutions; and those patients were to be visited at least twice, and in some instances four times yearly. The House ought, therefore, if they adopted the recommendation in the report, either to diminish the sphere of duty, or add to the number of the Commissioners; and under the circumstances it was deemed advisable to depart from the recommendation of the Committee on that particular point.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. HENLEY said, he rose to ask the Government to postpone the Bill, at all events, for a week, until his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole), the Chairman of the Committee, who was prevented by domestic affliction from attending that day, should be in his place and have an opportunity of stating his objections to it. For his own part, he doubted whether the Bill were an improvement on the existing system. It was a remarkable fact that less care was taken of the rich Chancery lunatics than of any other persons so afflicted. The pauper lunatics were visited once a month, and the patients in public and private asylums were visited at least six times in the year; but Chancery lunatics only received one visit in the year, and sometimes eighteen months elapsed between the visits of the Chancery visitors. He saw no proposition in the Bill to secure the Chancery lunatics in future from a state of things which could only exist under the Court of Chancery. It was stated in evidence that one of the visitors suggested a certain course of action which he thought would be beneficial to the lunatics; but when the recommendation came under the vigilant eyes of the Chancery official, he immediately said it was impertinent, and ought not to be put in the report. What might have proved a consolation to the lunatics was struck out, and never came before the Lord Chancellor at all. At present the Chancery visitors consisted of three persons—two doctors and one lawyer—but the Bill provided that in future the visitors should be one doctor and one lawyer. As there were 626 lunatics scattered all over the country they could hardly receive more than one visit each in the year from those gentlemen. There was certainly a provision that lunatics were not to be seen less than twice in the year, but the only machinery by which it could be carried into effect was cut out of the Bill. He would not give much for visits that were to be made in such a hurried manner. It was provided that the doctor and lawyer need not visit the patients at the same time, but he could not see how the condition of a lunatic was to be improved by the visit of a lawyer. The provision of the Bill which gave a new power of dealing with the property of lunatics under a certain amount was as important as any in the Bill. He deemed it a beneficial provision, but its advantage would be very much impaired if these unfortunate persons, scattered all over the country, were to be driven up to one of the Chancery offices in London to get the benefit of the proposed arrangement. There ought to be some machinery by which the benefit of that provision might be more easily obtainable over the length and breadth of the land. There was a clause in the Bill enabling pensions to be given to the present visitors, but he did not know on what principle they were supposed to be entitled to pensions at all. He would, therefore, move the postponement of the second reading for a week, in order that his right hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge University, who had devoted so much time and attention to the subject, might have an opportunity of urging whatever objections he entertained to the measure.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Debate be now adjourned."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not persevere in his Motion. He the (Attorney General) would not ask for the Committee till that day week, so that every object which the right hon. Gentleman who was absent (Mr. Walpole) had in view might be secured.

MR. HENLEY said, he understood his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole) to object to the second reading of the Bill at all.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he had come down to oppose the Bill. He could not but condemn the proposals for compensation in the Bill; and it was his strong opinion that, considering the amount of work to be done, it would be far better to appoint two medical men as visitors than one medical man and one lawyer.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Henley) persisted in the Motion he had made, it would preclude the Bill from being gone on with that Session. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would agree to the proposal of his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General to go into Committee on that day week. The Bill was brought in with the approbation of the Lunacy Commissioners and the late Lord Chancellor. The present Lord Chancellor was also of opinion that some change was necessary, but he did not regard that Bill as a final arrangement. He believed the Lord Chancellor thought that the two visitors should both be medical men. He was much dissatisfied with the present arrangement, and he thought it better to make some such change as that now proposed, to provide that amount of supervision which was necessary for the safety of the patients.

MR. HENLEY said, that after the statement of the right hon. Baronet he would take the course suggested, on the understanding that his right hon. Friend (Mr. Walpole), on that day week, should not be considered to take an improper course if, on going into Committee, he brought forward a Motion on the subject. He believed the great objection to the Bill was that it would stand in the way of a consolidation of the law relating to Chancery lunatics. Perhaps the hon. and learned Attorney General would consider whether the Bill could not be limited as to time.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for Wednesday.

LACE FACTORIES BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 (Recited Acts to apply to Lace Factories, and to the Employment of Females, young Persons, Youths, and Children therein).

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, if the Bill were what it pretended to be, he should have offered no objection to it. The Factory Act was generally admitted to have proved a blessing to the country at large. It was one of the best efforts of domestic legislation which had ever passed, but the Bill before the Committee was certainly a reversal of the policy adopted in that Act as regards women and children engaged in factories. That policy was that they should not be worked beyond their physical powers. Their hours of labour were restricted by the Factory Act to between six a.m. and six p.m., and on Saturdays to between six a.m. and two p.m., with an hour and a half for meals. No child was allowed by the Factory Act to work more than half a day up to the age of thirteen, the other half being spent at school; and no boy was permitted to do the work of a man till he was eighteen years of age. But what were the innovations proposed by this Bill, which, they were told, was mainly founded on the provisions of the Factory Act? The meal hours were entirely left to the arbitrary discretion of the masters. The hands were to be allowed to go to their meals irregularly. The age when boys were to act as men was reduced from eighteen to sixteen; and what was worse the age of children was reduced from thirteen to eleven. The hours of work were extended from two p.m. to half-past four on Saturdays, two hours and a half more than the Factory Act permitted. All these innovations, instead of being in favour of the women and children, were in favour of the masters; and he thought the House was bound to look with peculiar jealousy at any Bill which favoured the masters alone. It had been said that the Bill was founded on the Report of Mr. Seymour Tremheere; but it was not so. His recommendations were that from the 1st of August, 1862, the Factories Act should be applied to the lace factories, subject to two exceptions—one, that boys above the age of sixteen should be allowed to work between the hours of four a.m. and ten p.m., but not more than nine hours within that time; and the other, that the provisions of the Factories Act as to the fencing of the main shaft of machinery should not be required. He (Mr. Bernal Osborne) did not intend to move anything against the Bill, because he thought Amendments might be made in it in Committee. He hoped the House would give him their support in moving those Amendments.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he hoped the Committee would give effect to the arguments which had been advanced by the hon. Gentleman. Two or three years ago a large number of petitions had been presented to the House, signed by something like 10,000 persons engaged in the lace manufacture in Nottingham and Manchester, praying for legislation on the subject; but in deference to the wishes of the masters an inquiry was instituted. A Commissioner was accordingly sent down into the district, and to the great surprise of the operatives, who had prepared a case disclosing the great hardships under which they suffered, they were met by the masters, who admitted that the alleged hardships did exist, that legislation was necessary, and that it should proceed on the basis of Mr. Grainger's Report presented twenty years ago. The Committee would, therefore, bear in mind, if there were no distinct cases of hardship embraced in Mr. Seymour Tremenheere's Report, it was not the fault of the operatives, who had no opportunity of bringing them forward.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to have some statement from his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary whether it was his intention to adhere to the policy of the Factory Act. In the absence of such a statement the better course would be to report Progress at once, and say whether they should go on with the Bill.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was quite prepared to discuss any Amendment that might be proposed in the Committee. Hon. Gentlemen who had read the Report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere would have seen that his object was to investigate the problem how far the provisions of the Acts regulating factories for the spinning of cotton and other textile fabrics could be applied to the peculiar case of the lace factories. It was admitted on all hands that there was a difference in the manufactures. Several proposals which were made in former years to extend the Factory Acts to lace manufactures were always resisted on the ground of the peculiar circumstances of the lace manufacture. Mr. Seymour Tremenheere examined the subject very carefully; he showed what were the distinctions between the two manufactures, and recommended some special regulations, no doubt, founded on the principle of the Factory Act, but different, for the reasons he assigned. He wished the Committee to understand that the Bill was entirely in conformity with the views of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere, who had conducted a detailed investigation into the trade with great industry and success, and in a manner conciliatory both to the masters and men. The hon. Member for Nottingham, the chief seat of the lace manufacture, would be able to give more information on the subject; but, as no advantage would result from reporting Progress, he hoped the Committee would now proceed to discuss the different clauses of the Bill.

MR. COBBETT said, he understood that the right hon. Gentleman, in introducing the Bill, described it as one which there was no occasion to discuss, as it was founded on the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere, which would be found to contain the substance and provisions of the measure. The right hon. Gentleman now repeated that the Bill was founded on the recommendations of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere. If it were so, he should have made no observations on this occasion; but, on the other hand, he felt bound to say the Bill seemed so adverse to the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere that the House ought to discuss that question before it went any further. His hon. Friend had not gone fully into the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere, and he might, therefore, state that the Commissioner, having examined on the spot the masters and workmen, had divided them into two classes—Firstly, the opponents of legislation altogether; secondly, those adverse to legislation on such matters upon principle, but who thought that in this, as in the factory case, there was a necessity for legislation. That last class comprised a very large body of master manufacturers, to whose evidence he referred, and all of whom agreed more or less to that which he reported—that a Bill should be brought in. He closed his statement with regard to this class of opponents by saying that the particular modifications they suggested were various. He then proceeded, "The conclusion I have come to, upon a careful consideration of the whole, is," &c. Here, then, was a gentleman, commissioned to examine into questions of this kind, and on whose reports to the Crown one or two Acts of Parliament had been passed. He had applied his mind to the examination of the subject, and, after due consideration, what did he say?—

“I recommend that, from and after the 1st of August, 1862, the Factory Acts should be applied to the lace manufacture, subject to the following exceptions:—1. That youths above the age of sixteen should be permitted to work between the hours of four a.m. and ten p.m.; but not more than nine hours within those hours. 2. That the provisions of the Factory Acts, in regard to requiring machinery to be fenced off, should not extend to the lace manufacture.”

These were the only two exceptions. He did not attribute much importance to the latter exception of fencing off the machinery. The only real exception was that youths of the age of sixteen should be permitted to work between the hours of four a.m. and ten p.m., but not more than nine hours within those hours. How did that differ from the Factory Acts in existence? A young person at eighteen might be made to work the full factory hours, from six a.m. till six p.m.; or, being a male, to work in the night time; but that could scarcely be done. Were they, then, to go to the Commissioner? He must say on all these questions he was against employing a Commissioner to meet the masters on one side and the operatives on the other, and decide between the two. He would much rather have a Select Committee of that House for obtaining evidence on which to found an Act of Parliament; but, at any rate, they had got the report of Mr. Commissioner Tremenheere that the Factory Act should be extended to the lace manufacture, with the exception that they might take a boy of sixteen out of his bed at four a.m. and make him work till ten p.m., only employing him nine hours within that period. But the Bill was not framed in good faith, consistently with the Commissioner's report. The 4th Clause interfered with what was considered one of the most valuable parts of the Factory Acts—the half holiday, by extending the period of work from 2 p.m. to 4.30 p.m. Clause 5 extended the work of 10½ hours from young persons of thirteen to children of eleven. The noble Lord the Member for Chichester (Lord Henry Lennox) had given notice of an Amendment to that clause, and he should give it his support. When the age of thirteen was sought to be fixed by the Factory Act, the proposition met with the greatest opposition, and it was stated by the manufacturers that the effect of such a provision would be that there would be 35,000 children thrown out of employment. The clause, however, was carried, and he believed that not even five children had been thrown out of employment by it. There was another most important clause—referred to Clause 6, which dealt in the most insidious manner with the meal hours. The great necessity had been to fix the meal hours; without that, men, women, and children were obliged to remain in the mill, and consume, in an unwholesome atmosphere, their food as best they could. In fact, up to 1833 factory operatives had no meal time. The 3 & 4 Vict., c. 103, enacted that one hour and a half should, bond fide, be allowed for meals; but the mill did not stop, the machinery ran on, and that gave rise to the shifting system. Finding their intentions frustrated, the Legislature in the 7th Victoria fixed the meal hours more definitively, and declared that the operative should not be allowed to remain during those hours in any room in which any manufacturing process was carried on. That rendered it almost impossible that there should be any evasion; but still evasion did occur, and, therefore, by the Earl of Shaftesbury's Act of 1846 it was provided that if any of the restricted persons should be found in a mill at a breakfast or dinner hour they should be taken to be employed, and the master was fineable therefor. According to the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere these enactments ought not to be disturbed; but in the Bill there were special provisions to enable the masters to do that very thing towards the lace hands which the Legislature had so carefully provided masters should not do as regarded woollen and cotton spinners. The benefits given by the Factory Acts to the factory hands were specially excluded from the lace factories. The consequence would be that the breakfast and dinner hour would be virtually at the disposal of the master or overlooker. In short, the Bill was not a Factory or a Ten and Half Hours' Bill, but a Twelve Hours' Bill. He did not know who drew the Bill. It was said to be the Commissioner's Bill. If so they ought to have him before a Select Committee, to inquire why he had so far deviated from his own report. He hoped, at all events, the Committee would make the Bill conformable to Mr. Seymour Tremenheere's recommendations.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 2 (Youths between the Age of Sixteen and Eighteen may be employed between 4 a.m. and 10 p.m., but not more than Nine Hours between those Hours),

MR. PAGET said, he wished to move to insert in line 22 after the word "day" the words

"And provided also that it shall not be lawful to employ any youth both earlier than six of the clock in the morning and later than six of the clock in the evening of the same day, nor to employ any youth both later than six of the clock in the evening of any day and earlier than six of the clock in the morning of the next succeeding day."

He was quite prepared to defend the clauses of the Bill, which were founded on the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere and the evidence he had collected with great ability and impartiality. Both masters and men agreed in their support of the Bill.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he could easily understand that no objections were taken to the provisions of the Bill by the masters or men; but he had spoken in the interest of women and children. He had carefully read the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere, and he defied the right hon. Gentleman to prove that this Bill was founded on its recommendations. He should propose a proviso requiring that a youth of sixteen should not be employed as a man without a surgeon's certificate that he was able for the work.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Clause 3 was also agreed to.

Clause 4 (Women, Young Persons, and Children may be employed until half-past four o'clock on Saturdays),

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he should move the omission of the clause. It proposed to extend the hours during which women and children engaged in lace factories might be employed in labour from two o'clock on Saturday, as fixed in the Factory Act, to four o'clock. He could see no reason for departing in the present case from the principle laid down in the Factory Act.

MR. PAGET said, he should support the clause. Lace factories were in a peculiar position. Besides the omission of the clause would prove no benefit to the operatives. When two men worked together their hours of labour were not above nine hours a day each; and it would be a great loss to them—in fact it would be a robbery on them—if they were not allowed to work for a few hours on a Saturday afternoon, as they would not be if they could not have the services of the threaders and winders when the warp came off. There were no class of men in Her Majesty's dominions who worked a shorter time; and any one that knew Nottingham, the principal seat of the lace trade, would be aware that there were thousands of small gardens in the environs of that town which were cultivated by the workmen. The work of the winders and threaders was exceedingly light. Even when they were sixteen hours in the factory, the "shifts" were so arranged as to be only ten hours actually at work, and were allowed to go out to play in the intervals.

LORD HENRY LENNOX suggested that the "shifts" might easily be arranged so as to allow the workpeople to have a half-holiday on Saturday. Besides the object of the measure was not for the benefit of the men, but for that of the women and children. In the first Factory Act the silk throwsters were exempted from the obligation placed upon cotton and woollen manufacturers to close at two o'clock on Saturday afternoons, but by a subsequent Act the silk throwsters were by their own request placed under the same rule.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE denied that lace making was such a delightful business as the hon. Gentleman represented; on the contrary, he found it stated in the Report that the boys had pale and ghastly countenances, and did not seem to thrive. As to the argument that the men had gardens, the hon. Gentleman could not object to their being allowed two hours more a week to cultivate them.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, if he were not misinformed the workpeople themselves did not object to this clause. The Committee would, therefore, act with perfect safety in assenting to it. The principle of the Bill was that the regulations of the Factory Acts were to be extended to the lace trade, with certain adaptations. The provision contained in the clause was one of those adaptations, and he had yet heard no good argument against it.

LORD HENRY LENNOX stated that he had received letters from a great many operatives against the clause. The general feeling among the workpeople seemed to be that the clause should be omitted; but, at the same time, rather than endanger the Amendment of which he had given notice on the 5th Clause, they would consent to submit to what they considered an injustice.

MR. COBBETT remarked that the arguments of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Paget) were exactly the same as were employed against the Cotton Factories Act.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he saw no reason why the Committee should depart from the Factory Acts in the particular. It was for the moral as well as the physical advantage of the lace-workers that they should have a half-holiday on Saturdays.

MR. AYRTON said, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give up the clause. Adam Smith had too truly said that his principles must lead to the degradation of the work-people unless those principles were held in check by higher considerations. It was said that though these unfortunate children were kept at the beck and call of their master for sixteen hours a day they were only worked ten. The truth was they could not work them sixteen hours, otherwise they undoubtedly would. He denied that factories or mines, or any other business could not be arranged with a due regard to decency and humanity.

MR. PAGET remarked that, as Clause 1 stood, young persons could not be kept in lace factories for more than twelve hours a day. They could not, as he had already stated, be actually employed during the whole of that time. If he thought, with the hon. and learned Gentleman, that they could be confined for sixteen hours a day, he should at once agree to release them at two o'clock on Saturdays.

MR. HENLEY said, that workpeople of all kinds were extremely anxious to get a half-holiday on Saturdays, and he should be sorry to see any class of factory operatives deprived of so valuable a privilege.

MR. AYRTON said, that as he read the Bill, he certainly understood that a boy of eleven, who to all intents and purposes was still a child, could be taken into a factory at six in the morning and kept till ten at night.

MR. COLLINS stated that, in the manufacturing districts in the north, no portion of the Factory Acts had given so much satisfaction as those clauses which enabled the workpeople to have Saturday afternoon to themselves. He should, therefore, vote for the Amendment.

Question put, "That Clause 4 stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 44; Noes 57: Majority 13.

Clause 5 (Interpretation of Terms),

Lord Henry Lennox

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he rose to move that in both places in which the word "eleven" occurred in the clause the word "thirteen" should be substituted for it. His object was to extend to the lace trade that provision of the Factory Acts which prohibited the employment of children for more than half-time until they reached the age of thirteen. One objection which had been stated to his Amendment was that the work to which children were put in lace factories was comparatively light and easy. He did not deny that part of the work was so; but Mr. Grainger had shown, in his valuable reports, that the threading of bobbins, if carried on for a certain number of hours, was highly injurious to the eye-sight. It should be recollected, moreover, that the lace children were confined in heated rooms, that their ears were stunned by the noise of machinery driven by steam, and that they were compelled to swallow every working-day of their lives innumerable particles of blacklead. Another objection to his Amendment was that, if carried, it would be an inducement to the masters to evade the Act by having the winding and threading done in their own houses. His reply was that all experience showed that the enormous advantages to be derived from the use of steam would be quite sufficient to prevent any evasion of the Act in the manner thus contemplated. If children were allowed to become full-timers at the age of eleven, the inevitable result would be that the masters would not employ them at all until they reached that age. There would be no half-timers, and in that way the masters would avoid the expense of educating any portion of their hands; whereas, if his Amendment were agreed to, the masters must either employ children before they were thirteen years of age, or consent to lose their services altogether, as parents could not afford to allow their children to go about idle for so long a period. It might be said that the existing system of education under the Factory Acts was so perfect that children were now as far advanced at eleven as they used to be at thirteen years of age. He admitted that considerable progress had been made during the last few years, but there was still ample room for improvement in the mode of conducting education under the Factory Acts. Mr. Baker, one of the factory inspectors, stated in a recently published report that the system of education might be improved in many respects, and he pointed out the great evils which existed in the silk-throwing trade owing to young persons being made full-timers at the age of eleven. The evidence appended to the report of Mr. Tremenhoe contained statements to the same effect from masters and others. Mr. William Simkins, a lace agent in Nottingham, said he had often thought it strange that the Factory Acts were not applied to the lace trade. There were difficulties about it, he added, some years ago, but he did not see any material difficulty now. Mr. Alderman Felkin of Nottingham, who had always been opposed to legislation, said his opinion was that the labour of women and children ought, after a reasonable delay, to be restricted within factory hours. It would thus be seen that his Amendment was supported by high authority. The lace-workers did not claim any special exemption for themselves. All he asked on their behalf was that the same advantages should now be extended to them which they would have obtained had they been included, as they ought to have been included, in the Factory Acts.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 18, to leave out the word "eleven" and insert the word "thirteen."

MR. PAGET said, that the number of children who were employed in these factories was small, and it would not be worth while for the factory owners to keep books and to make the necessary arrangements for carrying out the half-time system. Whatever age was fixed, no children under that age would be employed. If, therefore, the Amendment was carried, children under thirteen would cease to be employed in lace factories; but, as there was a good deal of work which might be done in private houses, the effect would be to encourage contractors, who would get the children together in unwholesome and ill-ventilated houses, and watch them closely at their work lest a moment should be lost, because the profit of the contractors would be the difference between the cost of the labour to them and the price which they would obtain for it. The work in the lace factories was well known to be of the lightest description, with frequent intervals, during which children employed in them might go out of doors and play; and it differed materially from the work in cotton or woollen factories, where constant attendance had to be given to the machinery. He should be very sorry if the Bill were lost, because it would in a great measure prevent the miserable results which sometimes arose from girls being employed until late hours in the evening, and their parents not knowing for certain when to expect them home; but the adoption of the Amendment would either lead to the work being done in houses over which the inspectors would have no control, or to only those children being employed who were over thirteen years of age. He thought he should be acting inconsistently with his desire to promote the education of children if he were to support the Amendment. They could not expect parents to give up the advantage of their children's labour long after the time when they were physically able to earn wages; and it was stated by the Education Commissioners that the effect of the Factory Acts in many instances had been that parents neglected the education of their children in their earlier years, depending on the education which they would receive later under the Factory Acts. If a parent received full wages from a child between the ages of eleven and thirteen he could afford to allow the younger children to have an education before attaining the age of eleven; but if the law compelled him to give up half the wages of the elder child he would be very apt to put the younger children to work under some contractor in order to fill up the gap. It was not a question of serious moment to the masters, but it was greatly to the interest of the children that the clause should stand as it appeared in the Bill.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, the Amendment was perfectly in accordance with Mr. Seymour Tremenhoe's report. The hon. Member for Nottingham (Mr. Paget) had treated it as if it were merely a question of education, but a higher consideration even than education ought to have some weight—he meant health—and he asserted that no child of eleven years of age could be kept at work $10\frac{1}{2}$ hours daily without deterioration of its physical strength. He denied that the work would be sent to private houses, as the advantage of steam-power was so great that it would certainly be done where that power was available. Directly they had to deal with children working amid the whirl and whiz of machinery in a high temperature they were bound to follow out the provisions of the Factory Acts. He should support the Amendment—not to allow children to work full time until they were thirteen years of age.

MR. AYRTON said, the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenhoe contained unanswered—able arguments in favour of the noble Lord, and any one who read it must be convinced of the justice of the Amendment. The report was right, and the Bill wrong. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would adopt the reasoning of the Commissioner, and not the arguments which his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham had felt it his duty to state to the Committee.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, his object had really been to mediate fairly between the interests concerned. It was not his object to give undue protection to the masters, or to withdraw from the workpeople any security which they might obtain under the strict provisions of the Factory Act. It was admitted on all hands that there was a considerable difference between lace and silk or cotton factories, and the existence of that difference had led to the postponement of legislation until that time. The question was whether the modifications which he proposed were unreasonable. It was said that he had not literally followed the report of the Commissioner. After the report was made it had become the subject of criticism and discussion. The Commissioner, having received representations on points of detail, had thought fit to modify his views, and the Government had thought it better to adapt the Bill to the altered convictions of the Commissioner rather than adhere to those which he originally entertained, because those altered convictions were the result of discussion and matured consideration. With regard to the question whether the age should be thirteen or eleven, he thought it would be more advantageous to the people to retain the clause as it stood, but if that opinion should turn out to be fallacious it would be very easy in a future Session to alter so small a detail. The Bill would put lace factories under the Factories Acts, and would do so very effectually, except in some small points like that. The danger was that if they screwed it up too tight the Bill would fail in its operation, either through its being evaded or the non-employment of the class of young persons whom it was intended to benefit. He could only judge from information which he received from persons who had investigated the subject; but he understood that there was a great difference between factory labour and lace labour, and that young persons were worked with much less severity in lace than in cotton factories. One great difference was that they could sit down, and there were greater intervals of rest during their work. As his hon. Friend the Member for Nottingham (Mr. Paget) had pointed out, the masters might cease to employ children under the age of thirteen, and certain portions of the work might be taken to their homes, which was probably much more close and unwholesome than the factory. He would suggest that they should watch the operation of the Bill, and if thirteen or twelve should turn out to be a better age than eleven, they might amend it in a future Session. It was better to proceed cautiously, and not to take a leap in the dark. He should, therefore, advise the Committee to agree to the clause as it stood.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, that all the experience which they had had of the Factory Act proved that the age of thirteen years was an advantageous limit, and when he was advised to proceed cautiously he took it as a warning not wittingly to sanction any retrogression. If they established a different limit by this Act from that which had been found advantageous under the Factory Act they might be told that it was the limit which they ought to adopt in the Factory Act. The arguments in favour of a departure from the general principle now recognized were, in his opinion, inconclusive. He did not think it would be a great misfortune if children under thirteen were employed at their own homes; and as to the Bill affecting only a few children, that was a good reason for not making the limit of age in lace factories an exception to the general rule. If there was such a great difference between lace and other factories as the right hon. Secretary for the Home Department seemed to infer they ought not to apply the Factory Act at all to the lace factories; but if they determined to apply it, they should adhere to the limit which the Factory Act assigned. If that limit operated unfavourably it would be time enough hereafter to amend the Act; but present experience was in favour of making the age of thirteen the limit, and he should, therefore, vote for the Amendment of the noble Lord.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the difficulty which they had to contend with was the natural wish of parents to get as much as they could out of their children, and he thought great weight attached to the objection that if too great a limit of age was insisted upon, an alteration would be made in the system of manufacture by which the children would have to exchange millwork under Government supervision for private work under the pressure of a hard taskmaster. If the mode of conducting the trade were once changed in that way it would not be easy to change it back again. Compromises rarely succeeded, but he would suggest twelve, instead of thirteen. They might begin at twelve, and, perhaps, they would get to thirteen in a year or two.

MR. COLLINS remarked that he was rather inclined to think that twelve would be better than eleven or thirteen.

MR. COBBETT objected to tampering with the Factory Act. The proposed measure was a retrograde movement, or would lead to it, and Mr. Walker of Bradford, in a letter to him, after expressing that opinion, said he would rather see the Bill thrown out than have the 6th Clause remain unamended. The Amendment was perfectly in accordance with Mr. Seymour Tremenheere's report, and when it was said that Mr. Seymour Tremenheere had reconsidered the question it was well to remember two or three dates. Mr. Seymour Tremenheere received his instructions on the 23rd of November, and made his report on the 20th of March. Four months were occupied in making inquiries. The Bill was introduced on the 31st of May, so that it could scarcely be said that an opinion formed in the interval between the 20th of March and the 31st of May was more matured than the opinion over which it prevailed. The Committee had reported in favour of legislating for children in lace factories as for children in cotton and woollen factories, and the noble Lord would only be doing right in adhering to that proposition. As to children being thrown out of employment, that argument was used in 1836, and was proved by experience to be entirely fallacious. Children were employed because the master wanted them; and if masters employed older persons they would have to give higher wages.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he thought it a singular view to call the proposed clause retrograde legislation. At present there was no limit of age. He proposed to fix it at eleven; and because he did not fix it at thirteen it was said to be a retrograde step. If two people were walking, and one proposed to go eleven miles and the other thirteen, surely it could not be said that the one who went eleven miles went back, because he did not go thirteen?

He did not wish to appear unreasonable; and, therefore, if it met with the general concurrence of the Committee, he would accept twelve instead of eleven.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, that Mr. Seymour Tremenheere deliberately fixed the age at thirteen years, and the object of his Amendment was simply to carry out that gentleman's recommendation. He should, therefore, adhere to his Amendment. It was, moreover, an error to suppose there was a great deal of leisure in lace factories, as by double sets of bobbins and carriages, which were now provided by more than one-third of the trade, the labour was rendered continuous.

Question, "That the word 'Eleven' stand part of the clause, put, and negatived."

LORD HENRY LENNOX moved to insert "thirteen."

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he should prefer "twelve."

MR. NEWDEGATE said, there was a great demand for the labour of children, and they ought to be protected.

MR. PAGET said, that with reference to what had fallen from the noble Lord (Lord Henry Lennox) it was quite a mistake to suppose that there was continuous labour where there was a double set of bobbin machines.

Question put, "That the word 'thirteen' be there inserted."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 60; Noes 56: Majority 4.

Clause ordered to stand part of the Bill.
Clause 6 (Time for Meals).

MR. PAGET proposed that the words "five o'clock" should be substituted for "six o'clock" in the latter part of the clause.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. COLLINS said, he should oppose the clause. The object of the Factory Acts was to secure to the workpeople a bond fide time in which they might take their meals in the same comfort as was enjoyed by other classes; and he saw no reason why the workers in lace factories should be placed in a different position in this respect from the workers in cotton factories. When persons brought biscuits or other refreshments with them into the factory, it was found practically impossible to carry out the intention of the Legislature.

MR. PAGET said, it was absolutely necessary that the system of working by shifts should be carried on in these factories if the English manufacturer was not to be placed at a serious disadvantage with his French and Belgian rivals, who already trod very close on his heels. It would, however, be impossible to work by shifts if a lace factory must be cleared of all the workpeople in the same manner as in the cotton and woollen-factories. The enormous capital required to furnish machinery for lace-making rendered it of the utmost importance that that machinery should not be forced to remain longer idle than was absolutely necessary. In the interests of the workpeople, as well as of the employers, he trusted that the clause would be retained.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, that all through that discussion the Government had made a very faint opposition to the propositions emanating from the other side of the House. If the Committee were now legislating wrongly, it was all the Government's fault in not supplying full information on the subject. They had heard that the report of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere had been reconsidered. Had there been any reports since then? And why was not the report of Mr. Redgrave, Inspector of Lace Factories, produced? As to what the hon. Member for Nottingham had said about foreign competition, that was the old exploded argument they had so often heard used against the Factory Acts. According to the evidence of Mr. Cox, a large employer, our manufacturers were now in a much better position than they were in before, particularly with regard to France, in consequence of the new treaty. Before that treaty the importation of lace into France was totally prohibited. The Home Secretary had described the Bill as a walking match, in which the right hon. Gentleman wished to go eleven miles and his hon. Friend thirteen; but unless its title was to be a pure misnomer the clause must be struck out. All who had voted for making the measure conform to the Factory Acts, and to the recommendations of Mr. Seymour Tremenheere, were bound to support the hon. Member for Knaresborough in resisting the clause.

MR. COBBETT said, that the omission from the Bill of the mealtime clause of the Factory Acts, which was framed with great care and circumspection, would have the practical effect of making the children work twelve hours a day. Say what they would, if the child was not to have his proper mealtimes away from the atmosphere of the factory, he must be held to be at continuous work from six to six. If the Commissioner had thought that the mealtime clause of the Factory Act would be destructive to the lace trade, he would surely have stated so in his report.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that as the report by Mr. Redgrave, to which the hon. Member for Liskeard had referred, had no existence, it was impossible to produce it. [Mr. B. OSBORNE: Is there no letter?] No letter. Mr. Redgrave might have written a private letter, but he had written no official document that could be produced to the House. As to the Commissioner not having reported on the subject of mealtimes, the difference between the labour in an ordinary factory and that carried on in a lace factory was so great that he supposed it could not have been conceived that anybody would propose to extend to the latter the restrictive regulations as to mealtimes now applicable to the former. He was unwilling to agree to the omission of the clause as it stood in the Bill; but he had no objection to add a proviso declaring that no woman, child, or young person should be employed in any manner during mealtimes.

MR. COLLINS said, he wished to ask the Chairman, whether it was not too late for such a Motion to be made, the question that the clause as amended stand part of the Bill having been previously put?

THE CHAIRMAN said, it was too late.

CAPTAIN STACPOOLE asked, whether the Bill would extend to Ireland?

MR. HENNESSY said, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman, the Home Secretary, would be good enough to reply to the question.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that before answering that question perhaps he would be permitted to put one in return, were there any lace factories in Ireland?

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: Yes, in Limerick.

MR. HENNESSY: And the lace is the best that is made in the United Kingdom.

MR. CONINGHAM said, he should support the extension of the regulations of the Factory Acts relating to meal hours, upon sanitary grounds.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he must plead ignorance of the fact that there were any lace manufactories in Ireland. The existing Factory Acts extended to Ireland, and there was a factory inspector for that country. The United Kingdom was mentioned in the preamble of the Bill, and, therefore, he apprehended that the proposed extension of the provisions of the Factory Acts would apply both to Ireland and Scotland.

Question put, "That Clause 6, as amended, stand part of the Bill."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 49; Noes 59: Majority 10.

The remaining Clauses and Schedules were agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported; as amended, to be considered To-morrow.

EPISCOPAL AND CAPITULAR ESTATES ACT CONTINUANCE, &c., BILL

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he would move that this Bill be read the second time.

MR. HENLEY said, that the measure would naturally have attracted extremely little attention but for the beautiful hieroglyphic "&c." attached to the end of its modest title. Nothing could be more objectionable than the introduction of matter of substance into a Continuance Bill, and he trusted that the House would not allow matter to be inserted in the proposed continuance measure which, although it had nothing on earth to do with its purport, might possibly have slipped through without observation or discussion. The Bill professed to be a Bill "to continue the Act concerning the management of Episcopal and Capitular Estates in England, and further to amend certain Acts relating to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England." In these last words they had the development of the "&c." The first clause did what was rather a wonderful thing in ecclesiastical legislation; it recited a provision out of another Act of Parliament—namely, that it should not be necessary for a dean to hold a canonry residentiary. It was something extraordinary to enact that a man could not be a dean without being something else besides; but, nevertheless, the fact was so. The clause went on to say that, in spite of not holding a canonry residentiary, the person in question should be permitted to share in those benefits which a canon residentiary might have shared. It then declared that, prior to the passing of an Act of the 5th of Victoria, the Dean of Hereford had invariably held one of the six canonries residentiary founded in that cathedral church. But it seemed that, it not being necessary to his deanery that he should hold one of those canonries, he did not now hold one. The logic of the clause was very curious. The provision proceeded to say that the Dean and Chapter of Hereford were trustees of a certain charity in Ledbury called the Hospital of St. Catherine, and that it had been settled by the Court of Exchequer that the warden of that hospital should be one of the canons residentiary of Hereford Cathedral. The clause went on to say that the Dean not being a canon residentiary, and the Court of Exchequer having decided that none but a canon residentiary could be warden, therefore, the Dean of Hereford should be the warden. Without giving any opinion as to the propriety of the clause, he would only remark that the Ecclesiastical Commissioners found deans to be awkward persons to deal with, and he did not think the right hon. Gentleman would find them less awkward. He hoped the Government would consent to strike out from the Bill all that was not strictly continuance.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he was not disposed to contest the point, especially at that period of the Session and that hour of the day; although he thought the clause was unobjectionable and not without precedent. He admitted, however, that it was an inconvenient practice to introduce new matter into a continuance Bill, and as it was objected to, he would be prepared to strike out the two clauses referred to in Committee.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for To-morrow.

PROSECUTIONS EXPENSES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS moved the second reading of this Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that was a worse Bill than the last they had discussed. Up to the year 1846 the expenses of prosecutions were borne one-half by the Government, and the other half by counties or towns. After 1846 the Government took the whole payment into their own hands, and set to work to cut down the allowances, which he did not believe were too extensive before. By the Bill it was proposed to give to the magistrates the power of making a scale of payments in each county and town, which was to be sanctioned by the Secretary for the Home Department. Now, if the Home Secretary was to sanction such a scale, he should like to know why the Treasury should not make the payment? It was unjust not to do so. The Bill might be made a means of getting rid of the obligation altogether. The Treasury had nothing to do but diminish their own scale—and there was nothing to prevent them doing so—and the expense would, by degrees, be thrown upon the rateable property of the country, which would be most unjust. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not press the Bill.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he should be glad to withdraw the Bill if such a course would not be inconsistent with the engagements into which he had entered. There was a scale of allowances to witnesses, and the payments out of the Consolidated Fund were regulated according to that scale; but complaints were made in some counties that that scale was insufficient, and many representations of that nature had been made to him, especially from Yorkshire and Lancashire. The question he had to consider was whether he should be justified in recommending a general increase. But in many counties there was no complaint as to its sufficiency, and it would be a throwing away of the public money to make a general increase. Another plan was to alter the allowance in some counties, but he found it was not desirable to adopt that course. He had, therefore, suggested that a permissive power should be given to the magistrates to increase the allowances out of the county rate, and though they thought the whole amount should be paid out of the Consolidated Fund they reluctantly agreed to the proposal. It was in accordance with that engagement that he brought in the Bill. It must be remembered that the Bill was entirely permissive, and he thought the magistrates might very well be trusted with the power proposed. He, therefore, hoped the House would agree to the second reading of the measure.

MR. SOTHERON ESTCOURT observed that the question to be dealt with was very embarrassing, for it was alleged that there was a failure of justice in consequence of the present low scale of allowances. He would suggest that as the insufficiency of the present scale of allowances was mostly felt in Lancashire and Yorkshire it would be better to limit the operation of the Bill to those counties, and if it worked well there it could be extended afterwards.

SIR WILLIAM MILES said, the dissatisfaction at the existing scale of allowances was more widely extended than the right hon. Friend seemed to think. The Commission which inquired into the subject two years ago, and of which he was a member, suggested some alterations, but certainly nothing like the provisions of the Bill, to give the Treasury power still further to reduce the scale of allowances. In one respect, at least, he hoped the Bill would be altered. If the justices sent in a new scale, and that scale was sanctioned by the Home Secretary it would become a permanent scale, while the charge upon the county-rate might afterwards be increased by a further reduction in the scale allowed by the Treasury.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, if the objection was to the Secretary of State fixing the fees he was prepared to transfer that power to the justices.

MR. HENLEY said, that arrangement would only tend to throw odium upon them.

Debate adjourned till To-morrow.

House adjourned at five minutes before Six o'clock.

EAST INDIA (HIGH COURTS OF JUDICATURE) BILL.—COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee upon the East India (High Courts of Judicature) Bill read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH:—My Lords, I will, with your Lordships' permission, take this opportunity of explaining the objects of the several Amendments of which I have given notice, and the reasons which have induced me to submit them to your Lordships' consideration. Your Lordships have agreed to the second reading of this Bill as passed by the House of Commons. I shall not offer any further opposition to the principle of the measure. I understand that principle to be the amalgamation of the Sudder Court and the Supreme Court. I must observe that I cannot by any means agree in the reasoning on which that amalgamation is proposed. It appears to me that those two Courts are incongruous; that they have not what I believe, in chymical language, is called "affinity;"—that they have no liking for each other, but rather the contrary. It is not impossible that on that account, if not on any other, there may be considerable differences among the Members. No one looking at the present constitution of these two Courts can say with confidence what the result of an amalgamation will be. The Judges of the one bring with them the knowledge of the laws prevailing in the provinces; those of the Supreme Court the knowledge of the general law. I agree very much with the opinion given by one of the witnesses examined before the Committee, that probably the Judges of the Supreme Court will prove much too strong for the Judges of the Sudder, and will have everything their own way. I do not believe that that will be a desirable result. It will have an effect injurious to the administration of the law in the Provinces, and to the character of our courts generally. But if we are to establish this amalgamation, at least let us see how it will work before we introduce the system into the small courts throughout India. Let us see what will be the result as regards appeals to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. If it shall be a well-constituted Court—if it shall administer justice well—there will be none, or very few appeals, and their decisions will be generally upheld. If that shall be the case, there may perhaps be no objection to the plan: but it is desirable to see what will be the practical working of the experiment before we determine to extend it over the whole of the Provinces. We should make the Bill of a tentative and not of an ambitious character; we should see our way clearly before we finally decide on a matter of such great importance. There is one point on which I agree with the noble Earl the Under Secretary of State for India. When the Supreme Court was first established it was established to protect the Natives of India against the Europeans, and the Natives and Europeans against the Company's Government. One of these objects is no longer necessary, because the Government from which the Supreme Court emanates and that which rules the country are one: but the other reason for the existence of the Supreme Court—that of protecting the Natives against the Europeans—exists, and exists in still greater force than formerly, in consequence of the great increase in the number of Europeans in India. More than this, since they were established there has been a great extension of our dominion. I am willing to remedy any grievance that may really exist, but I would not go further than the necessity of the case, and the object of one of my Amendments is to provide that it shall be lawful for Her Majesty to appoint to the High Court at Fort William, in Bengal, two additional Judges, and to each of the High Courts at Madras and Bombay one. I think this provision, with an arrangement of a similar character for the Court in the North-West Provinces, if one should be established there, would be amply sufficient for the purpose of trying by experience how the system will work. Your Lordships must recollect that if an English Judge has not a knowledge of the Native language as well as a knowledge of the law he is utterly helpless in the Indian provinces without the assistance of a Judge speaking the language of and acquainted with the country in which he has to perform judicial functions. The advantage of an English Judge is this, that he comes with his mind fresh from this country. On his arrival—though not, perhaps, after he has lived for some time in India—he may be supposed to be free from local prejudices. But, my Lords, there is a most important and novel principle in this Bill which I hope your Lordships will reject. By this Bill the Crown has the absolute power of appointing all the Judges of those Courts—not only the lawyers sent from England, but also those members of the Civil Service who may have belonged to the judicial staff of India. That is a principle which I think your Lordships ought not to introduce in this Bill. It is entirely contrary to every pledge given in Parliament when the Act under which India is now governed was introduced. It is contrary to the practice which has hitherto prevailed, and I believe it is inconsistent with the interests of this country in India; and I am sure it is altogether inconsistent with the interests of India. It is inconsistent with the maintenance of the proper position of the Governor General. It is for him who sees the working of the law and the manner in which it is administered, to reward good conduct, ability, and honour. Those engaged in the courts of India should look up to him, the head of the Government there, and not look to some party in this country as the authority who was enabled to raise them to the highest positions in their profession—they should own no “foreign allegiance.” As the Bill stands now, the Crown has an indefinite power of appointing barristers from this country to judgeships in those High Courts; so that a barrister who gets into Parliament, and who, for no matter what purpose, makes himself troublesome to the Government, may have an Indian Judgeship thrust down his throat. The office seems to have been created for the express purpose of buying the silence of the Bar. The Bill creates sixty Judges to administer the law in India—yet we are about to commence a contest with the other House in respect to the appointment of a single Judge. He is to have £5,000 a year; yet both Houses seem to agree to the passing of a measure which will inflict upon India thirty-five Judges, each of whom is to have a salary of £5,000 a year. We have suffered the Natives of India to eat of the tree of knowledge, and they now know the reason of all that is done here. I entreat your Lordships not to think only of our own position in legislating for India; do not expose the more deformed parts of our practical Government, and show the Natives of India that where we are not to suffer ourselves it matters not what burdens we impose on others. To do right, and to make them feel that we do so, is now absolutely essential to the carrying on of the Government. This Bill asks more than is necessary for the object which it contemplates. The universal practice of Parliament is to refuse to give more than is absolutely necessary, reserving the power of increasing the supplies when necessary. Government may, if it can, reduce expenditure; but Parliament will never give a margin or an elasticity, as it was called by the noble Lord, to any establishment within the discretion of the Governor General to extend. No doubt pecuniary Votes of Credit are often given in the face of dangers threatening from abroad, but I never heard of a Vote of

Credit for Judges to meet some possible demand for increased judicial expenditure. Of all qualities of the mind, perhaps the most rare is the judicial. The Bill proposes that thirty-five barristers shall be appointed to act as Judges in India. My Lords, there are not thirty-five, nor, perhaps, five men at the whole Bar, of whom any one could with safety predicate that they would make good Judges. Success at the Bar is no proof that a man will make a good Judge. Within my recollection, I have known more than one gentleman most successful at the Bar—good, able men, and sound lawyers—who yet made extremely indifferent Judges. The fact is that the very qualities which enable a man to attain distinction at the Bar are the very qualities which unfit him for the duties of the Bench. Do you suppose that because thirty-five barristers of five years’ standing each may be represented to you as so many Lord Mansfields, you will find ten—ay, or five of that number, possessing judicial minds? A judicial mind is a gift of Providence, and most rare. These, my Lords, are the objects and reasons of the Amendments I am about to propose. I assure your Lordships that it has been very irksome to me to press myself so often during the last two or three weeks upon your attention; but, connected as I have been with India for so many years, I felt that I could not absolve myself from the performance of that duty, especially where I held a strong opinion. I deeply regret the loss which the country sustained by the deaths of Lord Dalhousie and Lord Elphinstone. Had they been living, and in your Lordships’ House, they would have spoken on this question with much more recent knowledge and greater experience than I am able to do. Had they agreed with me in opinion I should have been greatly strengthened in the views which I have advanced to your Lordships, and had they disagreed with me I should at least have had the consolation of thinking that my apprehensions must of necessity be exaggerated. As it is I must only express my own sentiments; and, feeling as I do on this subject, I have opposed the Bill, and now propose these Amendments, because, as the measure now stands, I believe it to be inconsistent with the good government of India on old English constitutional principles, and incompatible with the fair administration of justice.

EARL DE GREY AND RIPON said, it was unnecessary for the noble Earl to offer the slightest apology to the House for contributing, as he always did upon questions of this nature, much valuable information. But, for his own part, he had never felt clearer as to the principle which should guide their Lordships in reference to the Amendments to be proposed by the noble Earl. When the noble Earl spoke of the peculiar aptitudes requisite for the administration of the law in India, it appeared to him that the very fact that two Courts, possessing different qualifications, were already in existence, afforded the strongest reason for bringing them together, and combining the judicial knowledge and the acquaintance with the habits of the people which formed their distinguishing characteristics. With regard to the question of the appointment of Judges, he thought it most objectionable that legal dignitaries should sit side by side upon the bench holding their commissions from different authorities. Such a system would not only prolong, but, in his opinion, would aggravate the evils to which the noble Earl objected. The large number of Judges for whose appointment power was taken under the Bill had, likewise, been objected to. The noble Earl was mistaken if he thought it was intended to fill up all these offices. He could assure their Lordships the Government had no intention of appointing any additional Judges; the only object which they had in view was to establish one High Court, by combining the two separate jurisdictions existing at each of the Presidencies. The question raised by the Amendments of which the noble Earl had given notice was whether it was, in the opinion of their Lordships, desirable to establish for India a High Court of judicature, upon the bench of which were to sit Judges deriving their authority from different sources and under different circumstances. Now Her Majesty's Government thought it very undesirable that these high judicial officers should exercise an authority derived as to some directly of the Crown, and as to others from an unequal and inferior power. If, therefore, the noble Earl moved his Amendments he should feel it his duty to oppose them.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, he did not mean to oppose the Bill which was founded on the recommendation of Commissioners of the very highest authority and introduced a principle which he did not dispute might be of use in India. But it was impossible to exaggerate the importance of this measure. By it the system of judicature now applied to 150,000,000 of Her Majesty's subjects was at once to be subverted and changed. The judicature of India at present consisted of a Supreme Court which exercised no appellate, and a Sudder Court which exercised little or no original jurisdiction. With respect to the application of law to the enormous population of India it would be a great mistake to suppose we had to deal with only two classes of people—Europeans or British-born subjects on the one hand and Native Indians on the other. What were called Native Indians, and the laws applicable to them, were divided into innumerable classes. There were Hindoos, Mahomedans, Parsees, Armenians, each class subdivided into many others. He believed that there were in India more than thirty different languages, and as many different sets of laws, religions, and customs, to the people who had become attached to each of which it was now proposed to apply one general measure for the administration of justice. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack was quite justified in his statement that if this Bill proved effectual for its objects it would mark this Session with an importance beyond any other within his recollection. But how the objects were to be effected he could not discern from the Bill. It proposed to introduce changes of the most surprising character. The distinctive clauses were sufficiently clear. From the moment when it came into operation the Supreme and the Sudder Courts would be abolished, but the Bill contained no distinct provision with respect to the Courts or what was to be substituted for them. All that he found in the Bill was that they were to be composed of a certain number of that class which Sidney Smith called the primum mobile of all human affairs, barristers of six years' standing, a certain number of covenanted servants of the East India Company, and a certain number of Native Judges. He was far from saying that it might not be possible from these materials to constitute efficient Courts, and to provide for the administration of justice throughout India; but he did say that to do so would be a task of the greatest difficulty, and one which might well task the utmost powers of the ablest administrators. The Courts to be established under this Bill were to administer civil, criminal, Admiralty, and testamentary and matrimonial law—all different branches of law, which in this country were distributed among a number of different tribunals. Now, he did think that before their Lordships abolished what existed they ought to have some intimation of what was to be substituted for it. It might be very useful to introduce into the Sudder Courts that knowledge of law and of the principles of general jurisprudence which belonged to regularly educated lawyers, but would it be equally advantageous to introduce into the Supreme Courts persons who were not lawyers, and who, it was admitted, could know nothing of the system the important duties of which they were called on to perform? The Supreme Courts of the different provinces discharged their duties, as far as he had heard or had learned by his experience on the Judicial Committee, with efficiency, and with the confidence of those whose affairs they had to administer. Was it quite certain that the dignity, the weight, and the confidence which now attached to those Courts would be preserved by the new ones? He entertained doubts whether such would be the case. He entirely agreed with the observations which were made by his noble Friend (the Earl of Ellenborough) when the Council of India Bill was introduced, as to the extreme objection which existed to altering the state of things which was established in India, and with which the Natives were satisfied. As regarded the constitution of the Supreme Courts and their mode of administering their original jurisdiction, he doubted whether any alteration was required. The extent of their jurisdiction might probably be usefully increased, and there could be no doubt that the Sudder Courts might be greatly improved by combining the legal knowledge of the Judges of the Supreme Courts with the acquaintance with the local laws, and customs, and habits and language of the Natives, which might be found amongst the Judges of the Sudder Courts. He thought that out of those materials a satisfactory Court of Appeal might be constituted, and the enormous evil of appeals to England be greatly diminished. At present an immediate appeal to Her Majesty in Council lay from decrees both of the Supreme and Sudder Courts in all cases above a certain amount in value. If their Lordships could feel compassion for lawyers of any class, he was sure that they would pity those who had to decide these appeal cases, and they must at least commiserate the unfortunate persons who were the subject of such litigations. The whole of the proceedings were in writing of great length, extending sometimes to many hundred close printed folio pages. It was necessary to translate the whole of the record-pleadings, documents, and examination of witnesses, and judgments into English, and then to print them; and when the Judges in England came to the consideration of the case they did so with the firm assurance that in all probability nearly all the instruments produced by the Natives were forgeries, and nearly all the depositions of the witnesses were falsehoods. There was no exaggeration. The very nature of truth seemed not to be understood amongst Hindoos. He had been informed by a gentleman now holding a distinguished situation in this country that he was once engaged as counsel for an Indian of good position to maintain the validity of a will, which was beyond all doubt perfectly genuine. In support of the will witnesses were called to the number of a dozen, each of whom swore that he saw the testator affix the seal to the will and that he was of perfectly sound mind at the time. The truth was that not one of the witnesses had been present on the occasion; but the client justified the course he had taken in calling them on the ground that although the evidence was false, it was in support of a genuine instrument. That was the general feeling in India on the subject. These appeals were attended with great expense and delay, and involved the utter ruin of the parties interested, unless their means were very large; and after all the expense was incurred, and the best attention of the Judicial Commissioners had been given to the subject, it was often impossible from the nature of the case that the Judges could feel confidence in their judgment. He thought that by improving the Appeal Courts in India it might be possible to raise with advantage the sum below which no appeal was now allowed to this country, and by that means, and by the greater confidence which the Court would command, greatly to diminish the number of appeals to England. There was, however, one class of appeal cases in which he did not wish any change, and that was where the Government or their officers were concerned. There were a number of cases in which the Judges of the inferior courts were suspected of partiality in their decisions towards the Government or its officers. The cases in which that was more likely to occur than any other were those connected with the collector's courts. He did not know whether the Commission which used to be the court of appeal in such cases had been abolished; but if not, he thought it would be necessary that some provision should be made on that point in the Bill. The appellate jurisdiction in Indian cases was exercised at present by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, with the assistance of two gentlemen of the highest character, ability, and weight, who had been Indian Judges, and who acted as assessors to the Committee. No one could desire to speak with greater respect than himself of the assessors, but he had never concealed his opinion that it was not right that such men as the present Vice-Chancellors, Sir William Page Wood, Sir Richard Kindersley, and Sir John Stuart, should be denied the rank of Privy Councillor, while it was conferred on the assessors. Those gentlemen were entitled to receive for their attendance some few hundred pounds a year in addition to their rank. They had no vote, but favoured the members of the Committee with their advice. The Court itself could not be formed by less than three members of the Committee who were sufficient for the decision of all other cases. There was often difficulty in procuring the attendance of sufficient numbers to constitute a Court, and this difficulty might be removed; or, at all events, diminished, if the assessors were made members of the Committee for the purpose of hearing appeals on which they now sat as assessors. He was afraid that, unless the Bill came out of Committee in a different shape from that in which it was at present it would not do any great credit to the Government, or be of any great advantage to the country. There seemed to be some difficulty of detail. One of the provisions enacted that the lawyers should not be less than one-third, and the covenanted servants not less than one-third, of the Judges constituting the Courts. Possibly they might want one or two additional covenanted or uncovenanted servants; and yet, as the Bill stood, they must appoint an equal additional number of lawyers, because the number of lawyers must not be less than one-third. In his opinion the House had a right to expect that a fuller outline of what was intended to be done under the provisions of the Bill should be contained in the Bill itself.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR regretted that the noble and learned Lord, to whom he had for years been accustomed to listen with pleasure and instruction should not have applied his great knowledge and experience to embodying in Amendments the points to which he had adverted. He should have been very glad to have had some propositions, the result of the noble and learned Lord's knowledge and experience, with regard to the appellate jurisdiction. But the noble and learned Lord contented himself with general criticism, without condescending to tell their Lordships in what particular manner the evils of which he complained ought to be remedied. It was, undoubtedly, true that there was a great deal of difficulty attending the appellate jurisdiction, arising partly from the want of moral and religious principle among the Natives. The noble and learned Lord had told them that the Natives acted on the principle that the end sanctified any description of means, and, therefore, if once a man persuaded himself that he had a good cause, he would adopt any iniquitous or nefarious mode for gaining that cause in a court of justice. Her Majesty's Government had not been inattentive to that consideration; and in the first place they hoped that by the union of the Supreme with the Sudder Courts a more sifting, searching, and satisfactory tribunal would be created; and they also hoped that when a single Court was established a better mode of procedure and more correct and accurate rules would be laid down, which, to a great extent, would have the effect probably of preventing appeals, but, at all events, of sending them up in a shapeless and expensive manner, and less likely to produce further litigation. But they did not stop there. That was the intention of the Bill, and the result of the constitution of the Court would be that certain Judges under a Commission would go into the provinces, and, for the most part, act as Judges in the first instance, and there decide cases which would afterwards probably be reviewed by the Court sitting as it were in Banco—a phrase used to denote the Judges in Westminster Hall sitting to examine the decisions of the Judges on circuit—and by that mode the Government hoped the number of appeals would be greatly diminished. They were asked how could they provide one system for the administration of justice for so many distinct races as existed in India? His noble and learned Friend knew, but probably it was not generally known to their Lordships, that at present throughout all India there was a very well organized local administration of justice. There were several courts, subordinating one to another, and terminating in the Sudder Adawlut as the Supreme Court of Appeal in civil causes. But they were confined to the administration of justice among the Natives, and European subjects scattered throughout the provinces were not amenable to their jurisdiction. In no possible way could they create a system of administration of justice applicable throughout all India except by amalgamating the two tribunals, Native and British, and sending Judges to try important cases in the first instance, which would afterwards be reviewed by the full Court, and such cases as required further review reserved for the Judicial Committee. That was the system proposed by the Bill, and with great submission he ventured to say it would not be wise to define it more explicitly. Defined it was already; but if they laid down rules in an Act of Parliament as to the particular manner in which a great jurisdiction was to be exercised, they would be bound in iron fetters, and if a mistake were made they could not meet the difficulty, for which otherwise it would be easy to provide. Therefore, he thought that with great wisdom, while the outline of the procedure and the Court was traced and the constitution of the Court accurately defined, the mode of procedure was left to be filled up by particular powers, under letters patent issued by the Crown, which would be perfectly consistent with the ordinary rules which governed the administration of justice. As to the Amendments proposed by the noble Earl (the Earl of Ellenborough), he must say, speaking with diffidence, and not presuming to set his knowledge and experience against the knowledge and experience of the noble Earl, that he could not for a moment concur in them. They had, happily, made India part of what he might call the proper dominions of Her Majesty. They had brought India under the direct rule of the Crown. Now, it was the first prerogative of the Crown, and a prerogative always assuredly to be preserved, that the Crown was the source of justice, and from the Crown proceeded the appointment of Judges to administer justice. The preservation of that great prerogative, as of right due to the Crown, was accompanied with equal right and benefit to the subject; because, if the Crown was the great source from which proceeded justice, the Ministers of the Crown were responsible for the selection and appointment of Judges. That great principle, however, would be lost if the Amendment of the noble Earl to take away one-third part of the appointments from the Crown were adopted. If the noble Earl's Amendment were agreed to there would be two sets of Judges in India—the Queen's Judges, who would be looked on as Judges of the "first chop," and the Governor General's Judges, who would be regarded as Judges of an inferior class. If one of the Queen's Judges were sent down to any part of the country, his administration of justice would be regarded as of a higher order, while that of the Governor General's Judges would be looked upon as of secondary quality. It would also tend to destroy all uniformity and unanimity among the Judges. In fact, the noble Earl wished to introduce into the administration of justice that feeling which had prevailed in the army as to the distinction between Queen's troops and Company's troops. There could not be a greater mistake, both as to the principle and expediency, and he trusted their Lordships would not assent to it. With regard to the general observations of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Kingsdown), as far as he was able to follow them they did not at all appear to impeach the principle of the Bill, and he hoped, therefore, that their Lordships would now go into Committee.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, that his experience in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council enabled him fully to confirm the statement of his noble and learned Friend (Lord Kingsdown) as to the character of the cases frequently brought from India. He approved of a system which would simplify the proceedings in the Indian Courts, and enable Judges more thoroughly to sift cases than they could at present.

Motion agreed to.

House in Committee accordingly.

(In the Committee.)

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2 (Constitution of High Courts).

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH moved to omit the clause, on the ground that it would place the whole of the patronage involved in the appointment of Judges in the hands of the Crown, contrary to pledges which had been formerly given. In fact, the principle asserted by the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) would place the appointment, not only of the Superior Courts, but of the Judges of the Small Courts, the Zillah Courts, and the Sudder Courts—that was about one-half, the patronage of India—in the hands of the Crown. The noble and learned Lord had said that the Judges of the Supreme Court sent out from England would have a great deal more authority than those who were appointed by the Governor General. He must confess that he had some doubts upon that subject. The Natives of India were extremely clever in discovering the character of the individuals placed over them; and no person in India, be his rank or official position what it might, would have any other real weight than what he derived from his own personal qualities. It was the great advantage of that country that men stood or fell by their own personal abilities, and not in consequence of adventitious circumstances similar to those which existed in this country.

Moved, To omit Clause 2.

LORD LYVEDEN said, that nothing was more certain than that the Supreme Court Judges viewed the Sudder Court Judges with great contempt, on account of their ignorance of English law, while the Sudder Court Judges felt an equal contempt for the Judges of the Supreme Court on account of their ignorance of Indian law and custom. To combine these two Courts in harmony seemed, therefore, a great experiment; and he must confess that, rather than see it made all at once, he should prefer that they proceeded more gradually. The alteration proposed by the noble Earl seemed to him to be one which they ought to assent to. He knew very well that the Minister for India was often overwhelmed with applications from young barristers for Judgeships, which applications were accompanied by such testimonials of fitness, so recklessly given by the leaders of the Bar, that it was a very difficult matter to resist them. The greatest caution ought to be exercised in selecting those who displayed a judicial mind, because he fully agreed that it very often happened that able advocates made indifferent Judges.

LORD CRANWORTH felt the objection which had been pointed out by his noble and learned Friend as to the inconvenience of some of the Judges of the Courts of India deriving their authority from the Supreme power, while others derived theirs from a power which, however high it might be, was less than the highest. He thought it would be far better that all the Judges should be appointed by the Crown upon the recommendation of the Governor General. He saw no reason why the appointment of Indian Judges should be taken out of the category of other appointments, the principle of which was that some one should be responsible for them.

On Question, Whether the said clause shall stand part of the Bill?

Their Lordships divided:—Contents 48; Not-Contents 42: Majority 6.

PAROCHIAL AND BURGH SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL—SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL, in moving the second reading of the Parochial and Burgh Schools (Scotland) Bill, said, it was a measure of considerable importance, the subject of which was keenly debated by their Lordships three or four years ago. But, as the measure was then strongly opposed by the majority of the Scotch Peers, it was rejected. It was felt that without some compromise no measure had much chance of passing, and he was happy to say that now, by the exertions of the Lord Advocate and others, an agreement had been come to, and he believed no objections would be made to the provisions of the Bill. The chief provisions of the measure were to provide an increased salary to the parochial schoolmasters of Scotland; and, instead of the test now required from them by which they declared themselves to be members of the Established Church of Scotland, it was enacted they should give a pledge that they would not do anything contrary to the interests of that Church. This was a settlement of the question that was, perhaps, open to some objections; but it was necessary to consider what was the present state of public opinion. There were other provisions in the Bill, among them one for the removal of inefficient or superannuated schoolmasters, which was a matter of considerable importance in Scotland.

Moved, that the Bill be now read 2.*

LORD KINNAIRD said, he should not oppose the second reading; but contended that the Bill totally sacrificed the principle that was successfully maintained in a former discussion. It was a revolutionary measure. By one clause it severed that connection between the parochial schools and the Church of Scotland which for nearly 300 years had been a blessing to the country, by securing a religious education to the people. The only party favourable to the Bill was a religious body in Scotland opposed to the Established Church. He should be glad to assent to any proposal for increasing the salaries of the schoolmasters—a most deserving body of men; but to do so it was not necessary to sever the connection between them and the Church. He should explain that the salaries of the parochial schoolmasters were fixed periodically, every twenty years. In 1853 one of these periods expired, and the new average, based on the price of grain, reduced the salaries by £3 or £4 a year. This was very hard on the schoolmasters. The majority of the heritors were willing to make up the deficiency. The Lord Advocate, however, who was a distinguished member of the Free Church, would not consent to do anything in the matter unless the connection of the schools with the Church were given up. It was only to please one section of religious Dissenters that this iniquitous proceeding was to be carried out. The measure was, moreover, in direct contradiction to the Report of the Commission presided over by the noble Duke below him (the Duke of Newcastle).

THE EARL OF GALLOWAY said, that the Ministers of the Church felt that this measure was a reflection upon their respectability and efficiency; and it was to be regretted that the matter had not been fairly and fully brought before the parties who were chiefly interested. He apprehended the greatest danger from the withdrawal of the religious test, and if anybody moved the rejection of the Bill he should vote for the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH said, it was very remarkable that this Bill was not brought forward till after the General Assembly of the Church of Scotland had ceased to sit. During the 300 years which the old system had existed the Ministers had always felt the greatest pride in the connection of their Church with the religious education of the people, and no objections had been raised either by the children or their parents to the mode in which the schoolmasters were appointed. There was a great deal in the measure which he thought very beneficial; but he did object to the severance between the Church of Scotland and the parochial schools.

THE EARL OF MINTO said, that whilst this Bill repealed one test it in fact enacted another, though the new one would no doubt not exclude so many as the old one. He felt he should be neglecting his duty if he did not strenuously protest against the new test.

THE EARL OF AIRLIE, without asserting that this Bill was perfect in all its details, supported its second reading, on the ground that it would secure most desirable objects, and expressed his opinion that the Government deserved great credit for introducing it.

LORD POLWARTH was most anxious that the condition of schoolmasters in Scotland should be improved, but he disapproved the provisions of this Bill, because it would, to a great extent, dissolve the connection which had so long existed between the parochial and burgh schools and the Church of Scotland.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^d accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on To-morrow.

LORD KINNAIRD gave notice that in Committee he should move the omission of Clauses 12 and 22, together with a portion of the preamble.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, that the adoption of this Amendment would be tantamount to the rejection of the Bill, and he, therefore, hoped that noble Lords who were anxious that a measure upon this subject should pass this year would vote against it.

UNIVERSITIES ELECTIONS BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on the University Elections Bill, read.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, their Lordships ought not hastily to make so great a change in the mode of voting in this country as was proposed in this Bill. He did not deny that there were advantages in the proposal, but, on the whole, it appeared to him that the disadvantages predominated. At first sight it might seem that a University was especially the constituency in which such an alteration of the law might most favourably be made; but, on reflection, it would be found that there were many other constituencies in which it might be done with more real benefit. One great objection to the Bill was that the Member for a University was intended to represent the University itself. Now, the special life of a University was embodied in the resident members rather than in those who, living at a distance, were subject probably to alien influences, and might exercise their franchise at variance with the interests and sympathies of the institution to represent which their Members were intended. Some check was imposed on these persons by the present system; which was also useful in bringing those who did vote into personal contact with residents. By that means the views of persons living in remote places, who had little intercourse with others and formed their opinions chiefly from the single newspaper which they read, might be remodelled in accordance with the feelings of the University. It was not right that a numerical majority of languid voters sending up their papers by post should be allowed to overpower the resident members, who represented the true mind of the body. He would not say that the Bill introduced the principle of proxy voting, but it certainly had a tendency to throw into the hands of certain resident members of the University a great number of non-resident votes, which they would have the power of presenting or withholding, just as they chose to sway the election. Such a practice would be very objectionable. The great University with which he was especially connected had never been consulted on the matter, and had petitioned against the Bill. It appeared to him most inexpedient at that late period of the Session to go into Committee on the Bill. He feared that many noble Lords who were in favour of the Bill would oppose Amendments intended to render it less objectionable merely in order to prevent delay by having it sent back to the other House.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he presumed the right rev. Prelate was not present at the second reading of this Bill, as he did not then oppose it, and had not given any notice suggesting opposition to it. So far from no notice of the Bill having been given to the Universities, it had been under the consideration of Parliament during the greater part of the present Session, and no petition had been presented from any one of the three Universities which were affected by the Bill against its provisions. In the House of Commons it had passed by a very large majority; and the President of the Council had been good enough to inform him that Her Majesty's Government would not offer any opposition to its passing in this House. From first to last he had never heard any objection to the principle which was involved in the measure, and he thought the objections of the right rev. Prelate not as conclusive as the arguments which they were accustomed to hear from him; but, on the contrary, somewhat contradictory. In the first place, the right rev. Prelate said that the Member ought to represent the mind of the University. But he would remind their Lordships that the University itself was more or less a representative body, and that one of the great interests which it mainly represented was the interest of the Established Church. The residents were, no doubt, a most useful and important body, but they were not the whole University body. An important component part of the members consisted of non-resident members, a large portion of whom were clergy of the Established Church resident in their particular parishes, and unable without great inconvenience to give their votes at a University election. The right rev. Prelate said the Bill would give undue power to the non-residents, and his next objection was entirely in opposition to that, because he said the residents would have an opportunity of exercising undue influence by collecting in their hands such an amount of voting papers as would turn the election. The right rev. Prelate said—First, that it gave too much power to the non-residents; and, next, that it gave too much power to the residents. The right rev. Prelate said there were many other constituencies to which it could be more advantageously applied. For his part, if he thought that the plan of voting papers would give a chance of doing away with undue influence and corruption, he should be very glad to see the principle applied to every constituency in the kingdom. When he had the opportunity of bringing before Parliament the great question of Parliamentary Reform one of the provisions which he introduced was a power of voting by papers, because he believed that a great number of electors would be enabled by that means to give their votes who were deprived of the power of giving them now. But, if a general option of voting by papers was not to be given, it was quite clear that there was a much stronger case for giving that power to the Universities than for any other constituency, because the constituencies of the Universities consisted of a greater proportion of non-resident voters and those who lived at a distance from the place of election. It was desirable that those of the electors for the Universities who wished to vote should have every facility for voting. There were at present only two alternatives for the poor country clergy. One was coming up to the poll at their own expense, which few of them could afford; the other was coming up at the expense of the candidate, which made a contest enormously expensive.

The Earl of Derby

Therefore, if there were any constituencies to which the principle of voting papers ought to be applied, they were the constituencies included in this Bill. Moreover, such was the character of these constituencies, that there was not the least reason to apprehend abuse, fraud, or corruption in the manner of dealing with the votes. The right rev. Prelate said that great advantage was obtained by the fact that members of the Universities who were resident in their quiet parsonages, reading only one paper a week, and taking their political views and opinions from that one paper, had the opportunity of coming to the University and partaking of the more enlarged views which prevailed there. But he confessed that he thought the time of a contested election an unfavourable moment for influence to be brought to bear upon the non-residents, and the right rev. Prelate must, therefore, forgive him if he did not attach much weight to that argument. It must also be remembered that there was nothing in the Bill to compel them to send up voting papers if they were not inclined to do so, and that the power was only given in case it was inconvenient either for the voters or the candidates to incur the expense of their coming to the poll. The right rev. Prelate admitted that the Bill did not sanction votes by proxy. That was the great argument which had been used against the Bill; but there was nothing of the tendency in its provisions. The person who handed in the vote was no more the proxy of the person who voted than the Postmaster General was the proxy of the person whose letter passed through his department; and he did not think that the right rev. Prelate would have said the person who was intrusted with the votes might abstain from giving in the papers if he had looked at the last clause, which declared withholding votes a misdemeanour. He did not mean to say that the machinery of the Bill might not be better adapted for the purpose, but he thought it better not to run the risk of losing a valuable measure by proposing Amendments at this period of the Session. In his opinion it was expedient to agree to the Bill in its present shape, and leave the task of amending minor details for a future occasion. He admitted that it was an experiment, and an experiment upon an important subject. The principle was more easily applied to the Universities than to any other constituencies, and, if successful, he should wish it to be further extended.

THE BISHOP OF LONDON said, he should be guilty of a dereliction of duty if he did not say that he thought the Bill would inflict great evils upon the University of Oxford. One of the objects of the reforms recommended by the University Commission of which he was a member was to increase the number of residents, and to make them a more important body than they were in former times. He had the deepest respect for the country clergy, but he did not feel that the Member for the University was in his proper place when he simply represented that body. He believed that the reason why many distinguished members for the University had held so high a position was because they were supposed to speak with the authority of the residents. It was now impossible for the country clergy to come up in such great numbers as entirely to annihilate the votes of the residents; but under this new system he believed that the Member for the University would simply be the representative of the country clergy. He could well understand the consternation which, if this Bill passed, would be caused in Oxford by the arrival at the poll of some rural dignitary who coming, perhaps, at the last moment with some hundred proxies (if he might so call them) in his pocket, would turn the scale and nullify the decision of the resident Masters of Arts. He thought, also, that there was a great deal in the observation of his right rev. Brother that it was beneficial to the country clergy to be brought into local communication with the residents of the University, and he did not believe that the country clergy themselves desired to be put in such a position that they would never have occasion to visit the University during the rest of their natural lives.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, he was astonished at the alarm expressed by the two right rev. Prelates at a measure which would really confer a great benefit on the non-resident members of Convocation, and would be no detriment to the character of the constituency. He had often heard clergymen express their regret that they had no means of recording their votes except either by going to an expense which they could ill-afford, or else by augmenting the expenses of the candidates to an unfair degree. The measure would give proper facilities to the non-resident members without unfairly affecting the due influence of the resident members, and he should, therefore, give it his support.

VISCOUNT EBRINGTON thought the right rev. Prelate's arguments required the legal disfranchisement of the non-resident University electors, rather than the maintenance of the present almost prohibitory tax of trouble and expense upon the exercise of their legal franchise. He, however, supported the Bill, not so much for the sake of the particular constituencies to which it applied, as in the hope that it was the precursor of sounder legislation with regard to the rights of electors generally. The Legislature, it was clear, had never intended the vote of an elector to be looked upon as his property, otherwise he would have been entitled to dispose of it to his own advantage. If it were not a property, it must be a trust; and it was a contradiction in terms that the Legislature should impose a trust upon a certain number of persons, and then put unnecessary difficulties in the way of their exercising it. He (Viscount Ebrington) had, like many of their Lordships, had a good deal of experience in contested elections both in large and small constituencies. He did not, however, speak from that alone, but from public notoriety when he said that, whereas, in small constituencies nearly the whole, or, at least, considerably more than three-fourths, of the electors generally voted; in large constituencies for the most part very little more than half did so; and it was generally the most educated and wealthiest portion of the constituency which refrained from voting. In the borough of Marylebone, for instance, something like three-fourths of the electors in Cromer Street and that poor neighbourhood voted, while fully an equal proportion of the electors in the rich squares and terraces of Tyburnia refrained from voting. It was the opinion of a gentleman who had been engaged in a great number of large elections since 1843 that a system of voting papers was indispensable to a true representation of such constituencies. The difficulty of organizing the wealthier and more educated classes, he said, was immense; but the obedience of the ignorant masses to their leaders was implicit: and he followed up this opinion by a warning that the blind obedience shown by the Trades Unions in their strikes would one day be applied to political contests; and then it would be found how powerless was an unorganized, undisciplined, numerical majority, in presence of a well-organized and disciplined minority. He hoped that this Bill would lead the way to a better system of taking votes, and he should, therefore, support its committal.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby) was quite correct in saying that it was not the intention of the Government to oppose the Bill, but at the same time they had not changed their opinions with regard to it. He quite concurred with the right rev. Prelate as to its practical effect.

THE BISHOP OF CARLISLE said, that, so far from swamping the opinions of the University, it appeared to him that this Bill would ascertain the opinions of the University. If his right rev. Brother meant that it would swamp the opinions of the resident members, possibly that might be so; but it should be recollected that recent legislation had given a preponderating power to the resident members, and he trusted that those who resided at a distance would be allowed an opportunity of recording their votes at University elections. He had been strongly urged by his clergy to support this measure, and if a division took place he should certainly do so.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE thought that most of the speakers had allowed themselves to be diverted from the interests of the University, and had argued the case on collateral points, some advocating the Bill on the ground that it would pave the way for a larger measure, and would in time be applied to other constituencies; others upon the ground that it consulted the interests of the clergy who resided at a distance. Now, he should be glad to relieve the clergy from any trouble to which they were put in voting at University elections, nor did he object to the adoption of the system of voting papers in other constituencies, if means could be found for preventing fraud. Of this, however, he was not very hopeful, and until such a plan could be suggested the door would be opened to frauds which would more than counteract any advantages which could result from the use of voting papers. He could not help feeling, however, that the principle, whether it was good or bad, was a somewhat dangerous experiment as regarded this particular constituency. Some dangers would arise here which would not affect other constituencies, although the risk of fraud was not so great as it might be elsewhere. This measure would materially alter the character of the University representation. It would introduce a system of canvassing and electioneering among the members which would certainly be very undesirable. He doubted whether men of such high calibre as had hitherto been chosen would be elected as representatives of the University. But there was another evil as regarded the electors. If the Bill passed the country clergy in various districts would resolve themselves into a caucus, the influence of election clubs would be brought to bear, and much the same process would take place in the University itself, where influential members of the colleges would exert themselves to secure the return of a particular candidate, and there would be a clubbing of colleges separately against one another, instead of voting as one body, to be represented on the interests common to all. For these reasons he looked with some apprehension on this measure. At the same time, the House seemed disposed to try the experiment, and, no doubt, the matter was one which, though of much interest to their Lordships and the country, mainly affected the constitution of the House of Commons. The noble Earl opposite admitted that this was an experiment, and that, had the Bill been discussed at an earlier period of the Session, the machinery provided in the Bill might in some respects have been improved. The noble Earl also suggested that in a future Session this machinery might, if necessary, be amended. Now, with a view to insure this result, would it not be desirable to limit the operation of the Bill, say, to three years? He was sure that their Lordships had the interests of the Universities alone at heart, and did not look upon this as any party question. For his part, he did not know how the Bill could affect the return of Members of one party or another. Now, if they made the Bill a temporary one, so that a general election might take place within the period it was in operation, their Lordships would see how it worked, and would thus effectually reserve to themselves the power of revision.

THE EARL OF POWIS said a few words in reply.

On Question, agreed to;

House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses agreed to.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE moved an additional clause, that this Act should continue in force for a period of three years or the end of the then Session of Parliament. ["Five, five."] He had no objection to substitute five years for three, if the House wished it.

Moved to insert the following Clause,

'That this Act shall continue until the first Day of August one thousand eight hundred and sixty-six, and no longer.'

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he felt no objection to the Amendment, but he ventured to suggest that at this period of the Session it would be very undesirable to send any Amendment down to the House of Commons which could possibly be avoided. By all means let five years be substituted for three; but he would rather the noble Duke did not press the Amendment.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, he would withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

Bill reported without Amendment; and to be read 3^d To-morrow.

SALMON FISHERIES BILL.
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee (according to order),
Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3 (Commencement of Act),

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY suggested an inconvenience which would arise from fixing the 1st of September for the Act coming into operation. In Scotland the "close time" did not commence until the 14th September. Considering that there was no chance of the Scotch Salmon Fisheries Bill becoming law this Session, it was, in his opinion, the more necessary to alter the date. He, therefore, proposed that the Act should come into operation on the 1st October instead of the 1st September.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 4 (Definitions),

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY said, the extraordinary list of names of species of fish he had read on a former evening was perfectly useless. The Bill was for the protection of the salmon fishery only, and all that they required was to make his clear. He moved, as an Amendment, that the definition should be, "all migratory fish of the genus salmon."

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, he thought that the noble Earl should have employed the word "species" instead of "genus."

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY contended that his definition would include all species of the genus salmon.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 4 to 20 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 21 (Weekly Close Time),

LORD RAVENSWORTH moved an Amendment, providing that the weekly close time should extend, instead of, as proposed by the Bill, from eight o'clock on Friday night to six o'clock on Monday morning, only from noon on Saturday to six o'clock on Monday.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 22 to 27 agreed to, with Amendments.

Clause 28 (Enforcing Free Gaps in Fishing Weirs),

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY moved the omission of the words forbidding the fishing with nets within fifty yards of the free gap of a mill dam or fishing weir.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 29 and 30 agreed to.

Clause 31 (General Superintendence of Fisheries by Home Office),

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY complained that this clause gave the Home Office the power of materially interfering with the rights of property, by the appointment of inspectors and water bailiffs, who would have the power, without the leave of the landowner, to pass along the banks of any water frequented by salmon and trout; and he proposed to insert this proviso, "provided that nothing herein contained shall enable the Home Office to authorize any person to enter the land of any proprietor contiguous to the river without his permission."

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, no power would be given under the Bill to authorize trespassing in any way, and the Amendment was, therefore, unnecessary.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY inquired whether, if one of these officials trespassed upon his land, under instructions issued by the Home Office, he could bring an action of trespass against him?

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the instructions of the Home Secretary could give no more authority than those of anybody else, and any trespasser would be liable unless there was statutory authority to trespass.

LORD CHELMSFORD: But the question is whether statutory authority is not given.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to.

Further Amendments made. Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next.

IRREMOVABLE POOR BILL. COMMITTEE.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee on this Bill read.

Moved, that the House do go into Committee upon this Bill.

LORD REDESDALE appealed to the Government to give further time to prepare Amendments. He admitted that there were grievances to be remedied, and that it was desirable to make some change; but this change was extremely violent, and would, he believed, work injustice. He wished particularly to direct attention to the great alteration in the value of property which would result from the new principle of rating provided by the Bill. In one union with which he was acquainted the rating of one parish would be reduced from £940 to £530, and that of another would be raised from £68 to £204. Such an alteration ought to be carefully considered, and there had been no time to consider it. The principle of the measure had been affirmed, and he had no desire to offer any factious opposition.

EARL GRANVILLE thought there was no reason whatever why they should not proceed with the Bill to-night.

On Question, agreed to.

House in Committee.

LORD REDESDALE said, that he had offered several suggestions, of none of which the Government had thought it necessary to take any notice, though they involved what he considered to be very important questions. He begged to give notice that on the third reading of the Bill he should move that the Bill have an effect which should be only temporary.

LORD WODEHOUSE said, he should not be prepared to agree to any such Amendment on the part of Her Majesty's Government.

Bill reported without Amendment, and to be read 3^a on Monday next.

CRIMINAL PROCEEDINGS OATH RELIEF BILL.

SECOND READING.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD DENMAN moved the second reading of this Bill, the object of which he explained to be to enable persons who entertained a conscientious objection to take an oath to make a declaration instead.

LORD WENSLEYDALE supported the Bill.

LORD CHILMSFORD said, he had no intention of opposing the Bill, but feared that the change which it effected might have serious consequences. A vulgar notion prevailed among certain persons that if they could only escape from taking an oath they were under no obligation to tell the truth, and with this view various modes were adopted in order to evade the law, such as kissing the thumb instead of the Testament. It would be easy for such persons to allege a conscientious objection, and thus avoid taking any oath; and who was to decide as to the validity of such a plea!

LORD CRANWORTH agreed that such difficulties might by possibility arise out of this Bill; but, on the other hand, under the existing practice, there were frequent failures of justice from persons refusing to take the oath from conscientious scruples. He concurred entirely in the necessity of the measure.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR added his opinion in favour of the Bill, which he believed to be essential for the proper administration of the criminal law. Many cases had occurred in which justice had been altogether defeated from the want of such an enactment, and many such cases would occur again if this Bill were not passed into law.

On Question, agreed to; Bill read 2^a accordingly; and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Eleven o'clock, till To-morrow, a quarter before Five o'clock.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee (Supply) read;

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

GENERAL PEEL: I am so fully aware of the very general, and I must say the very natural, indisposition of the House to listen to long statements of figures, that I should not venture to ask its attention to a matter relating to past expenditure, which has already been provided for by means to which I shall hereafter refer, if the subject was not of far greater importance than the Vote of £206,000 would appear to imply. This sum forms a very small portion of the excess of expenditure beyond the money voted by Parliament for army services in 1859-60, and I do not know how I can give a better idea of the importance of the subject than by drawing a comparison between the amount of this sum (spent without the authority of Parliament, and apparently without the knowledge of the Government) and some of those items of expenditure which have created the greatest interest during the present Session. Great alarm has been expressed at the amount required to build a new Foreign Office. The excess would have built five Foreign Offices. Another matter of the greatest interest is the amount required for the national education of the country, and complaints have been made of the gradual increase of that Vote; but this excess exceeds the whole amount required for the national education of the United Kingdom, and is five times the sum that we have been told would insure the permanent enrolment of 200,000 volunteers. It is to this excess, and the provision, or rather want of provision, made for it in the Budget of last year, that I wish to call the attention of the House. In referring to what took place on the 19th of March, 1860, when the Secretary for War moved the Vote of Credit to cover his expenditure, it may be supposed by some that my object is to claim some triumph over my noble Friend, or to find fault with the policy of the Government, that led to this expenditure; but it is neither the one or the other. If it was a mere question as to the accuracy of my statement on that occasion as compared with that of my noble Friend, I should consider that matter completely settled by the production of the account of the receipts and expenditure for Army and Militia Services for the year ending 31st March, 1860, which I now hold in my hand, and I should have been quite willing to leave it to the judgment of those Members who are in the habit of interesting themselves and paying attention to these matters; and as to the policy of the Government, I have not the slightest doubt that they were fully justified by what was passing at the time in exceeding the number of men voted by Parliament, which naturally entailed the increased expenditure; but what I complain of is that having done so they did not provide the means to meet it—that either they did not know, or, knowing (which I do not believe), they concealed from the House the amount required to meet the expenditure—that the calculations upon which the Budget was framed were erroneous, and that that Budget on the faith of the accuracy of which the House was called upon to make great changes in the taxation of the country, and to repeal the paper duty, was a delusion, and for that delusion the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in my opinion, was quite as much responsible as the Secretary for War. My right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer has on two or three occasions alluded to what he was pleased to call a controversy going on between myself and the Secretary for War, with which he had nothing to do, and he has laid down this doctrine, “that if the Treasury undertook to cut down the demands of the Military Departments, it would be incurring a great responsibility;” and in this I entirely agree; and if I was Secretary for War I would take care that the Treasury did not so interfere. The number of men and means of defence required by the country is not in the province of either the Secretary for War or the Treasury to determine. That is settled by the Cabinet; and I take for granted that my noble Friend the Secretary for War did not proceed to raise a new regiment and exceed the number of men voted by Parliament by more than 22,000 men without first obtaining the sanction of his colleagues. Having done so it was the duty of the War Office, in the first instance, to frame the Estimates to cover the necessary expenditure; but all Estimates must be submitted to the Treasury, and obtain the sanction of the Treasury before they are laid upon the Table of this House. No Department can incur any expenditure not provided for in the Estimates without the direct sanction and authority of the Treasury; and this sanction, I maintain, makes the Treasury equally responsible with the Department for it. If this is not the case—if the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not responsible—then, I think this House ought to insist on having the Minister responsible for the Estimate and expenditure of upwards of fifteen millions of money, here to account for it. Nobody can bear more willing testimony than I do to the ability with which the hon. Gentleman, the Under Secretary for War has discharged the duties of the office. But he is not, and cannot be responsible for the accuracy of Estimates or expenditure over which he has no control. When the Chancellor of the Exchequer made his financial statement last year, he professed to provide for in it, not only all excess of expenditure that had already taken place in consequence of the Chinese war, but for all prospective expenditure not included in the Estimates that could be foreseen and estimated for, and he announced that in order to do so two Votes of Credit would be required, one of £850,000 to meet the expenditure of 1859-60; and another of £500,000 for 1860-1. On the 19th of March, 1860, my noble Friend the Secretary for War moved for the first Vote of Credit of £850,000, of which £500,000 was to be devoted to the army, and it was on that occasion that I expressed my opinion that £500,000 would not meet the excess of expenditure on five Votes alone of the ordinary Estimates of the year—namely, votes 2, 3, 4, 9, and 10 entirely dependent on the number of men borne on the establishment during the financial year, and I stated my grounds for coming to this conclusion—namely, that having framed those Estimates, and knowing that they were only calculated to provide for 134,600 men, including the embodied militia, and that the average number of men during the whole year exceeded 142,600 men, there must be an excess of expenditure amounting to at least this £500,000 on these five Votes, and that to meet the whole expenditure, the greatest portion of which had taken place in India and had been paid for by the Indian Government, that at least another £500,000 would be required, and I concluded by appealing to that time (which has now arrived) when the accounts are before us, to bear me out in this assertion. Now, what I said may be of very little importance, but what the Secretary for War—the Minister responsible to this House for the accuracy of these Estimates—said, is of such vital importance, that in order to prevent the possibility of my misquoting him, I will read from what I take to be a corrected copy of his speech, what he did say—

“He, too, would appeal to facts—not to estimates, but to formal accounts of the money which had been spent—and the House might rest assured that the Government were running into no excess beyond that met by the present Vote.”—

[3 Hansard, clvii. 920.]

General Peel

He then proceeded to enter into an explanation about an Army of Reserve which had been intended to raise, but of which as we have never heard a word more from that day to this, it is useless for me to dwell upon. And then he said—

“In the Estimates of 1859-60, which his right hon. and gallant Friend had moved, provision was made for 121,601 regular troops, in addition to £410,000 for militia, which would maintain 13,000 men during the year. In the Vote of Credit for China services for 1859-60, also moved by his right hon. and gallant Friend, £240,000 was taken for pay and allowances, which would maintain 7,000 men for one year, so that provision was made in that year for a total force of 141,600 men. In April of last year the force was less than the number by 14,000, which produced a saving of £43,200. In May there was a saving of 12,400 men, and of £37,000. The amount of saving then went on decreasing until November, the upshot being that if in March all the troops going from India to China had actually gone, there would be 15,000 in excess. In point of fact, however, it was known that the vessels which were to convey those troops had not sailed from Bombay and Calcutta in time to land the troops in China before the expiration of the financial year, and would not come within the Estimates until they were disembarked. There would thus be an excess of £97,000 for the payment of the men against £192,000 of savings accruing as he had mentioned in the early part of the year. To make all safe £50,000 had been added as a difference between the organization of the militia and the regular force, the militia having a greater number of officers in proportion to the men than the regular army. Again, £50,000 had been added for an increase which might occur upon the miscellaneous items of Vote 3, but with all these additions, which were stated to be more than ample, there was still £192,000 to meet the £187,000 of excess. But this was not all. Upon the Votes taken for buildings, stores, and so on, it invariably happened, he was sorry to say, that the deliveries were not fast enough to allow of the payments being made in the financial year, and there was almost a saving under this head. Accordingly there was this year a large saving upon the Vote of stores.”

“As he had said, he would only assure the right hon. and gallant Officer that he had looked through the accounts with the greatest possible care, and he was confident that there was not only enough for the troops, but a surplus to provide against any deficiency.”—[3 Hansard, clvii. 921-22.]

Now will the House believe that the whole of this statement is a mistake from the beginning to the end, and that there is hardly a correct figure in it. I never moved for any Vote of Credit of £240,000 to provide for 7,000 men on account of Chinese services, and for the best possible reason, there were no extraordinary services on China at the time I was in office. The attack on the Peiho only took place on the day, or the day after, Lord Derby's Government quitted office, and was not heard of in this country for some weeks afterwards. Equally fictitious are the savings during the months of April, May, and June, &c.; and I was quite astonished at hearing that I had saved anything. It may be quite true that the number of men quoted may have been wanting to complete the regular army; but they were represented by embodied militia, for whom no provision had been taken but what had been deducted from the pay and allowances of the men voted by Parliament; and, in point of fact, there was no deficiency of men, and no saving. Well, Sir, we have now the accounts before us, and what is the result? On Vote 2, Pay and Allowances, there is an Excess of, £137 3s. 1d.; Vote 3, Miscellaneous Charges, £261,242 17s.; Vote 4, Embodied Militia, £245,240 11s. 7d.; Vote 9, Clothing &c., £265,753 12s. 7d.; Vote 10, Provisions, Fuel, and Light, £200,780 5s. 8d.: Total Excess in the Five Votes, £973,134 9s. 11d. And on Vote 11, for warlike stores (the savings upon which we were told would cover any excess of expenditure on the other Votes), there is absolutely, instead of any saving, an excess of £23,595 6s. 5d., and the excess upon all the Votes amounts to £1,061,488 0s. 6d., and deducting from this sum what is called the savings upon other Votes amounting to £243,093 4s. 4d. (which is in reality no saving at all, but a mere postponement of services that must be performed for a future year), which the Treasury have the power, under the Appropriation Act, of applying to meet the excess—there remains an excess of expenditure on the ordinary Estimates of the year of £818,394 16s. 2d. to be provided for. Now, let us examine the exact state of the account as to money absolutely spent and liabilities entered into, and the means provided by the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his first Budget to meet them. There is, first, this sum of £818,394 16s. 8d. in excess of the money provided by Parliament for the Estimates of the year; and there were two accounts due to the Indian Government—one of £443,896 for the previous Chinese expedition and Indian troops serving in China; and another of £611,000, which the Indian Government had informed the Government in January, 1860, would be required early in the spring, on account of advances made by them for army services for the Chinese War then carrying on. My right hon. Friend has stated that the Treasury did not know in which financial year, 1859-

60 or 1860-1, these payments might be made; I will, therefore, take the two years together. In the one or the other the payments must be made, and the financial statement professed to provide for both. The account, therefore, would stand thus:—On account of excess of expenditure on Army Estimates, there was to be provided for, £818,394 16s.; on account of recent Chinese Expedition, £443,896; on account of present Chinese War, £611,000: Total, £1,873,290 16s. And to meet this there were two Votes of Credit—one of £850,000, and the other £500,000—making together £1,350,000. Thus leaving a deficiency of £523,290 16s.; and not one shilling was provided for the pay and allowances of 10,000 Native troops serving in China (who had not been voted by Parliament or provided for in the Estimates), or for the extra allowances to the regular forces, or for any naval services not provided for in the Estimates. I defy anybody to contradict the correctness of this statement. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer may ask—How was I to know that the Estimate of the Secretary for War was so erroneous? My reply is—How did I know it? The Treasury had far better means of testing its accuracy than I had. I could only calculate that if so many men cost so much in 1858-9, an additional number of men would cost so much more in 1859-60; and my calculation has proved quite correct. As to the first account claimed by the Indian Government, the Chancellor of the Exchequer had said that it was dragging its slow length through the Treasury, and he had no reason to know it would become payable during either of the financial years mentioned, and yet this sum is absolutely returned in the "Home Account of the Government of India," laid on the Table of this House, as having been received in the financial year 1859-60; and as to the other account, amounting to £611,000, the Indian Government had given notice to the Treasury in January, 1860, that it would be required early in the spring of that year. Now, Sir, I never thought that the Government could have been expected to foresee, at the time the financial statement was made, the certainty of a war with China, or that they were bound to provide for such a contingency; but they were bound to provide for the expenditure that had actually taken place, and for such prospective expenditure as, under the most favourable circumstances that could possibly be anticipated, must inevitably be incurred. If there had been no war—if the demands of the British Government had been at once acceded to—it would have been necessary to apply to Parliament for a million of money at least. And I do ask the House, if this had been all fairly and honestly stated, whether there would have been any collision between this House and the House of Lords, and whether this House would not have done, what the House of Lords, in my opinion, very wisely did—namely, refuse to remit the paper duty? I now wish, Sir, to call the attention of the House to the manner in which this excess of expenditure has been provided for. It arises almost entirely in the expenditure dependent on the number of men; and, in the account laid upon the table, an explanation is given of the cause of the excess, and the portion of it chargeable to the Chinese War. The whole excess on the five Votes I have referred to amounts to £973,154 9s. 11d., of which £210,451 17s. is stated to be chargeable to the war in China; and it appears to me a very questionable stretch of the power of the Treasury to appropriate any larger portion of the Vote of Credit (which was granted by Parliament for the specific purpose of meeting the expense of the Chinese War) in reduction of this excess than the sum shown to be chargeable to that war, and such appropriation is directly contrary to the principle laid down by my noble Friend on the 12th of July, 1860, who, in answer to a question from me, stated—

“And he asks me whether every sixpence of the £500,000 which we took has not been expended in making up the deficiency on the ordinary Estimates of last year? In the first place I have to reply that not one sixpence of that sum was applicable to making up any deficiency which might have occurred in the ordinary Estimates of last year. My gallant Friend, who is well acquainted with these matters, must have spoken without reflection, for he must have known that you cannot apply one farthing of a Vote of Credit to any purpose but that for which it was voted. You cannot spend it in making up an ordinary deficiency in the ordinary Estimate of the year. If his vaticinations, therefore, should prove correct, which I trust they will not, the deficiency will have to be made up by a Vote next year, specially taken to cover it. But so far from all that sum being spent in that way, we have reason to believe that a large portion of it still remains unexpended.”—[3 Hansard, clix. 1813.]

I understand that the explanation of this is that there would have been a large saving upon Vote 11 for warlike stores, if it had not been for the China War; and that, as the Treasury would have had the power of appropriating that saving (as it has done the other so-called saving), in reduction of this excess, it is justified in taking an equal amount from the Vote of Credit. But I consider this an exaggeration of the power of the Treasury granted by the Appropriation Act, which applies to actual and not imaginary savings. I have no doubt it will be said that of the whole army expenditure (for 1859-60) £610,000 was owing to the Chinese War; and, therefore, we have a right to charge that amount to the Vote of Credit; but the effect of this is to withdraw from the cognizance of Parliament the real amount of excess which had nothing to with the China War. Now, as I do not intend to conclude with any motion, I may be asked what is the use of occupying the time of the House by these references to things that are gone by—that however faulty they may have been, it is no use raking them up now; that the Budget of last year is now a matter of history, and that it would be far better to adopt the convenient maxim of letting “by-gones be by-gones?” but I have three reasons for not adopting this course. First, I think it is absolutely necessary that the attention of this House should be called to any expenditure not sanctioned by Parliament. If the lapse of time is to be a bar to inquiry it may always be urged, as the accounts are never laid upon the table of the House until fifteen months after the expiration of the financial year; and a Secretary for War might exceed his Estimates to any amount without any fear of being questioned about it. Secondly, I am anxious to enlighten the minds of some of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's colleagues as to the amount of provision made in his original Budget for the China War. In a recent debate in “another place,” my noble Friend Lord Derby stated it to have been the very modest sum of £500,000, but was corrected by a noble Duke, a Cabinet Minister, who said it was two millions and a half. Now I have shown that even the modest provision of £500,000 never existed, but that there was an absolute deficiency of more than that amount. And, lastly, and what is of far greater importance is, that these excesses are not by-gones, but are going on at the present moment, and I am confident that when the Army accounts of the last financial year 1860-1 are laid upon the Table of the House there will be an excess of expenditure on the same four votes amounting to a quarter of a million. I do not say that you may not pay it out of Votes of Credit or open accounts with India of which we know nothing, but I say the expenditure will exceed the amount voted by Parliament by at least the sum I have mentioned; and as to the Estimates of the present year I pointed out when they first appeared that, large as they are, they do not provide for the number of men on the establishment, and that in order to make them appear lower than the Estimates of last year, a sum of £127,000 had been deducted from the pay and allowances of the men voted by Parliament on account of men stated to be wanting to complete the establishment who were not wanting. The Under Secretary for War assured me that the attention of the Secretary of State and the Commander-in-Chief had been called to the subject, and that by the commencement of the financial year the numbers would be so reduced. I called for a Return of the number of men on the establishment on the 1st of April and found they were not so reduced; and, again, I called for a similar Return on the 1st of June to which I beg to call the particular attention of the House, and to ask the Under Secretary for War for an explanation of it, as it is calculated to mislead the House, and is, in fact, not a correct Return? I asked for a Return of the number of men on the British establishment on the 1st of June, and also of the number of men on their passage home from India, or under order to proceed home, who would become chargeable to the British establishment on their arrival. On seeing the Return I was excessively surprised to find that the numbers returned as being on their passage home amounted in each case to nearly the establishment of each regiment—a thing so unusual in regiments coming home from India—that I inquired both at the Horse Guards and the War Office, and found that the numbers reported as on their passage home included the depôts of the regiments which are in this country, and have been chargeable to the British establishment during the whole course of the financial year—making the whole number exceed, not only that provided for, but the number voted by Parliament. I have to apologize to the House for having occupied so much of their time on this subject at this late period of the Session, but that is not my fault. This is the first opportunity I have had of doing so since the accounts were laid on the Table of the House; and I only regret that the accounts were not produced before the Budget, for I think if the House had been acquainted with the real state of the army expenditure they would not have parted with the paper duties this year.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his right hon. Friend seemed to expect that he would be found fault with for bringing this subject before the House, and that he would be told it was too late to do so. But the truth was that the subject of the army excesses could only be discussed with effect in the year next but one after the Estimates were voted, so that his right hon. Friend had taken the right time for the discussion which he had raised. The charges which he had made divided themselves into two parts. One might be settled by a discussion in that House—the other was of a far more serious nature. The lighter portion—that which related to the discrepancy between the actual sum asked for the service of the army and the ultimate expenditure—he would leave to be answered by his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War. The right hon. and gallant Gentleman had spoken of the relations between the Treasury and the War Department, and had ascribed to him (the Chancellor of the Exchequer) a doctrine which most certainly was not his, but was the reverse of his. No doubt it was the special duty of the Treasury, with respect to the Army Estimates, to examine whether or not the services taken were in excess of the purposes to which they were to be applied. The Treasury had the greatest possible interest in the accuracy of the Estimates. As Chancellor of the Exchequer, therefore, it was his duty to make a careful examination of them; and it was no reproach to the gentlemen connected with the various departments to say that this examination, as well as the discussions that took place in Parliament, were useful in securing accuracy of detail. His right hon. Friend said the Treasury must necessarily have known the increase of payment for the army called for, in consequence of the increase which he said had taken place in the number of men voted by Parliament. But the fact was that the Treasury were in ignorance of the number of men. The Cabinet itself could not have a perfectly effective control over the number of men chargeable on the British establishment; because, in the state in which affairs had been in India, they had been but little else than servants of the Governor General. They were compelled constantly to have forces ready for the service of India, and to proceed there often without notice, so that no preparation could be made for the amount of change, and it was impossible to say how much would be thrown upon the British establishment. He would pass on to the question of departmental responsibility, and upon this he wished to observe that if the statements of the right hon. Gentleman (General Peel) were correct the matter ought not to end with a simple discussion across the Table of the House. The charges which he had brought really amounted to this—that at the time when the Government laid their proposals before Parliament with respect to the impending military expenditure they were in possession of information which ought to have convinced any rational man that the charge they proposed was too small. Now, that was a charge which would require a more minute answer than, without preparation, he was able to give. He was in a condition, however, from recollection, to meet the charges of his right hon. Friend so far. The points on which the Treasury was responsible were three. It was responsible for fixing the amount of any Vote of Credit that was proposed; it was responsible for the transfer and distribution of the Votes under the Act of Parliament; and it was responsible for adjudications on the claims of the respective departments to a share of the Vote of Credit. His right hon. Friend stated that, so far back as the 10th of February, 1860, the Government ought to have been sensible that there was a sum of £1,800,000—including £400,000 for the China War, and £600,000 due to the Indian Government—which they would have to pay, and for which they had made no provision. Now, he denied that the accounts to which his right hon. and gallant Friend referred were in such a state as to enable the Government to found any estimate on them, with a view of getting a Vote from Parliament. All he could say was, that if an excess of £1,800,000 really did exist in the expenditure of the army, it was not within the knowledge of the War Department, nor within the knowledge of any other department of the Government when he made his financial statement in 1860. He, therefore, did not admit that any portion of that alleged army excess could have entered the calculations of the Government in framing their financial arrangements. Many of these questions—such, for example, as the £400,000 voted for the China War—could not be settled across that table. Neither he nor his right hon. Colleague the Secretary for India, nor any one else connected with the Government, could have had the smallest idea that any portion of that sum mentioned would go to any other than its original purposes. If his right hon. and gallant Friend wished to make good the opinion he had stated, he ought to have submitted to the House a question, not to be settled across the table, but one that would have led to a more minute calculation and investigation of accounts than could take place in that House. His right hon. and gallant Friend stated that the charge of £600,000 for India was known to the Government before the financial statement was made. It was in reality known on the 28th of January, but it was not to be taken for granted that the claim was one that should be paid; for, in truth, claims for India not unfrequently required to be corrected after investigation. His right hon. Friend taunted them with having proposed a Vote of Credit of only £1,350,000 to meet an excess of £1,800,000; but that sum was believed fully adequate to the occasion, and was fixed upon partly in consequence of information from the Foreign Office with regard to the probability of an increased charge being required for China, and partly with reference to the Indian account. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that they ought to have left a wide margin for charges that might occur; but, on the other hand, it must be borne in mind that at the time there was an expectation that should the Chinese expedition lead to an accommodation, there was a payment from that country of £500,000 under the Treaty of Tien-tsin, which would have been available in aid of the Ways and Means of the year; and it would not have been right of the Government to have made any demand on Parliament without taking that matter into consideration. If the right hon. Gentleman were not satisfied with that, he hoped he would carry the matter further. It was a matter of vital importance that every department, and especially the Minister of Finance, should deal with Parliament not only in good faith, but with as much intelligence as could be expected from him, or as the nature of his office would allow. Then, with respect to the appropriation of what were called the savings on different heads. It was the absolute duty of the Treasury to appropriate the balances in the Exchequer before dealing with the Vote of Credit; and if they did otherwise they would have acted in excess of their legal power. His right hon. and gallant Friend found fault with the Treasury for having appropriated £600,000 out of £850,000 taken for the China expedition to the expenses of the military department. His answer to that was that it was a matter which depended for its accuracy on careful and minute examination in detail, and it had been examined with care and pains under his (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) responsibility. They might, however, have been wrong, and that was a very proper matter for Parliamentary investigation. If his hon. and gallant Friend was disposed to devote his leisure hours to the inquiry during the recess, with a view to its being again brought forward next Session, and thoroughly investigated, he should have every assistance that it was in his power to give him. He was glad that he had directed his mind to the subject, as every Government was the better for being called to account with regard to its expenditure.

MR. T. G. BARING thought the question between the right hon. Gentleman and his noble Friend the Secretary for War (Lord Herbert) could be very easily settled. The right hon. Gentleman in March 1860 stated his belief that there would be at least £500,000 of excess in the military expenditure of the year, and Lord Herbert thought and stated that the ordinary army Votes for the year would be sufficient, with the addition of the Vote of Credit for the China War for that year. The question was not which was right and which was wrong, but which was most right and which most wrong. He had now to ask the House for a Vote of Credit for £200,000 to make up the deficiency for the year in question; this was the whole deficiency after the increased expenditure caused by the China War had been paid, as provided for by Parliament, out of the Vote of Credit. It must be plain, therefore, that when Lord Herbert said there would be no deficiency he was more right than the right hon. Gentleman, who put down the deficiency at £500,000. Lord Herbert was, however, far nearer the truth than that, for out of the actual excess of £200,000, at least £120,000 could not have been known in March 1860, when, as the right hon. Gentleman well knew, six months at least had to elapse before the accounts for the Army were closed. This £120,000 was made up of items of account unexpectedly brought on charge in the year 1859-60. Lord Herbert, therefore, was only out by £80,000 out of a total expenditure of £14,000,000. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to five Votes, which he said were entirely dependent on the number of men; but that was an incorrect assumption. How could the £120,000 charged to the clothing Vote for items of account, as explained in the Parliamentary paper in the hands of Members, be attributed to the number of men, as stated by the hon. Gentleman? How could the increased supplies purchased for the garrisons of Malta and Gibraltar be caused by the number of men borne? He denied the accuracy of the conclusions drawn by the right hon. Gentleman. He could, having examined the accounts, assure the House that no portion of the £600,000 for China had gone to the ordinary expenses of the Army in the sense stated by the right hon. Gentleman. Had there been no war with China that charge would not have been incurred. The right hon. Gentleman had also stated that there would be an excess upon the Vote for men for the current year. There was at present, including the men on passage home, an excess of about 5,000 men which chiefly arose from the unexpected return of troops from India and from the calls made upon us from India; 3,000 were artillery to be charged to India, leaving 2,000 men as the excess. There would be probably 1,000 men in China to be charged to the Vote of Credit, and this would make the excess about 1,000, or say 1,500 men. Then recruiting had been stopped, so that he did not anticipate that the money voted would be insufficient to meet the cost of the men for the whole year.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought the gratitude of the House was due to his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon, who had raised a great constitutional principle, to which he too wished to call attention. In the year 1859-60 the House voted £122,655 men, but in the course of the year they had 9,557 more men than Parliament sanctioned. In April 1860, they had 11,507 more men than Parliament voted for. He wanted to know where the money to pay these men came from? It was evident that it must have come out of the Treasury chest; but he wished to ask if the House was disposed to let go its hold over the control of the Army, the number of men voted, and the sources from which they were to be paid? If not, he thought there ought to be a clear and distinct explanation of the circumstances. He wished, therefore, to have an answer whether or not it was true that 10,000 men in round numbers were kept up last year in excess of the numbers voted in this House? The question was of the more importance, as the House was in a strange position arising from the large standing army kept up in India over which they had no control whatever.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought the questions raised by his right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Huntingdon would be better inquired into before a Committee upstairs than in that House; but there were one or two points which he thought ought not to pass without notice. He gathered from what fell from the hon. Under Secretary of State for War that he considered the whole matter turned very much upon the question of whether his right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel) or Lord Herbert were nearest the truth in what they respectively stated on the 19th of March, 1860. The House should bear in mind how extremely different were the positions of the two speakers. One spoke from a general estimate which he was enabled to form from his knowledge of the manner in which business was conducted at the War Office, and of the operations which were being carried on; while the other spoke from official knowledge on the subject, and from documents in his possession. But, after all, he (Sir Stafford Northcote) did not see that the balance was as the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War had stated it. It seemed to him that his right hon. and gallant Friend was upon the whole much nearer the truth than was Lord Herbert. It was said that they were to measure the whole by the £200,000 asked for in excess. But that did not measure the whole. They were distinctly informed last year that only £500,000 would be wanted for the army and £250,000 for the navy. It was simply in consequence of the postponement of some ships building for the Admiralty that the latter sum was not required, but if it had been there would have been a still greater deficiency in respect of the army Vote than there was at present. He made out that the real deficiency was at least £300,000. The hon. Gentleman said the deficiency arose from circumstances which could not have been foreseen. No doubt many things, especially considering our relations with India, would at times arise to baffle the calculations of Government, but they ought on that account to be the more cautious, and to take care in their arrangement for the year to make allowances for uncertainties. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer seemed to think that he was entitled to take as a set off to the £600,000 required by India the possibility of the war with China coming to an end, and that in such a case there would have been no deficiency. If that statement had been made to the House last year they would have known what they were about; that they were dealing with a certainty on the one hand and with an uncertainty on the other; but the complaint was that the Government did not tell them all the grounds on which expenditure would be required. He thought the statement of his right hon. and gallant Friend last year was justified by the result, and that he had taken the only means in his power by a reference to the five Votes which he had pointed out of getting at the expenditure for the year. It was not fair for the Government after advising the House to agree to a large expenditure to come forward as they now did and tell them that there was an excess of expenditure through causes which they had not foreseen.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that he, too, thought the House ought to feel obliged to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Huntingdon in bringing the matter forward, for it was clear that these accounts ought to be examined into in detail. It was not the first time that such accounts had been mystified, and if a Committee were moved for during the next Session he should give the Motion his support.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought the thanks of the House were due both to the right hon. and gallant Officer and to the hon. Baronet the Member for Evesham for having called attention to that important question. There could be no doubt that the large army in India did give any Government an opportunity to shuffle the cards between the two armies—men in the one country and men out of it—men on sea and men about to go to sea—men to be accounted for now and men to be accounted for hereafter—that he was afraid it would puzzle even a Committee to discover what was the exact state of things at any particular moment. The right hon. Chancellor of the Exchequer said there were many of these matters which it was impossible to foresee when the Estimates were being made up.

Sir Henry Willoughby

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Those were not my words.

MR. HENLEY said, he had not taken down the right hon. Gentleman's words; but that was his impression. He could only say that if it had been to lay on a tax the provision of the Chancellor of the Exchequer would have been considerably strengthened. He had been amused with the manner in which the Chancellor of the Exchequer recommended his right hon. and gallant Friend to employ his leisure during the recess. Was his right hon. and gallant Friend to step into the War Office and into the Treasury to overhaul these accounts? For his part he thought the best way to investigate the matter would be by a Committee. Then the hon. Under Secretary, curiously enough, accounted for the excess of 5,000 men by saying that 3,000 of them were wanted for India. Why that might as well be 10,000. What security, indeed, was there against any number of men being sent? If a great army was to be kept up in India some arrangement should be made with the Government of India, so that the present state of uncertainty might be done away with. The House ought to remember that the question was by no means new. His right hon. and gallant Friend had returned to the charge again and again—he had told both Lord Herbert and the hon. Gentleman opposite, both that year and the last, "You are not taking money enough for your men." And the result of all the mistification was that they were called on to-day to vote £200,000 for excess of expenditure. The Chancellor of Exchequer had in effect said that he had no answer to make to his right hon. and gallant Friend (General Peel). He neither admitted his right hon. and gallant Friend to be right, nor did he deny his statement—he left them in a state of blessed uncertainty. In his opinion no answer had been given to his right hon. and gallant Friend, either by the Chancellor of the Exchequer or by the Under Secretary for War. The subject was not an agreeable subject, and he hoped the House would apply itself to prevent its recurrence in future.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know how the 5,000 men that were admitted to be in excess were to be paid for? If recruiting was stopped what was to become of the large Vote taken during the year for recruiting, and why was the passage money for soldiers from India to be paid for by this country, instead of, as formerly, by the Indian Government? He hoped the hon. Gentleman would give a clear answer to these questions.

COLONEL SYKES said, he could not understand what was the necessity of sending out 3,000 artillerymen to India. Surely out of the volunteers into the Queen's army, of which they had heard so much, they might have obtained the number of artillerymen required.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he rose to move that an Address be presented to Her Majesty praying that the sum of £15,000, voted for an increase to the Royal Military College at Sandhurst to contained five hundred cadets, might not be expended till the House had had time to consider the details of the plan for which it was proposed to make the increase. He wished at the outset to disclaim the intention of making any attack on Lord Herbert, whose merits he fully recognized, and whose retirement from office, which he was afraid was made certain by the writs moved for that day, he considered a great loss to the public service. But one of the merits of that noble Lord was that he was willing to listen to opinions different from his own; and he believed if he had been in his usual health the plan would never have been proposed. That plan was that every officer of the army should pass through the college. The Committee on military organization which sat in 1859 and 1860, took evidence on the subject, and considered it but settled in their Report that they had not information enough before them to justify their making any recommendation on the subject. From that day to this the Government have given no further information on the question, and yet asked the House of Commons to decide upon it, although the important Committee to which he had referred declared that the information produced was not sufficient to justify any opinion being formed on it. When the Vote was under consideration it was objected to, and the hon. Gentleman made the offer that the Government would incur no expense till further information was obtained. The House, however, divided on the Vote, and it was carried; and after that the hon. Under Secretary stated that, as the Opposition had divided, the Government would not stand by the offer he had made. That was, to say the least, sharp practice, for how could the hon. Gentleman know how many votes were influenced in his favour by the offer he had made? He hoped the hon. Gentleman would even now repeat his offer and save him the trouble of arguing the question further. As the hon. Gentleman remained silent he was compelled, though with great reluctance, to go further into the matter. The hon. Gentleman then stated at some length his objections to the proposed plan, referring more particularly to the question of patronage, and the competitive system for admission to the college. It seemed to be settled that every student who passed through Sandhurst was to have a commission. The question, then, was, how was a young man to get into the college? It was at first proposed that they should enter by competitive examination, but that was now overruled; so that the question came to this—that the Commander-in-Chief, instead of giving commissions directly, would give them indirectly by a nomination to Sandhurst. That would practically be the case in time of peace; it would be still more emphatically the case in time of war, for they had the evidence of his Royal Highness the Commander-in-Chief that the college would be inadequate to the supply of officers in time of war. Yet it was proposed to make every officer of the British army pass through this college. The reason alleged was that the education there given was necessary for the officer in the discharge of his duties. Practically, however, it was found that the theories taught by professors were not of much service in the field, and he had heard men of great professional experience declare that the proposed plan would be injurious to the service. Indeed, he believed the Duke of Wellington was always opposed to the plan of making all the officers of the army pass through one college. But all he asked was that the Government should give a pledge they would not carry out the plan till the House was in possession of further information. The plan of the college was that every officer was to enter the college at the age of seventeen. At present any man might enter the army between the ages of eighteen and twenty-three. It might be advantageous in some respects to make the army, like the armies of the Continent, a separate class; but the great object had hitherto been to combine among their officers the qualities of a soldier and a citizen. To introduce a set of men who were to be soldiers only, and not citizens, might be injurious both to the interests of the army and the Constitution. He concluded by moving the Resolution.

Mr. G. W. Hope

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he rose to order. He wished to ask whether, when a Vote had been agreed to in a Committee of Supply and been reported to the House, it was competent to move an Address to the Crown to suspend, if not to annihilate, that Vote.

MR. SPEAKER said, great latitude of discussion was allowed on going into Committee of Supply, but one restriction was put upon it by the House, namely, that any Vote which had passed, or any Vote which was about to be discussed in Committee of Supply, was not a proper subject for discussion on going into Committee. That was the rule of the House. When the hon. Gentleman was making his statement there was much in it which could not be objected to by the House. Therefore, although the speech was founded on a Motion which stood on the paper, he did not think it consistent with his duty to interfere. But, in reply to the appeal now made to him, he would say that it was not consistent with order that he should put the Motion to the House. The Vote to which it referred had been passed in Committee, and had been reported and agreed to by the House. If a practice should arise of moving an Address to the Crown on every Vote which had been passed by the House it was clear that discussion never would end, and that Supply would be postponed indefinitely. Any other subject once considered and disposed of by the House was held to be disposed of for that Session. The Vote had passed in Committee, and been agreed to by the House, and he, therefore, was of opinion, that it was not competent to move an Address to the Crown that the Vote should not be expended.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, that as it appeared to be contrary to the rules of the House he should at once withdraw the Motion. He might add, however, he had waited until then to bring it forward, in order to see whether the Government would produce papers on the subject.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he did not think, if the Motion was withdrawn, that the discussion was, therefore, disposed of. He thought the hon. Gentleman was entitled to the thanks of the House for bringing the question forward. Let the House consider the circumstances under which the Vote was passed. It was passed at half-past one in the morning, when the House was tired out. No explanation of the Vote was given, but a promise was held out that some explanation would be given afterwards. A division took place, and the Vote was only carried by a majority of five. They were taking a step towards the formation of an institution that was to put the whole officers of the army on a new footing with regard to the mode of entering the army. The Committee on Military Organization would not sanction the plan of the college because it was brought forward in an incomplete state, and the Government themselves did not know what the plan was. If they did not take care the £15,000 then asked for would swell up to £200,000. The House was surprised into a division in favour of the scheme, and he hoped some means would be devised to get rid of it.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask whether the rule, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, would prevent any Motion being made on the subject when they were not going into Committee of Supply?

MR. SPEAKER had stated what was the rule of the House which it was his duty to enforce—namely, a rule, that in going into Committee of Supply restriction was placed upon the general liberty of discussion on two points—one, that Votes passed in Committee of Supply were not to be discussed on going into Committee; and the other, that any Votes standing for consideration must be considered in Committee, and not on going into Committee.

MR. DILLWYN said, that if they were to be struck over upon a point of order on a Vote taken at half-past one in the morning, he trusted it would be a lesson to the House never to allow a Committee of Supply to go on at such an hour.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that as a matter of fact the Vote was not carried at half-past one in the morning. At no time were the Votes of the Army Estimates taken at so late an hour.

MR. AYRTON said, that in a matter of such importance one would be justified in moving the adjournment of the debate, in order to enable the hon. Under Secretary for War to give an explanation, because he said he would have no objection to lay before the House the plan upon which this money was to be expended.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the debate be now adjourned."

COLONEL KNOX said, he would second the Motion. He would not say whether the Vote was taken at one or half-past one, but it was very late, and the Vote on the division was mainly influenced by the hon. Gentleman's explanation, that no part of the money would be spent till the plan was laid on the table. He feared there was an attempt making to Germanize the education of the army. Hitherto the officers had been chosen from all the public schools of the country, and it was well known that the Duke of Wellington shortly before his death, pointing to the boys on the playing fields of Eton, said, there is the stuff of which the British officers are composed. He hoped the hon. Gentleman would delay the expenditure of the money till the papers were prepared, which he believed was not yet the case, as there was a dispute between the Horse Guards and the War Office on the subject.

MR. SPEAKER said, that nothing could be further from his wish than to interfere with freedom of discussion in that House; but the House would see that it would be impossible to take into account whether the Vote was carried in Committee by a large majority or a small one, or at what hour.

MR. T. G. BARING said, that he altogether disputed and denied any want of faith on his part. A discussion took place in Committee, and he said if those who opposed the Vote consented to pass it he would undertake that no expenditure should take place until the scheme was produced. The opposition was not withdrawn; and, therefore, when the hon. Member for Windsor asked him about it the following day, he told him that he was bound to no pledge on the subject. But he was perfectly ready to agree that the establishment of the new system should not take place before Midsummer, so as to give full room for the expression of opinion upon it.

MR. G. W. HOPE said, he wished to ask the hon. Gentleman if he would state that the money should not be expended?

MR. HENLEY observed, that the Vote could be struck out of the Appropriation Bill, and he would suggest to the hon. Member for Windsor to be in his place.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee; MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £25,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he objected to the sum of £512 in payment of the fees for the patent making Lord Brougham's barony pass at death to his brother. He also objected to a payment of £150 for conveying the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland from Holyhead to Kingstown, and moved, as the last-mentioned item stood first in the Vote, that it should be reduced by that sum.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That the item of £150, for the Conveyance of the Earl of Carlisle (Lord Lieutenant of Ireland), between Kingstown and Holyhead, be omitted from the proposed Vote."

COLONEL FRENCH said, he thought the charge for the Lord Lieutenant was most extravagant. If the Lord Lieutenant wished to spend his Christmas holidays at his own residence, he certainly ought to go at his own cost. If, indeed, the money were to take him altogether out of Ireland he would not object to paying it.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he would beg leave to ask whether they could discuss the Vote, as it had been already expended?

THE CHAIRMAN said, though the money had been expended it had not yet been made good.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that the item was not an estimate, but an account rendered of money expended, and in all the expenditure of this country there were only two Votes of that description—one the Treasury chest, and the other the civil contingencies. Both these subjects had been before the Committee on Public Accounts, and, if the recommendations of that Committee with regard to civil contingencies were agreed to, it would never again occur that the House was deprived of the opportunity of discussing such Votes as the present before the money was paid. The recommendation of the Committee was that instead of the present mode of voting money already expended, and over which they had no control, the amount should be converted into a deposit account, and that the money should not be expended till the Vote had been submitted to the revision of Parliament. No doubt, the Report of that Committee would be acted upon by the Government for the future; and, in these circumstances, perhaps, they had better agree to the Vote before them—thus giving condonation for the past, while they took care to act differently for the future. At the same time, he must say there were items in the Vote which he regretted to see there.

Mr. W. Williams

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he did not think that the position of that House with respect to the money voted under the head of Civil Contingencies was at all satisfactory, and he was glad that the Committee had objected to the system which had been so long in operation. The Committee would see that that was one of those cases in which the Executive Government wanted the assistance of the House. The charge of £150 for the Lord Lieutenant was one of those minor charges that were allowed to go on from year to year simply on the ground of usage, and which it would be invidious to disallow. Certainly the Government would be disposed to give full consideration to the Report of the Committee, as its recommendations would tend to increase the control of the House over these Votes.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he wanted to know, as the money had been spent, what would be the consequence of omitting this item?

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, one effect would be that Government would not again introduce such items.

COLONEL FRENCH said, another effect would be that if the House condemned it the noble Lord would, perhaps, refund the money.

MR. HENLEY said, he desired to ask whether it was a matter of usage to pay the fees for patents in connection with the peerage? If they voted upon the sum of £150 for the Lord Lieutenant, would they be precluded from voting afterwards upon the £512 for Lord Brougham's patent?

THE CHAIRMAN said, that by a recent Standing Order it was open for hon. Members in Committee to canvass every item of a Vote, if they thought fit to do so. The effect of the omission of any particular item would be to reduce the gross Vote, and he did not know of any rule of the House which would entitle him to decline putting a Motion such as that made by the hon. Member for Lambeth; but, undoubtedly, if he put the Motion the Committee would be precluded from afterwards considering the item of £512.

MR. COLLIER: But how then can we arrive at the other items?

MR. DISRAELI said, that it appeared to him that the Committee ought to discuss all those points to which it was proper their attention should be directed before coming to any Vote, and then some proposition might be made which would include in one aggregate reduction the sum by which they thought the Vote for next year ought to be reduced.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that as one of the Committee, he understood that it was their intention in the Report which they made to the House to leave the various items open to discussion.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he thought the convenient course would be to discuss the items of the Vote. In order to give full scope for that discussion he would recommend his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth to withdraw his Amendment. If after discussion any hon. Member thought the sum of £75,000 too large a sum to place at the disposal of the Executive, he might, without reference to any particular item, move that the sum be reduced.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he would withdraw his Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed,

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he would move that the Vote be reduced by the sum of £500. [An hon. MEMBER: Make it £5,000.] He had no objection to make it £2,000 or £5,000. There were several items in the Vote which he disapproved. There was one charge of £280 for the conveyance of colonial Bishops in ships of war. There was another of £944. 4s. 8d. for the Commission for the Encouragement of Fine Arts. It would be a dear Commission at the odd 4s. 8d. He would say of them in another sense than the monument on Sir Charles Wren—

“Si monumentum queris”—

THE CHAIRMAN: Order. The time for adjournment has come.

House resumed.

Committee report Progress; to sit again this day, after the Order of the Day for the Committee on the East India Loan.

MR. HENLEY asked what business would be taken in the evening?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, the Indian Loan would be taken first; after that they would go on with Supply.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE: And when shall I have an opportunity of going on with my circumspice?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his hon. Friend was not so oddly situated as a certain Mr. Andrews, who was stopped on one occasion, not in the middle of a sentence, but in the middle of a word. He presumed his hon. Friend would have an opportunity of taking up circumspice in the evening, when Mr. Speaker had again left the Chair.

THE STEAM SHIP HIBERNIA.

QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he rose to ask the Junior Lord of the Admiralty, Whether the Iron alluded to by him on the 21st of June last, respecting the steam ship Hibernia, is the same as the iron-cased ship Defence is being constructed of, and which was manufactured for Messrs. Palmer by Messrs. Beale and Co., of Rotherham, as shown in Parliamentary Paper, No. 347, of the present Session? He wished to ask also, whether the Surveyor is the same who certified that the Hibernia was seaworthy when she went out?

MR. WHITBREAD said, the iron was the same—that was to say, it was found upon being tested to be the best for the purpose of the armour plates. It was manufactured for Messrs. Palmer by Messrs. Beale and Co. He was unable to answer the latter part of the question.

TROOPS FROM CHINA.—QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, Whether Troops ordered home from North China have been detained by the British Minister? If so, for what time they are to be detained? And whether the Troops at Tien-tsin are supplied with fresh water by Coolie labour?

MR. T. G. BARING said, that a Despatch from Mr. Bruce stated that he had found it necessary to detain one regiment of infantry and one troop of Fane's Horse at Tien-tsin. He was unable to say whether the troops were supplied with fresh water by Coolie labour.

STIPENDIARY NATIVE PRINCES OF INDIA.—QUESTION.

MR. ADAMS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for India, When the Return with reference to Stipendiary Native Princes of India, for which an Address was moved as unopposed on the 2nd of May last, will be laid upon the Table of the House? He would also beg to ask, if the right hon. Gentleman will lay on the Table a Copy of the Speech of Mr. Laing in bringing forward his Indian Budget?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he was sorry he could not say when the Return, ordered to be made on the 2nd of May, with reference to the Stipendiary Native Princes of India would be laid on the Table. He was, however, as anxious as the hon. Gentleman that it should be printed and given to the world. He must decline to lay upon the Table Mr. Laing's speech on bringing forward the Indian Budget at Calcutta. It was true that Mr. Wilson's speech was laid before the House; but that speech was necessary for the elucidation of public and official documents.

THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he wished to ask the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the Report of the Royal Commission on the Thames Embankment having been signed, it is his intention to place that Report forthwith on the Table of the House, with the protest of any Commissioners against the same?

MR. COWPER said, that the Report of the Royal Commission on the Thames Embankment was presented at the Home Office on the previous day. It would be laid on the Table that evening. He had no doubt the Commissioners would append to their Report the reasons given by the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works for not agreeing, as one of the Commissioners, to the Report.

COURTS OF JUSTICE (MONEY) BILL.

QUESTION.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to know, What the intentions of the Government were with regard to the Courts of Justice (Money) Bill?

MR. COWPER said, there was a great desire on the part of a large portion of the legal profession that this Bill should pass into a law, and he was unwilling to abandon it while there remained a chance of obtaining sufficient time this Session for proper discussion. He would certainly not attempt to bring it forward when it could not be fully discussed—certainly not after eleven o'clock at night. He hoped that the Session might last long enough yet for the Bill to be discussed.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he wished to know at what future day would the right hon. Gentleman bring it on?

MR. COWPER said, it was his intention to proceed with it, provided he could get time for full discussion.

Sir Charles Wood

MR. E. P. BOUVERIE said, he intended, when the Bill should be brought on, to move that it be read a third time that day three months.

THE NAWAB OF THE CARNATIC. QUESTION.

On Motion that the House go into Committee on the East India Loan,

MR. LAYARD said, he wished to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentlemen the Chief Secretary for India to the case of Azim Yah, the Nawab of the Carnatic, who had been deprived of his revenues, and who had petitioned Parliament in the beginning of this Session. He (Mr. Layard) had recommended the agents for Azim Yah to advise that Prince to present a memorial to the Secretary of State, his case having only been officially before the East India Company; but that memorial could not be received until late in the year, and the matter could not be discussed till the next Session. The Prince was meanwhile in difficult circumstances, and had been compelled to raise money at great disadvantage to meet his necessities. The East India Company offered him a large stipend on condition that he would renounce all his claims. The Nawab refused the condition. He (Mr. Layard) wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman, Whether he would not allow that unfortunate prince to receive the stipend without prejudice to his claims until an opportunity had been afforded for bringing them forward? It would be a simple act of justice to the Prince, and he was sure would be consonant with the feelings of the right hon. Gentleman. Should the request be refused, Azim Yah would be compelled to encumber himself with debts which he would never be able to discharge, and from a loyal subject might, as other native Princes had done under similar circumstances, become an enemy of the British Crown. The Prince had been in the first instance deprived most unjustly of his property by the East India Company, although his family had rendered great services to the British in India.

COLONEL SYKES said, that if the hon. Member would substitute the words Board of Control for the East India Company he should agree with his animadversions.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the case of Azim Yah had been referred to the Government of Madras, and that the Prince was not without a fair allowance, though not so great as the stipend offered to him. He concurred generally with the remarks of the hon. Member, and was quite willing to inquire fully into the merits of the case.

EAST INDIA LOAN.
COMMITTEE.

House in Committee.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that some time ago, when he moved for power to raise a loan for the service of East India, he stated that probably before the end of the Session he should have to apply for discretionary powers to raise money to make good any deficiency in the amount required for constructing railroads in India, and he now rose to ask for such powers to raise money to be used only in the event of the railway companies not furnishing the sum required. As he stated the case pretty fully on a former occasion, it would not be necessary for him at present to refer, except very briefly, to the matter. In the course of last year it was anticipated that there would be spent about £6,000,000 in India on the construction of railways; and by the accounts last received the amount came up very nearly to that sum, the actual expenditure having been between £5,800,000 and £5,900,000. The expenditure in this country had been upwards of £2,000,000, and the whole expenditure in the course of the year ending on the 30th of April last amounted to upwards of £8,000,000. It was believed that as far as India was concerned the expenditure for the present year would be about the same—namely, £6,000,000 in round numbers; and that the expenditure in this country would be about £1,700,000 or £1,800,000. Supposing, then, that there should be a little more expenditure in India (which the Government would be glad to incur, in order to proceed with the railroads now in the course of execution as rapidly as was consistent with their due construction), a sum somewhat greater than £6,000,000 might be expended; but, as it was not worth while making estimates except in round numbers, the estimate for the expenditure in this country and in India was £8,000,000. Of course, therefore, from the money market in this country, in one shape or another, either by means of the railway companies or by means of the Indian Department, that sum must be raised. It was impossible for him to say what amount the railway companies would raise, and he had no means of raising a single sixpence unless he received power to obtain the sum required for this purpose, if the railway companies failed to do so. What he wanted the House and the country and the money market clearly and distinctly to understand was that there was no double demand on them. If the railroads raised the money, then he should not raise a sixpence; but, if they did not, then it was incumbent on him to raise the money, because all were agreed that for the interest of India, of England, of the shareholders, and of the Indian Government, who were losing money by paying the guaranteed interest, the railroad expenditure in India should not be checked, but that all the railroads should be completed at the earliest possible period consistent with the due execution of the works. Therefore, he proposed to take a discretionary power to raise such a portion of the sum of £8,000,000 as the railroad companies might not be able to raise for themselves. His own impression was that, assuming the worst, they might be able to raise £3,000,000, and, therefore, he proposed to take a discretionary power to raise £5,000,000 between this and the 30th of April next. Considering what had already taken place, he certainly must say that he found no indisposition on the part of the money market to furnish him even with more than he asked for. On a recent occasion he asked for £4,000,000, and he was offered about £21,000,000. However, he had no wish to borrow more than was necessary for the purpose of carrying on the works of the railroads; and with respect to other works which it might be desirable to construct in India, he believed that the state of the Indian finances was such that it would not be necessary to borrow on that account. Without going further into details, he wished the House and the country to understand that not one single sixpence would be borrowed by him under any circumstances for railroad purposes in India, unless the railroad companies failed to raise the money themselves. He proposed to make the loan in the same stock as the previous loan, and on that subject this was all he had to say. He now proposed to make a statement with respect to the finances of India, and he thought the statement would prove satisfactory, as it was not his intention to raise a sixpence by borrowing for the Indian Government, because there was not the slightest occasion to do so. It was usual, on occasions like the present, to refer to the estimate of the past year, and to the accounts of the year preceding that, and to the estimates for the current year. It had been stated by an hon. Member that the accounts from India were exceedingly complicated. That was true; and one reason for his not making the present statement at an earlier period was because he had waited for an explanation of some discordant statements which had come from India. He was happy, however, to be able to say that the statement which he had made on the subject on a former occasion was borne out by the actual result. The accounts of the Indian revenue and expenditure for the year 1859-60, together with the regular Estimate for 1860-1, had been laid on the Table of the House, but there was, he was bound to admit, a very considerable discrepancy between the estimated and the real amounts coming under those heads. He found, for example, that the estimated amount of the expenditure for 1859-60 was £46,890,000; the actual expenditure, £50,475,000; the estimated revenue, £37,796,000; the actual revenue, £39,705,000; the anticipated deficit being thus in round numbers £9,000,000; the actual, £10,770,000; the actual income was larger than the estimated by about £2,000,000, and the actual expenditure more than the estimated by about £3,500,000. That appeared to be incredible, but no explanation of the matter had been sent from India. An explanation had been written for, and he had anticipated that it would be found to consist in the fact that the reductions made by Mr. Wilson in the military expenditure had not been brought into the accounts for the year, and would appear in the accounts for the years 1860-1. While, however, he was waiting to receive some information in reply to his inquiries on the subject, he had been very much surprised to see a statement made by Mr. Laing to the effect that the expenditure for the year 1860-1 was, notwithstanding the reductions to which he alluded, actually £200,000 in excess of that for the year immediately preceding. Upon making inquiry of Mr. Laing himself, who had returned to this country the other day, and who he was sure the House would be glad to hear was much improved in health by the voyage home, he learnt that the statement in question was attributable to the fact that Mr. Laing had been misled by the accounts published by the Financial Department of the Government of India in the Calcutta Gazette, which turned out to be altogether erroneous; the real truth of the case being, as he had anticipated, that the reductions stated by Mr. Wilson to have been brought to account in 1859-60 were not brought to account till the following year. Those reductions in the military expenditure, as estimated by Mr. Wilson, amounted for the year 1859-60 to £3,500,000; for 1860-1 to £2,500,000; making a total of £6,000,000; and he was happy to be able to say that, although the actual reduction under that head amounted in the former year to only £171,641, the estimated decrease for 1860-1, based on figures on which he could place reliance, was so large that the reduction in the two years was £5,800,000. He now came to the year 1860-1, the expenditure for which was, in round numbers, £46,000,000; the income, £39,500,000; deficit, £6,500,000; but, if from that amount were deducted the sums paid in the shape of compensation for losses incurred during the mutiny which did not constitute an annual charge, and some other items, the actual deficit would be found to be reduced to little more than £5,500,000. [Mr. H. SEYMOUR: Does that statement include home charges?] Yes. That being so, the Committee would at once see that the expenditure for 1859-60 having been £50,475,000, and that for 1860-1, £46,000,000, a comparison of the expenditure for the two years showed a reduction in favour of the latter of, in round numbers, £4,400,000. Now, it might be asked whether the result of the statements he had just made ought not to be to shake the faith of the House of Commons in the accuracy of the Estimates of Indian revenue and expenditure which might hereafter be drawn up, but his answer to that question must be in the negative, inasmuch as greater pains had been recently and were now bestowed on the framing of these Estimates than used to be the case. That he was justified in making that statement was, he thought, proved by the fact that the amount of cash balances in the Indian Treasury at the end of the financial year was greater than had been anticipated—a circumstance which was to be attributed rather to a reduction of expenditure than to any increase in revenue. The cash balances, as estimated in the regular Estimates for 1861-2, contained in the papers which had been laid on the Table of the House in March last, amounted to £11,448,000, while it appeared by the Financial Letter from India, dated the 2nd of May—which contained, of course, the actual amount so far as the great treasuries were concerned, and the estimated only so far as related to the more distant treasuries; that these cash balances reached the sum of £12,850,000, thus leaving a surplus over the amount estimated so recently as March last of £1,402,000. No more satisfactory proof than that could, he thought, be afforded of the improved state of Indian finance; nor need he, he felt assured, say anything further to point out that greater confidence than hitherto might be placed on the system of accounts in India, and that that confidence ought to be extended to the Estimate for the current year. That Estimate he found given by Mr. Laing in a very clear manner in his official statement, although he could not help thinking it was somewhat too favourable. Mr. Laing, by transferring to the local budgets £500,000, omitting loss in connection with railroad money, £470,000, and making a reduction on home charges, beyond the estimate which was sent out from this country, of £300,000, arrived at a surplus of nearly a quarter of a million; but, taking a view of the case which he believed, after due consideration, to be more correct than that formed by Mr. Laing, and assuming the revenue of India to remain as it was, and no reduction of expenditure to take place, he calculated there would be a deficit of £1,000,000 at the close of the current year. That amount would be diminished to the extent of £500,000 if a transference of expenditure to that amount were made to the local Budget. Mr. Laing also hoped that a considerable reduction might be effected in connection with the army, and he hoped that in the proposed modification of the licensing tax, some additional revenue might be derived from that source. He was in hopes that in one way or another the deficiency would entirely disappear. But, even if it did not, the cash balances were amply sufficient to defray any excess of expenditure which might occur in the course of the present year. At the end of the present year, at latest, the expenditure and income would be brought into a state of complete equilibrium, and he trusted that in future there would be no necessity for raising any loan, either in India or in England, to meet the Government or State expenditure in India. There were one or two things very satisfactory in the Budget statement from India. In the first place, the expenditure for this year included a sum of £600,000, which was entirely due to the recent famine in India, and that item of course would not occur again. In the next place, a large portion of the expenditure consisted of the guaranteed interest on railway capital, and of the loss arising from the transmission of money to India. This was for the present a charge upon the revenues of India; but, of course, when the railways were completed and became remunerative, to however small an extent, that charge would cease. For the present year the charge for guaranteed interest, less traffic receipts, was £1,300,000, and the loss by exchange last year amounted to £473,000, the result being a charge upon the revenue of India of £1,773,000 on account of railways alone. But that charge, as he had said, would soon cease, and he hoped he might look forward to a state of things in India such as had not been seen for many years past. For some time past there had been an excess of expenditure over income, but he trusted that after this year, unless some great calamity occurred, we should have a surplus instead of a deficiency, and then we should be able to make those alterations in the taxation of the country which everybody wished to see carried into effect. The reduction of the duty on yarn from 10 to 5 per cent had caused some loss to the revenue, but he hoped the yield would soon reach its former amount. He also trusted that we might be able before long to reduce, in like manner, the duty on manufactured goods from this country. The duty on salt had been most productive, and he was glad to say that, owing to the improved condition of the people in India, it had in no degree diminished the consumption. In Bengal, where the additional duty was highest, the consumption had increased very rapidly. The additional duty was 25 per cent, whereas the increased consumption was 30 per cent. He believed that the only duty as to which any apprehensions were entertained was, as usual, the duty on opium. Last year, owing to the very high price of opium at Calcutta, the duty was exceedingly productive; but within the last few months the price had fallen considerably, and one never could speak with confidence as to what the yield of the tax would be. Mr. Laing had taken a low figure, and he believed his estimate would not be found too large. The House already knew that the reduction which had taken place was mainly in the military expenditure. He did not mean to say that it had been carried as far as he could have wished. If it had been begun earlier it would have been more valuable; but he thought the House would be satisfied, after hearing a few facts, that a great deal had been done in a short time. The following short paragraph from the last financial despatch from India would show the amount of the reduction:—

“Seventy-seven Native regiments will have been broken up since 1859, and the Native army reduced from 284,000 to about 140,000 men. Including military police, the reduction of Native armed force since 1859 will not have been less than 200,000 men.”

A certain proportion of the soldiers had been absorbed in the police, and a considerable number had found employment in various ways. He thought that, considering the state of the country, the Government of India had gone quite as far and as rapidly as prudence would warrant. In 1858-9 the military expenditure was £24,750,000; in 1861-2 it was estimated at £15,500,000—showing a reduction since 1858-9 of no less than £9,250,000. He had nothing further to say on points of finance; but there were certain matters connected with the administration of India upon which he wished to make a few remarks. A most interesting and instructive report on the famine had been received from Colonel Baird Smith, and he would state one or two facts from it. The extent of the area over which the drought prevailed was much more restricted than many people supposed. A considerable portion of the North-West Provinces was visited by the famine, but in the neighbouring countries—Oude, for example—there was plenty of grain to be had; the difficulty was in paying for it. In the afflicted districts the distress arose from the utter impossibility of cultivating the soil, which, from the want of rain, became almost as hard as iron. Perhaps the best proof of the severity of the pressure was to be found in the price of grain. It was very remarkable that though the famine of 1837-8 was infinitely more severe, and infinitely more destructive to human life and cattle, than that which recently raged in certain districts in India, the price of grain was never so high as it was during the last year. Taking the mean of the six districts where the famine was most severe, the average price of grain in common years was 40½ seers per rupee; during the famine the same sum purchased

only nine seers. Relief had been extended very largely to the people, partly by the Government and partly by liberal subscriptions raised in India and in this country. For a considerable period no fewer than 143,000 people were daily employed on the relief works—irrigation, railways, and roads. The famine led to an extensive emigration from the afflicted districts, but he had every reason to suppose that the people would return to cultivate the soil when the rain came. Colonel Baird Smith showed in his Report the diminished quantity of rain which fell during the last year. In the six districts where the famine raged the average fall of rain was, in autumn, 24·19; in spring, 6·86; but during the famine year it was, in autumn, 9·09, and in spring, 1·33. These variations in the fall of rain were quite sufficient to account for the failure in the production of food for man and beast, the productiveness of the soil in India being almost entirely dependent on the rain-fall. It was curious enough that those tribes which were the best agriculturists had resisted the famine throughout, while those who had not given their attention to agriculture were not only worst off, but actually would not receive assistance; their heart failed them, and to a great extent they emigrated to other districts where the famine was less severe. Fortunately, by the blessing of Providence, rain had fallen more early this year than usual, and he hoped, therefore, they might anticipate that the worst of the famine was over, and that next year would be one of prosperity. The next subject to which he would call the attention of the House was one on which some discussion had taken place, on the Motion of the hon Member for Southwark, in connection with the planting of Indigo in Bengal. The state of feeling between the ryot and planter was, unfortunately, one of some standing, and its more recent intensity had been productive of great suffering and loss. He held in his hand a letter from the late Lieutenant Governor of Bengal, so long ago as 1854, stating that while the planting of indigo ought to have been one of the greatest blessings to the country, the ryots themselves regarded it as their direst curse. The cultivation of indigo during the present year had ceased to a great extent. There had been attempts to enforce by criminal proceedings the performance by the ryots of the contracts into which they had entered. A measure had been passed with that view ; but of course that was only a temporary Bill. No doubt the indigo planters would lose very largely, and it was natural that they should be exceedingly irritated at the present lamentable state of things. The Government, however, had done their duty in all cases by holding the scales as impartially as possible between the ryots and planters. He was sorry, however, to say the bad feeling which existed had been increased by a fact to which the hon. Member for Westminster had on a former occasion referred—namely, the circulation under an official frank of a Bengal play not calculated to raise the character of the planters in Bengal. He thought that a most improper act, which had been done not only entirely without the sanction, but without the knowledge of the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal. When brought to his knowledge in such a way that he could take notice of it, he had expressed his extreme disapprobation of such conduct. It was the duty of the Government, as he had stated, to hold the scales of justice perfectly even between the one and the other—to protect the ryot from oppression and the planter against violence ; and all parties in this country must be anxious to contribute as far as they could to a fair and reasonable settlement of the dispute. They were the best friends both to the ryot and the planter, to the interests of this country and of India, who sought to soothe feeling on both sides, and promote as far as possible that settlement which would restore the cultivation of indigo on a sounder and healthier foundation than before. The next point to which he would call attention was one which at all times was of the greatest importance, but at the present moment was of vital importance to this country and India—he meant the cultivation of cotton. He need not say that his attention had been directed to this subject in former years ; and his attention had been constantly directed to it since he held the office he had now the honour to fill. Various opinions were entertained as to the capability of India to produce cotton in the quantity required by this country. His firm conviction was that if proper means were taken in India by the Government, and by those in this country who were interested in the production of cotton, all co-operating together—and it could not be done without that co-operation—India might be made a source of supply which, to a very large extent, would render this country independent of other countries. He trusted before long that would be the case. So far as he could make out the probable supply of cotton from India this year would be very large—considerably in excess of any previous supply. Upwards of 620,000 bales had already left India for this country ; from 300,000 to 400,000 bales more were expected ; so that in all there would be 1,000,000 bales, or 320,000 more than ever before were received from India. The price obtained, he hoped, would stimulate still further the cultivation of cotton in India, and lead to an improvement in the processes of picking and cleaning, which the cultivators were too apt to forget. The Indian Government had laid out considerable sums of money in endeavouring to ascertain what were the best sorts to be grown in India, and in the southern parts a considerable quantity had been grown and sent to Calcutta. He thought it well worth the while of those interested in the growth of cotton in India to take active measures in order to obtain from all accessible points the best information on the subject. With this view he was happy to state that Mr. Haywood had been sent out from this country. Dr. Forbes, in India, was, he believed, intimately acquainted with the best modes of producing cotton in that country. These two gentlemen were going to visit the cotton districts together, and he hoped the result would be to lay the foundation of producing cotton in India to a much larger extent and in better condition than had hitherto been the case. So much for private enterprise. The duty of the Government was to improve the communications from the coast to those portions of the interior where cotton was grown. The main source of supply were two—Dharwar and Berar—and every effort was being made to improve the communications as rapidly as possible. With regard to Dharwar cotton, the most convenient port was Sadashevagur, and orders had been given for proceeding rapidly with the road to that place. He would read an extract from the last report which had been received on that subject—

“ Orders have been given that the engineer in charge shall be supplied with funds as fast as he can employ them advantageously. The Government promise that ‘no exertion shall be spared to have the road completed throughout as early as possible ; but this,’ they add, ‘cannot be this year.’ ”

He now came to the second source of supply, Berar. Cotton would be brought thence in two ways—first, by the East India Peninsula Railway, for the prosecution of the works of which, as rapidly as possible, orders had been issued. What ever money was necessary for that purpose would be forthcoming, and both branches of the line—namely, that through the centre districts to Nagpore, and also the northern branch, would be completed as expeditiously as practicable. Another route by which cotton could come from Berar would be by the Godavery. The navigation of that river was to be opened up with the least possible delay. When Captain Haigh was here, he asked for money to provide plant and machinery with which to improve the Godavery along its whole course, and whatever he had asked for had been supplied. No means would be spared and no time lost in furthering that important work. Sir W. Denison, the Governor of Madras, said that immediately on his return from Calcutta he would proceed along the course of the Godavery himself to see what would be the most advantageous mode of conducting these works. For himself, he had always been convinced of the expediency of opening this great channel of communication into the interior; but hitherto the main difficulty had been the want of funds. That difficulty was now got over; and although when questioned on this subject the other day, he was then unable to answer until he had consulted his Council, he was happy to have it in his power now to state that it had been determined that morning in the Council to send out orders to India directing that the opening up of the Godavery should be carried out as rapidly as the supply of labour available would allow, and as was consistent with the due execution of the work. In the present precarious state of our cotton supply, the Government would not do its duty either to this country or to India if it lost a moment in taking energetic measures to provide the means of communication between the cotton growing districts of India and the coast. He would next make a few observations on one or two points connected with the political administration of India. He had briefly adverted on a former occasion to the policy pursued by Lord Canning towards the Native Princes and chiefs. That policy he believed to be sound in principle, and well calculated to lay a firm foundation for our power. As far as it had already been carried out it had proved exceedingly successful. In past years the tendency had been rather to depress the Native Princes. That had been entirely reversed of late. New treaties had been made with several of those Princes, and territory assigned to them which, while consolidating our dominions, increased the dignity and honour of those to whom that territory was assigned; and an assurance was held out that Native rights would not be invaded by the British Government. An exemplification of the effect of that policy was seen in the recent events in Sikkim. The people of that country made inroads into our territory, and carried off our subjects. It was the duty of our Government to despatch a force to that quarter to obtain the liberation of the captives, and also reparation for the outrage committed upon them. Reparation was accordingly demanded by our agent, accompanied by an intimation that we had not the slightest intention of annexing an acre of territory. What was the result? Our troops had hardly entered Sikkim before a conciliatory message was sent by the Rajah, which led to the speedy conclusion of a treaty between that Prince and Mr. Eden in the most amiable and satisfactory manner. And not only so, but, with the Rajah's concurrence, a road was to be opened from our dominions through Sikkim into Thibet, and goods were to be allowed to pass into Thibet and Sikkim either at no duty at all or at a very low one. Thus would be attained that which had long been a great desideratum—namely, a land communication between China and India. The Governor General had written to our Minister at Peking to procure the requisite authority for the introduction into Thibet of a small party of Indian officials, who would penetrate into that country to ascertain what openings there were for commerce. A similar policy had been pursued towards the upper classes of Natives in our own provinces. They had been associated more than they formerly were with the higher agents of our Government. The talookdars of Oude now acted as magistrates, collected the revenue, and performed the other duties of country gentlemen, and the most friendly spirit existed between them and our officers. In a Report from the Chief Commissioner of Oude as to the instructions given to our officers there was this passage—

Sir Charles Wood

“The Chief Commissioner's wish is to treat the talookdars as gentlemen of property and station, whose interests are identified with those of the Government, who are its natural born adherents, not opponents, as they have too frequently been considered by our officials; and this view he has inculcated in his subordinates. All district officers have been desired to hold weekly receptions of the native gentry, to visit them on their estates during the cold weather, and to communicate with them as much as possible direct, and not through native subordinate officials, who designedly often adopt an uncourteous tone."

MR. VANSITTART asked the name of the author of that document.

SIR CHARLES WOOD believed it was Mr. Wingfield. Experience had shown, especially during the rebellion, how much the people of Oude and other provinces were attached to their Native gentry and chiefs. Our Government in India had profited by that lesson, and sought henceforth to make the Native gentry and chiefs our steadfast friends and supporters, instead of our enemies. The Home Government had been guided by the same spirit. Some mode of rewarding Native chiefs for their fidelity had long been wanted; and lately Her Majesty had been graciously pleased to institute an Order of Knighthood, which had already been conferred on seven or eight Native Princes of India, some Hindoos and some Mahomedans, with whom were associated European officers, either of the Company or of the Crown, who had rendered distinguished service in that country. The Governor General believed that this measure had had the very best possible effect, and that such a mark of favour from the Sovereign of England and of India would be highly valued by the Native chiefs. The three Indian Bills introduced into Parliament this Session were framed in one and the same spirit—namely, a desire to break down the system of exclusiveness, and admit to a participation in the management of public affairs both European settlers and Natives of rank and ability. By those measures both of those classes would or might have a voice in the Legislature, a seat on the bench, or a part in the Administration of India. The earnest aim of the Government, both in India and at home, was to consult the interests and conciliate the affections of the inhabitants of that country, European and Native. He was aware that one of the three Bills had excited considerable alarm among the Civil Servants. That alarm, however, was, he hoped, now allayed. The Civil Servants had met the proposed changes in the frankest spirit. He did not believe they would be at all injured by what had been done; but it was right to acknowledge the spirit in which they met these changes. He was happy to say that since the Bill had passed he had received a minute from the Governor General recommending a course substantially the same as that which had been adopted. As to the other two Bills, the nature of them was so well known to the Committee that he need only remind them that the first admitted Natives to the highest places in the Legislature of India, while the other would enable them to take their places upon the bench along with Europeans, and by their knowledge of the laws of their own country there was no doubt the administration of justice would be improved. Provision was also made for legislating on local subjects at Madras and Bombay, and other parts of India, which was so much desired by the inhabitants of parts of India away from Calcutta, and which would, he thought, tend much not only to the contentment but to the advantage of India. Those were the measures which had been adopted within the last few months in India and in England, and which he hoped would be productive of great advantage to both countries. It had been a matter of satisfaction to him to find that there was a general concurrence in the policy which those measures indicated. That they were measures of vast importance no one could deny, and he had deeply felt the responsibility that weighed upon him in proposing measures affecting the vast and anomalous fabric of our Indian Empire. Upon such matters no man could be certain of results; but he could only say that those measures were the result of deep deliberation, and had the concurrence of the highest authorities upon Indian subjects. The event must be left in the hands of Providence, and now he could only hope and pray the measures that had been adopted would contribute to the welfare of both countries, and would cement the bond of union between England and India by promoting the prosperity and happiness of all Her Majesty's subjects. The right hon. Baronet concluded by moving a formal Resolution, that it was expedient to give power to the Secretary of State to raise money by way of loans.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, he rose to express his satisfaction at the lucid statement of the right hon. Gentleman, and the wise policy which it enunciated. Indeed, he considered it to be the most satisfactory statement he had made with regard to India since he had the honour of a seat in the House. He could not, in the first place, pass over the great debt which the country owed to the late Mr. Wilson, who had fallen a victim to his zeal in the interests of the public. Another hon. Gentleman had also nearly fallen a victim to his arduous labours in the same cause; but he was gratified to learn that Mr. Laing had just arrived in England in better health than was expected, and looked forward to being able in a short time to resume his labours in India. It was most desirable that he should be able to do so, because his last speech showed that Mr. Laing felt the absolute necessity of equalizing the revenue and the expenditure, and of admitting the Natives of India to some share in their own Government. The right hon. Gentleman had omitted to notice one point urged by Mr. Laing, that the local Governments should have the power of making minor budgets for their own localities. It would be satisfactory to hear that the right hon. Baronet concurred in that view. Mr. Laing had shown that in Madras 40 per cent of the outlay upon public works was consumed in the supervision of those works. That was an enormous waste of money, but it would always occur as long as the Government had no interest in keeping down the expenditure. The most unsatisfactory part of the right hon. Baronet's statement was that while Mr. Laing estimated a surplus of £300,000, the right hon. Gentleman expected a deficiency of a million. The right hon. Gentleman proposed to make up the deficiency in some part by a licence-tax, which Mr. Laing objected to inflict upon the Natives of India. He (Mr. Seymour) thought less objectionable means could be adopted, one of which he would point out. They had very large military charges in proportion to the reductions in the army. There had been a reduction of 200,000 Native troops, and the number to be kept up in future was 140,000, but the contemplated expenditure for military purposes in future years was higher in amount than it was in 1857. They were quite right in keeping up a sufficient European force in India, but the force now in that country was 19,000 in excess of the European force which the right hon. Gentleman himself had estimated to be necessary for the security of our empire. It was proposed to absorb that excess at the rate of 2,000 men a year, but when the finances of India were so much pressed upon he thought the reduction might be carried out more speedily. But, above all, it was wrong under those circumstances to send out more troops from England. No less than 3,000 men of the most expensive artillery, had been sent from England to India. He could not understand why the number of men could not have been obtained as volunteers from the surplus troops now in India. There was another point to which he would call attention. It appeared that an error of £4,500,000 had been made not six months before in the revenue department of Calcutta in the estimate of last year. He should be glad to know whether this department had lately been thoroughly remodelled, in accordance with a promise of the right hon. Gentleman. He knew that it was the wish of the Marquess of Dalhousie that the Indian accounts should be kept in precisely the same manner as the accounts of the Imperial Government. He saw no reason why trade and navigation returns should not be published periodically, similar to those of this country. The income tax was an apparent failure, but the right hon. Gentleman was, he thought, right in persevering with it, so as to uphold the principle of taxing personal property instead of raising all the taxes from the land. It should not, however, be carried too low. He was glad the right hon. Gentleman did not mean in future to borrow. If the House could depend on the Estimates—and he trusted that Mr. Laing had given the right hon. Gentleman satisfactory assurances on this subject—the expenditure and revenue at the end of the current year would balance each other, leaving out the railways. The recent famine could not fail to draw the right hon. Gentleman's attention to the subject of emigration from India to the West Indian Islands, and other places willing to receive labour. The question was of great importance, from its bearing on the subjects of the slave trade and the supply of cotton, and he trusted that the Indian Government had now ceased to place obstacles in the way of emigration from India. Had the French Emperor been enabled to obtain labour from India for the French West Indian colonies, he would not have been compelled to obtain importations from Africa. He considered the French Government not so much to blame for the temporary extension of the slave trade arising from that cause as the Indian Government. The famine must have convinced the right hon. Gentleman of the importance of encouraging public works in India, for had there been better roads and communications in the North of India no famine

would have occurred. The right hon. Gentleman's statement respecting the indigo districts was not perfectly satisfactory. The right hon. Gentleman had prevented the Indian Government from carrying out a beneficial law of contract, but had not suggested any law of contract himself. The Civil Service disliked the planters, and he must say that the conduct of Mr. Eden, which had been justly praised on other grounds, deserved blame with reference to the planters. He thought that the Government had acted improperly in circulating an obnoxious pamphlet, which was a caricature of the planters. With regard to the question of the cultivation of cotton, he considered it would be better promoted by the construction of railroads than common roads. Mr. Locke, formerly a Member of that House, and Mr. Brassey had both assured him that the expense of the maintenance of a road was exactly the same as that of a railway, when it was once made. The only difference was the first cost. He regretted that nothing had been done to advance railways in the southern parts of India, where a communication with the cotton districts was much wanted. He was delighted to hear that at last the Government had adopted a policy so rational and so excellent in every way as that which it had announced with regard to the Native Chiefs and Princes of India, for he believed it would be productive of the greatest possible benefit to the Natives, and ensure the permanent tranquillity of the country, but it had, unfortunately, required a great convulsion and revolution, and a terrible massacre in India to convince them of the wisdom of such a step. If that policy had been adopted in 1853 he firmly believed the mutiny would never have occurred, and an addition of £40,000,000 to the Indian debt might have been averted. They had already found the profit of a wise policy in the opening of China. He remembered when, immediately before the mutiny, a gentleman connected with the East India Company said how easy it would be to govern India for the future. However, since then the mutiny had taught him better, and a policy of conciliation had been introduced. He was glad that the Order of the Star of India had been established, and he was sure the Native Princes had accepted with pleasure and gratitude the conciliatory policy of the British Government, and that they would henceforth consider themselves magnates of the British Empire as much as Peers of Parlia- ment. As a general rule, every educated Native of India was a friend to this country. He was told by schoolmasters in India that the difficulty was to get the boys out to play, so anxious were they to learn the English language, and so studious and painstaking was the Native character. So good and great a change of policy as had now taken place could not fail to lead to beneficial results.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that instead of following the hon. Gentleman over the wide field of discussion he had opened, he would confine his observations to the subject before the Committee—the state of Indian finance. He had no idea the right hon. Gentleman intended to make his financial statement on India that night. He supposed from the notice paper that the right hon. Gentleman only intended to move in Committee a Resolution upon which he might found his Bill for the Indian loan for railways. The right hon. Gentleman would not forget that on the 11th of February in the present year he had stated that in his view no loan would be wanted for the public exigencies of India, although it was possible a railway loan might be required. But only the other day the House had passed a Bill empowering the Indian Government to raise £4,000,000 for the public exigencies, and, therefore, that amount had been added to the public debt of India. The railway finance of India appeared to be so intimately dove-tailed with the general finance that it required a sharp intellect to distinguish the one from the other. In 1857 the debt of India was £57,500,000, now it amounted to £103,000,000. The dead weight upon the finances of India had, indeed, increased so alarmingly that it had become a source of financial danger to that empire. The collection of Indian revenue amounted to £4,500,000; the allowance to Native Princes and other charges to £2,250,000; and the charge on account of the debt was from £3,500,000 to £4,000,000, making a total of £10,000,000. For the last three years there had been a series of most extraordinary miscalculations, both in India and at home, with regard to Indian finance. Mr. Laing only recently made a mistake of £1,300,000 by the omission with regard to the transfer of the Indian navy. He (Sir Henry Willoughby) must say that the right hon. Gentleman had been very sparing in his observations as to the state of Indian finance. He certainly had hoped to hear something from him as to the cost of the new scheme of amalgamation. They had heard a good deal about the reduction in the military expenditure, and no doubt it had been very great, but the House had not heard a word about the Staff corps, or how the Indian officers were to be secured those prospects which were guaranteed them by the Act of 1858. He could not help sharing and sympathizing with the disappointment Mr. Laing had expressed that the right hon. Gentleman, the Secretary in Council, had not been able to do something to curb the military expenditure on this side of the water. It appeared that the War Office had more control over the finances of India than the right hon. Gentleman and his Council. It appeared that the Secretary of State and Council had no effective control over the military expenditure. The number of men in the Indian depôts in this country was reduced, but the officers were not reduced; and why had not the Secretary of State and Council pluck enough to insist upon a reduction of the officers? If the right hon. Gentleman did not defend the Indian Exchequer, there would be no end of the charges which, on one pretext or another, would be placed upon it. He hoped the House would back the Secretary of State for India, and induce him to defend the Indian Exchequer with more spirit than he had hitherto done. When they were endeavouring to reduce expenditure in India at every risk, and were resorting to the most extraordinary modes of taxation, they should on this side of the water do what was fair and just. It would, therefore, have given him pleasure to hear the right hon. Secretary of State speak with a little more determination on that point; in fact, he believed he had not spoken on it at all. Passing to the subject of railways, he would say that he looked with great distrust upon a Government engaging in such matters, in which substantially they could have no control. This year £8,000,000 would be required, but how long was that to go on? The original estimate for railways in India was £54,000,000 or £56,000,000. Now, he would like the right hon. Gentleman to state what was the extreme amount of obligation that was contemplated on these railways. The companies had raised on paper £32,000,000, of which they had actually advanced £30,500,000. Would the remaining £24,000,000 be the whole of the possible obligation which the House would be called upon, either directly or indirectly, to furnish or guarantee? There were questions which appeared to him to be of great importance, and he thought the Committee ought to receive information upon them.

MR. KINNAIRD said, he was glad that the hon. Baronet had called attention to the Indian military expenditure in this country. It was a subject that required the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India, for it was clear that when the amalgamation of the armies took place the object of the Home authorities would be to throw as much expense as possible on the Indian finances, by maintaining large depôts in this country. He agreed with the hon. Member who spoke in favour of giving due importance to the Native Princes in India, but he thought that the hon. Member carried his idea too far when he said that if that policy had been adopted before, there would have been no mutiny. The mutiny, it must be remembered, was a military mutiny. The reduction of an overgrown Native army had long been imperative. A large expenditure under that head was absolutely ruinous, and retrenchment was a source of strength. He could not but deprecate the course taken by the right hon. Gentleman with reference to the loans, as, instead of giving an Imperial guarantee, he was raising money at 5 per cent, which might otherwise be had at three and a quarter, thus disturbing, also, the finances of the country. The Chancellor of the Exchequer must look upon the right hon. Gentleman as his greatest enemy, for he was disturbing his money market for the sake of theories. In India, however, retrenchment was not the only remedy for a deficiency of revenue. He should have been, therefore, glad to hear that remunerative public works were to be extensively undertaken. Increased instead of diminished expenditure in that respect was the secret of wealth and power; and he hoped they would soon see the day when there would be a separate Board of Public Works composed of men like Colonel Baird and Sir Arthur Cotton, who were entirely devoted to their development. Deficiency of revenue instead of being an argument for diminishing expenditure under that head, was only a reason for increasing it. In the water-courses of India lay the wealth of that empire. The old Native Princes had executed the most magnificent works for the purposes of irrigation and navigation, but these had long since fallen into ruin; and it was the duty of England, as the governing power in that country, to see that her internal resources were properly developed. Let those works be restored and they would become the source of fertility and riches. Let them be left as they were, and while occasionally the rivers fertilized the country through which they passed, at other times they desolated it by flood, or left it barren through failure of supply. He might illustrate what he had said by a reference to Cuttack and Tanjore, which were districts of about the same size. During twenty-three years only £2,400 was expended annually upon waterworks in Cuttack, while in Tanjore £11,600 was spent. The annual revenue from Cuttack consequently was only £85,000, while that of Tanjore was £470,000. Land in Cuttack was worth £1 10s., in Tanjore £5 an acre; and while Cuttack had the best natural supply of water, yet in twenty-three years it had three years of famine, four of drought, seven of inundation, two of severe inundation, and only seven moderate seasons. The total excess of revenue from Tanjore during that period was nearly £7,000,000. He would ask them, then, which was the true economy?—to increase our expenditure on works of irrigation, and thus our revenue; or to diminish it or allow it to remain stationary? Again, as a mere question of finance, what could be more ruinous than periodical famines? It was unquestionable that they could be averted; and, happily, our interest and our duty equally called upon us to avert them. Closely connected with irrigation was increased facility for the conveyance of goods. The waste of goods in India caused by the want of canals was a fearful evil. He had heard it said in general terms, for instance, that as much cotton was wasted in the interior of the Madras Presidency as was produced in America. Give the Natives of India a market for their goods, and a remunerative price, and there was no limit to what they could produce. But, more than that, the development of roads and of other means of communication was absolutely essential for the administration of justice. He believed that a strict inquiry into the condition of Bengal, for instance, would show that to false economy was owing some of the terrible evils under which the ryots there had for years been groaning. European magistrates were placed in charge of enormous districts, and the difficulty of doing their duty was greatly increased by the want of roads. On every ground, therefore, he felt imperatively called upon to press the question of public works on the attention of the Government, and to demand for the people of India every facility that could be granted, for the development of its natural resources, and of its commerce.

Mr. VANSITTART said, that, having trespassed so often on the indulgence of the House during the Session in reference to Indian questions, he rose very reluctantly on that occasion. He could not, however, refrain from expressing the feeling of deep regret with which he had listened to the statement of the right hon. Baronet, as he thought the practice of coming down to the House year after year for powers to raise loans for India very objectionable. The objection was the greater on the present occasion, because the right hon. Gentleman asked for another loan actually within a week after the acceptance of tenders for a loan, which had been already sanctioned during the year. If, however, the right hon. Baronet preferred to adopt that course, instead of submitting a bold and comprehensive financial scheme in reference to the entire debt for India, that unhappy state of affairs must continue. He was aware that that course had its attractions, inasmuch as all that the right hon. Baronet had to do was to announce his intention to make a loan, and calculate a price at which it would be sure to command a premium, and he was aware by experience that he would find no difficulty in obtaining tenders for twenty times the amount required. But he begged to warn him that, however popular such an arrangement might be regarded on the Stock Exchange, it involved a serious loss to the Indian Government, because the loans were obliged to be issued at a price below that which would be given by regular contractors. The right hon. Gentleman, moreover, encouraged stock-jobbing, and he disturbed the regular and legitimate monetary and banking business of the City. He had no sort of intention to dispute the absolute necessity of completing these railways as rapidly as possible. He thought that was only due from England as the ruling Power—that they were calculated to be advantageous to her, and it must be for her interest that the trade and industrial resources of India should go on expanding like her own every year. But what he complained of was that the right hon. Baronet did not explain the precise position and the relationship existing between those railway companies and the Government. Now that the English Government had stepped forward with the necessary funds to complete them, some explanation on that point was very naturally sought to be obtained by the proprietors and shareholders. It should also be borne in mind that the Indian Government, at the instigation of the Home Government, had interfered very actively in the construction of those railways from the very commencement, and not always to the advantage and profit of the railway companies. Let him take, for instance, the Madras Railway, which ran from Madras to Beypore, on the Malabar coast. The Indian and Home Governments insisted that for military purposes it should be made from point to point, as straight as a needle; and so cleverly had that been done that the railway contrived to avoid every town and village of any importance. The consequence was that the receipts of the last six months, after paying the working expenses, amount to only £7,000, on an outlay of several millions. For his own part, he confessed that, looking to these facts and to the great stake and interest which the Home Government had acquired in these railways, he thought the time had arrived for considering whether it would not be desirable for all parties concerned that we should adopt the Ceylon system—namely, abolish the twelve or fifteen separate companies which now existed in this country, and transfer the management of them to the Secretary of State for India and to his not overworked Council. Would it be believed that to manage a capital not so large as that of the London and North-Western or Great Western Railways there were some twelve or thirteen separate companies, with chairmen, deputy-chairmen, directors, secretaries, clerks, and handsome offices? They were all amenable to one and the same authority, the Secretary of State and his Council, and they refuse to stir an inch or to turn a clod of earth until they obtained a guaranteed interest of 5 per cent. Now, the great advantages resulting from his proposition would be that the shareholders would possess increased confidence in the soundness of their investments—the necessary funds to complete them would be easily raised—very great economy would be introduced, because that part of the Indian Council which was called the Committee for Public Works, would perform all the duties of those twelve or fifteen separate companies with the assistance of a few additional clerks; and, lastly, the great mercantile community would be spared the trouble of having to wander to all parts of the City in quest of the numerous companies now in existence.

MR. CRAWFORD said, that if the hon. Member for Windsor, before recommending that all the railways in India should be handed over to the Secretary of State and his Council, had inquired into the relations which at present existed between the railway companies and the Government, he would have found that they were of such a nature as could not be interfered with except by a direct act of the Legislature. The railways in India had been constructed and were to be managed under contracts entered into by the companies with the Government under the sanction of Parliament, and if they were to be transferred to the Secretary of State and his Council, what, he asked, was to become of the shareholders? The Government could not take possession of the railways without repaying to the proprietors their capital, which was the reason, perhaps, why the hon. Member for Windsor wished to see the railways placed under the management of the Secretary of State and his Council. The hon. Member was largely concerned in the Madras Railway, which happened to occupy a worse position in the market than any other line in India, and if that railway were to be taken by the Government at par, the hon. Member would receive £10 more for every £100 which he had invested in the undertaking than he could obtain by the sale of his shares on the Stock Exchange. Reference had been made to a statement by the Governor General as to enormous extravagance on the part of the railway companies in India; but it should be borne in mind that the whole of the expenditure on railways in India was incurred under the direct control and superintendence of the Government itself. The Government was a party to every item of expenditure, and, therefore, when the Governor General said that enormous extravagance had marked the expenditure of the railway companies, he was fostering a censure upon his own administration. The hon. Member for Poole had urged the construction of more railways; but he could not help thinking that to enter upon such works at the present moment would only increase the difficulties of the time. Money could not be obtained for new railways without the security of a Government guarantee. The existing companies were pushing forward their works with the utmost vigour, and in a very short time there would be 7,000 instead of 700 miles of railway opened in India. Of course, in some instances, the shareholders would be disappointed; but he believed that in the great majority of cases the traffic and profits would considerably exceed the guaranteed amount. He agreed with the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) that beneficial results would ensue from the sale of waste lands. There was at present a large accumulation of capital in Native hands. That capital would soon require an outlet; and, since the confidence of the Natives in public loans had been completely shaken, he did not see how it could be more judiciously invested than in land. He rejoiced to hear that there was no necessity to ask for money for the general purposes of the Indian Government. The powers now asked were to be only discretionary. He could not help, under these circumstances, expressing his opinions that, in the present state of the money market and the increasing value of Indian securities here, the railway companies would find no difficulty—or, at least, not so much as had been expected—in finding money in the course of the year, and that the Government would not have to use to any very great extent the powers which the House was asked to vest in them.

MR. VANSITTART said, he must altogether disclaim the motives which had been imputed to him by the hon. Member for the City of London, in the recommendation he had made. He had but a small stake in Indian railways; whereas the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Crawford) was not only chairman of the East India Railway, but possessed a very large stake in Indian railways.

MR. J. B. SMITH said, that the statement of the right hon. Baronet in relation to the condition of Indian finance was under the circumstances satisfactory; and he congratulated the Committee that no further loans would be resorted to or needed, except for reproductive public works. In one item of revenue, indeed, there was a likelihood of a further and very rapid increase—he alluded to the revenue produced by the duty on salt. Every additional mile of railway and river navigation which was opened reduced the present enormous cost of carriage, and thus enabled the Natives to obtain salt upon lower terms than before, and in that proportion would the consumption increase. There was one point in the right hon. Baronet's speech which would give great satisfaction to the manufacturers of cotton in this country. For the last twenty years they looked with alarm at their growing dependence upon one source of supply. That dependence had gone on increasing, until last year the consumption of American cotton was 85 per cent of the entire amount. Various steps had been taken from time to time to enlarge the supply; and it was now found that India was the only source to which they could look for receiving any considerable quantity. The right hon. Baronet said that probably 1,000,000 bales would be received from India this year. That receipt was stimulated solely by high prices in England; but what was required was a regular and constant supply from India, so that India might be placed upon the same footing as the United States of America. The foundation of American prosperity in the growth of cotton arose from the cheapness with which the cotton could be brought to market. The American planters had availed themselves of the advantages afforded by their rivers of bringing their cotton to a port of shipment at a very smaller cost. A few millions of dollars had been spent in removing the obstructions to the navigation of the Mississippi, and the result had been to make New Orleans the largest port of shipment in the world. We had evidence that the same results may be obtained by the adoption of the same means in India. Within the last few years the navigation of the Indus had been opened and improved; steam-boats had been introduced and were plying upon it, and Kurrachee now promised to become another New Orleans. The right hon. Gentleman said, the Government had decided upon opening the Godavary in the shortest possible period. He hoped this promise would be carried out in good faith. If it was the greatest advantages would result. A large part of the richest land in the centre of India—an extent of surface equal to four times that of Ireland—would be opened to trade and cultivation. In the words of Sir Charles Trevelyan, "the opening of this river would be equivalent to the creation of a new trade, to the extension of which no limits could be assigned." There was at present, not unnaturally, great excitement and alarm with respect to the supply of cotton; but if the civil war in America should cease to-morrow, the necessity would still be urgent to secure new sources of supply. It was neither politic nor just that we should rely on one source of supply which, in a great measure, was dependent on the labour of slaves while we had in our own dominions an extent of territory suitable for the cultivation of cotton greater than existed in any other part of the world.

COLONEL SYKES said, he had to observe, with reference to the discrepancies in the statements of the Indian revenue by Mr. Laing and the right hon. Gentleman, that if they could only trust to estimates and budgets, they might rest satisfied. But, unhappily, hope told a flattering tale in India as well as elsewhere, and wishes had been substituted for facts. The real explanation, however, was that the military retrenchments in one of the statements had been assumed to be made, whereas they were only prospective. They however, would soon be effected and to a very considerable extent. But the savings produced by the reduction of the Native force were more than absorbed by the increase of the European force. The reduction of the Native troops had been carried to an extent which would cause inconvenience, and he was afraid would prove dangerous to the public interests. They had now 19,000 Europeans in India beyond the proposed future establishment, in addition to which 3,000 artillerymen were to be sent out immediately from this country. Surely, out of that excess of 19,000 Europeans in India, 3,000 volunteers for the Artillery might have been obtained, so as to save the expense of sending out those 3,000 men. The debt of India was 57½ millions sterling in 1857. Now it amounted to 103 millions, but this was only two and a half years' revenue. In that respect India was better situated than England, whose debt was twelve and half years revenue, or any European country. He had, therefore, good hopes of a satisfactory financial condition in India, provided the proper sources of economy were duly attended to. The civil and political establishments of India, including the charge for contingencies, cost in 1856-7, £2,556,000, while in 1860-1 they cost £3,684,000. The judicial and police charges had risen from £2,812,409 to £4,004,500. Those figures exhibited a vast increase, for which there was no apparent necessity. In the charge for the police establishments of India considerable retrenchments might be effected. Any outlay on works of irrigation, canals, and roads was politic and highly reproductive. The Ganges canal was as magnificent a work as any in Europe; and a commercial company had taken advantage of it to establish a system of transit by boats in its channel, and on the 31st of January last the Company advertised from Cawnpore a dividend of 34 per cent on its capital in one year from the transit of boats on that canal. The value of that means of carriage during the late famine it was impossible to exaggerate. No doubt India would prosper if we ruled it in a manner calculated to insure the confidence, and to win the affections of its people. The ill-judged income-tax had yielded 50 per cent less than its estimated produce; and, its operation reaching down to persons having only £20 a year, and living from hand to mouth, it had led to frightful oppression in numerous instances. The myrmidons employed in its collection were reported, in some cases, to have forced their way into women's apartments, and to have stripped them of their earrings and other jewellery. He trusted that, in accordance with Mr. Laing's suggestion, this obnoxious impost would be restricted to incomes of above £50 per annum. Upon the whole, however, he congratulated the right hon. Gentleman upon the statement he had made, and he confessed he looked forward to a happier future for India.

MR. W. EWART said, that he, too, wished to congratulate the right hon. Baronet (Sir Charles Wood) on the general character of the statement he had laid before the Committee. At the same time he wished to call attention to the importance of encouraging the emigration into India of British settlers, upon whose capital and intelligence the fate of that empire must to a great extent depend. It was indispensable to any sound system of internal commerce in India that there should be a more satisfactory law of contract, visiting with proper penalties any breach of faith between the landlord and the ryot. In Bengal a great improvement was required in the police, and small debt courts, administering justice cheaply and expeditiously between debtor and creditor, ought to be established. The laws should be executed impartially towards Natives and Europeans; but the English settler who had not been fairly treated heretofore ought to be fairly treated. It was to him that they must look for the introduction of Western civilization into India. One of the great evils of the present system of conducting business was the making of advances

If the system of advances could be got rid of, and a good law of contract established, a great benefit would be conferred upon India; and if the extended cultivation of cotton was to take place, such a law would be more necessary even than it is at present. It would be wise, as suggested by the Committee on settlement in India, to sell waste lands in fee simple. Thus, cultivation by means of British capital, would confer lasting advantages upon India. The extended communication through Tibet with Central Asia would open a new outlet for our manufacturers, especially our woollen fabrics. He was disappointed that nothing had been said by his right hon. Friend on the cultivation of tea upon the southern slopes of the Himalayas. That cultivation was destined to become a source of immeasurable wealth to India. He was gratified to find that the right hon. Gentleman intended to recognize the legitimate position of the Native gentry of India. From long habit, from time-honoured associations, the people of India recognized and respected them, and their authority was an obvious means and instrument of governing the people. After hearing the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, he ventured to believe that the financial difficulties of India were not irremediable. Far from it. Better times were opening on them, disclosing a futurity hopeful alike to India and to England.

MR. ADAM observed that at last they had turned the corner in Indian finance, and were about to enter upon the region of surplus after being so long in the deserts of deficits. That hope, however, was damped by a recollection of how often they had been deceived by fallacious figures in relation to Indian finance. The same thing had happened now. Mr. Laing estimated a surplus, but the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State declared a deficiency. What was the Committee to believe? They had hitherto been working in the dark, but he trusted, under the new system about to be inaugurated, more reliable information might be obtained. He had read Mr. Laing's speech to the Council with very great pleasure, and had risen from the perusal of it with the impression that India had at length got a financier who would be able to understand her requirements. There were, however, many things in the speech with which he could not agree. In the first place he thought that in the attempt to diminish the Native force too rapidly he had incurred some danger. The last accounts stated that there was an uneasy feeling in the Punjab, arising from the number of soldiers who had been disbanded, or who were about to be disbanded. Another point upon which he differed from Mr. Laing was as to the Indian navy. It was quite right that the Indian navy should be put upon a different footing; but, although it might be a saving to India, it would be none to this country, which must keep up a naval force if the Indian navy was not employed. Mr. Laing had unconsciously borne testimony to the truth of what was urged by the late Lord Elphinstone and Sir Charles Trevelyan against the taxes proposed by Mr. Wilson. The three taxes proposed by that gentleman were now practically inoperative. The income tax only produced one-half the estimated amount. The Licence Tax Bill had not been read a third time, and the tobacco tax was never mentioned now. He did not object to a licence tax or an income tax which would reach the richer classes—those who most benefited by our rule, and he hoped that what Mr. Laing proposed would be carried out—a blending of the licence with the income tax in such a way as to satisfy Native ideas. One of the most important fixtures of the Budget was the granting to local Governments a voice in matters of legislation and taxation. The great curse of India was centralization, and he trusted that that evil would now be remedied. He agreed with the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaid) that they were now borrowing money at an unnecessarily high rate, for although they practically gave an Imperial guarantee they could not do so formally, and thus, for an idea, they were losing a large sum every year. Another point deserving consideration was the unfairness of charging the Indian depôts in this country to India, seeing that they constituted so much increase to the force in this country. The question of the land tax and its redemption had been treated incidentally in the course of the present discussion, and an hon. Gentleman had suggested that any person holding land in India should be allowed to redeem the land tax. He believed that, if that matter were worked judiciously, the Government possessed a mine of wealth in connection with it. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that in future years Indian business would be brought forward a little earlier in the Session, so that the House might have more time to consider it. He thanked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India for his able statement, and he had great hopes that they had at length got into calm weather as regards Indian finance.

MR. GREGSON remarked that the debt of India amounted to only about two and a half times the revenue of India, while that of England was equal to twelve years' purchase of our revenue. He could not, therefore, think it desirable to encourage India by an Imperial guarantee to raise money in this country. He admitted that the statement which had been made respecting the finances of India presented a favourable appearance; but, seeing that India was in perfect tranquillity, and that all the Native Princes were in amity with the Government, he believed that the expenditure might be still further reduced. He was glad to hear it distinctly stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for India that it was intended to go on with the works for improving the navigation of the Godavery, and he should offer no objection to the proposed loan, for he concurred with Mr. Laing in thinking that money could not be more advantageously employed than in improving the roads in India. He conceived that the Bengal planters had some reason to complain that the system of contracts had not been put on a proper footing, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would turn his attention to that subject, in order that harmony might be restored between the Natives and the planters. He also would express a hope that the duty on salt would be reduced as soon as the increased revenue derived from it would permit.

MR. BAZLEY said, he wished to thank the right hon. Gentleman on the part of the commercial community for the efforts that he was making in their behalf. At present a great commercial calamity was impending. There existed in this country at the present time a supply of cotton from the United States that might be sufficient for our immediate wants; but if the United States blockade were not broken, or some other source of supply were not obtained, next year would be one of calamity. His right hon. Friend had referred to a larger importation than usual that might be expected from India. Last year it was 600,000 bales; this year it was expected to be 1,000,000. But they must recollect that other nations would be competing with us for that additional supply from India. America at the present time was receiving supplies of cotton from Liverpool. The embarrassment which existed at the present moment with regard to the supply of cotton he hoped would be beneficial in developing the great resources of India. The consumption of cotton in this country was 2,500,000 bales last year. The imports from India this year it was expected would amount to 1,000,000. It was the duty of Government to do all they could to promote the cultivation of cotton in India. There was a general impression that the great desideratum was an improvement in the cleaning and preparation of cotton in India. But that was not so. It was a better quality of cotton that was required. The cotton from America had a fibre twice as long as that from India, and he did not hesitate to say that by proper modes of cultivation, and by growing cotton of a superior quality, the ryot might get eight times the reward for his labour and produce as he now obtains. His hon. Friend had stated that more cotton was wasted in India than was used in England. Nothing could be more erroneous. The cotton consumed in England was worth £30,000,000, and the same quantity of Indian cotton would be worth £12,000,000, and it was not likely the ryots would lose such an amount. It was another mistake to suppose that as much cotton was grown in India as in all the world beside. The truth was as much might be grown there as in the United States; but while the latter crop was worth £40,000,000, the ryots never obtained more than £15,000,000 for what they grew. He would urge upon the Government the propriety of encouraging the improvement of the crop in India, and of opening up the means of transport; and, if they did, they would not only promote the prosperity of India, but would relieve this country from dependence on a foreign source of supply, and take away our share of the guilt that was incurred by the encouragement we gave to slave-grown cotton.

MR. HADFIELD urged the propriety of giving power to trustees to take advantage of the opportunity which was presented by the proposals of the Secretary for India to invest the funds at their disposal at a better rate of interest than was to be obtained by an investment in Consols.

SIR CHARLES WOOD briefly replied. The hon. Member for Evesham (Sir Henry Willoughby) had alluded to the close connection there was between the railway and penditure and the general expenditure. It was impossible to keep the two entirely separate. The hon. Gentleman wished to know what the future charge would be. The utmost amount for the construction of railways in India would be £56,000,000. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Windsor (Mr. Vansittart) objected to a loan to make good the deficit in the payments on account of the railways. What were they to do? So long as the railways were not completed the Government were losers to the extent of the guaranteed interest.

MR. VANSITTART said, he did not object to the railway expenditure. What he had said was, that the Government ought to have submitted a more comprehensive plan with regard to the railways.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the cost of the railways would be £56,000,000. If the railway companies could not raise the money for the completion of the lines, the Government must. They must complete the railways that they had undertaken should be constructed. The Government had considered the question of taking possession of the railways; but they had come to the conclusion that, on the whole, it would not be advantageous to do so. They thought it better to advance money, thus putting themselves in the position of shareholders.

"That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

EASTER OFFERINGS.

PAPERS MOVED FOR.

MR. DILLWYN said, that in the absence of his hon. Friend (Mr. Barnes) he rose to ask the Home Secretary, Whether his attention has been drawn to the state in which the town of Accrington has been placed by the Vicar of Whalley seizing the household goods and other property of poor parishioners, and selling the same by auction, to enforce the payment of small sums of money claimed by him for Easter Offerings? Accrington contained a population of 17,000 persons, and its inhabitants were called upon to pay for religious services which were rendered, not to themselves, but to the people of Whalley and its neighbourhood. He had no doubt that the demand thus made by the Vicar of Whalley may have been legal; but it had been enforced in a manner little calculated to raise the Church in the eyes of the community, or to promote the harmony of the district. Though compulsory payment was contrary to the spirit with which Easter offerings were originally established, the goods of some of the poorest inhabitants of Accrington had been seized and sold by public auction, and these harsh proceedings on the part of the Vicar of Whalley had naturally led to great excitement, almost amounting to riot. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary would inquire into the circumstances, and, if necessary, bring forward a measure on the subject next Session. He called attention to two petitions which had been presented on this subject, and their prayer was so moderate and reasonable that he hoped the right hon. Secretary of State for the Home Department would take the matter into his serious consideration. He moved for any Correspondence that had taken place.

MR. HADFIELD seconded the Motion. He could not understand why those dues should be claimed by a clergyman who rendered no service whatever to the persons from whom he claimed them.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that in consequence of the notice which had been given on the subject by the hon. Member for Bolton (Mr. Barnes) he had caused a letter to be written to the clerk of the magistrates at Accrington, and he had received from him a reply explanatory of what had taken place. He should be very happy to submit it for the information of the hon. Gentleman and the House. The facts appeared to lie in a very narrow compass. There was some dispute with regard to the legality of Easter offerings in the parish of Accrington. He had no information whatever in regard to the legality of those claims; but if there was any legal defence to those against whom distress warrants had issued, they would, no doubt, raise the question by an action of trespass. It was essentially a question of civil right, and it would not be competent to the Executive Government to interfere in any way in the matter. At least, he knew of no power that resided in the Executive Government to decide questions of this nature. He was informed that distress warrants had been issued against thirteen individuals; their goods had been seized and sold by auction, but bought up by two persons representing some association for the protection of those whose goods were seized under these distress warrants. Considerable excitement prevailed at the time of the auction, but there was no breach of the peace, a party of police who had been present being quite sufficient to maintain public order. That was the account which he had received from the clerk to the magistrates. With regard to the general question of Easter offerings, his impression certainly was that they were a voluntary gift, and not recoverable by law; but he presumed there was some special custom or practice in that part of the country which enabled the vicar or incumbent to assert a legal claim. He repeated he had no information as to the legal nature of those claims, and he could see no ground for the interference of the Secretary of State.

POLAND.—QUESTION.

MR. HENNESSY said, he wished to ask a question of which he had given notice. He wished to know, Whether a despatch existed in which the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston), when Foreign Secretary, had stated, with reference to Poland, that the rights of the Czar were incontestible; and, if so, whether there would be any objection to its production?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I have looked at these despatches since notice was given. There is no such expression in any despatch as that the rights of the Czar were incontestible. There will be no objection to the production of the despatches. There is a note from Count Sebastiani to Prince Talleyrand, communicated to me at the Foreign Office, and a despatch from me to the British Ambassador at Paris in answer to it.

ECCLESIASTICAL REGISTRY IN ENGLAND AND WALES.

RETURNS MOVED FOR.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR said, that he rose to move for the Return of which he had given notice relating to Ecclesiastical Registries. It divided itself into three parts—first, as to the state of the registries, many of which in 1832 were reported to be in a very dangerous condition; secondly, as to their subordinate officers—their names and qualifications; and thirdly, as to the total number of fees received by all ecclesiastical officers. The registrars were bound to have their tables of fees hung up in the Courts, and, therefore, there ought to be no difficulty in producing that part of the Return. Many of these Gentlemen were in the enjoyment of sinecures of £1,200 a year, and there was something astounding in the insolence of their refusal to give a return of their fees without being paid out of the public purse for their trouble in doing so. The information was necessary to enable the House to understand the abuses in the ecclesiastical system; and, by refusing to furnish it, the Home Secretary appeared to be shielding improper practices.

The hon. Member concluded by moving for the Returns respecting—

“Every Ecclesiastical Registry in England and Wales, stating in what town situated; whether in a private house or a public building, and whether such house or building is fireproof; if not fireproof, whether the books and documents are kept in fireproof safes; if not, how kept.

“Of the names, places of residence, dates of appointment, by whom appointed, professions, whether if clergymen, and what appointments they hold; and if any other occupation what employment of the following officers:—Registrar; Deputy Registrar; Apparitor; Sealkeeper; Chancellor or Vicar General, Commissary, or Official; Surrogates; Proctors; Advocates resident in the diocese; Copy of Table of Fees; and, of the total number of Fees received respectively.”

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word “That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “That there be laid before this House,” &c.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, the hon. Gentleman had used a singular argument for calling for these Returns, because he seemed to be already in possession of a large part of the information for which he asked. The hon. Member reproached him for wishing to suppress valuable information; but the truth was that the information was not already in existence, or the hon. Gentleman would be most welcome to it. To obtain it it would be necessary to call upon the officers of the Ecclesiastical Courts under the Bishops to go through a great deal of labour in drawing up what would amount to an exceedingly elaborate report. An effort was made by the Home Office last year to procure this mass of information, when remonstrances were sent in as to the impossibility of obtaining it unless the persons employed for the purpose were remunerated for their trouble.

Sir George Lewis

Not having any funds at his command for such an object the matter had rested in abeyance up to this time. The ordinary course when so voluminous a mass of information was sought was for the hon. Gentleman who desired to have it to move for a Committee, or even propose an Address to the Crown for a Commission. Again, if the House chose to make an order upon each officer of these Courts requiring him to furnish the information, no doubt that order would be compulsory; whereas the Crown could only call upon him to do it upon his allegiance, and could not enforce the performance of the duty. The Government, therefore, could not agree to the hon. Gentleman's Motion.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR asked whether the right hon. Baronet would give the permission of the Government to the appointment of a Committee next year?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, he could only reply that if the hon. Gentleman would make a Motion for a Committee next year no doubt the House would give it their consideration.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he thought it rather unfair to put such a question to the right hon. Baronet in his present dubious state, he now being half at peace and half at war. His successor at the Home Office would be the proper person to give a pledge on the subject. At the same time, the right hon. Gentleman should remember that the Returns he objected to had been given in the case of Ireland; and why, therefore, were they not to have justice to England?

MR. DISRAELI said, he must protest against its being supposed that it was in the power of any Government to grant a Committee. All that the Government could do was to listen to any Motion that was made on the subject. It was the privilege of the House itself to appoint Committees, although hon. Gentlemen were too much in the habit of allowing the Government to assume that function.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH suggested that instead of moving an Address to the Crown, the hon. Member (Mr. Seymour) should move for an order of the House for the production of these Returns.

MR. HENLEY said, that having sat on the Committee which investigated the subject eleven years before, he could promise the hon. Member who made the Motion a great deal of valuable information, not to any amusement, if he would take the advice of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary or Secretary at War—one could hardly tell which—and move the revival of that Committee.

Question, "That the words proposed to left out stand part of the Question," put, and agreed to.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

MR. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

Original Question again proposed,

MR. W. WILLIAMS and MR. BERNAL OSBORNE rose together. Yielding to the loud calls for Mr. BERNAL OSBORNE, the hon. Member for Lambeth gave way.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, as he was cut short in a quotation at ten minutes to four o'clock, it was rather unkind in the hon. Member for Lambeth to wish to prevent his resuming it in the evening. But, on the other hand, he was rather glad he had had time, since the adjournment of the House, to examine the Vote, as he was the better able to propose what he thought would be right to deduct from the credit of £75,000. He would put it at £2,000, a sum which would give the Committee an opportunity of discussing some of the items, and allow him to make a few observations upon them. The first item was the charge of £273 for the expenses of the various colonial Bishops in visiting their dioceses. He would not, however, insist on being too particular as to that Vote. There was another to which he would direct the attention of the House, chiefly for the sake of asking for some information on it. It was the charge for fees paid on conferring titles of dignity. A sum of £512 was asked for passing under the Great Seal a patent granting to Lord Brougham a barony with one remainder. He was the last person in the House who would ever say anything to detract from the justly-established merits of Lord Brougham; he thought he had well earned the gratitude of the country. But when he saw an item of the sort for the first time brought under consideration, he felt bound to call attention to it, and he was told that this was a peculiar patent, as it proposed for the first time in the history of granting peerages to skip one generation. The successor to this title was a Whig of acknowledged ability, who, like other Whigs, had retired on an acknowledged pension of £2,500 a year after a few years' services. He would not object to the Vote if it was admitted that great men's patents of nobility were to be paid for by the public; but, if not, why was an exception made in favour of Lord Brougham? Some explanation ought to be given before that item was voted. There was another charge of £188 for passing under the Great Seal the letters patent appointing the Duke of Argyll Postmaster General. A good explanation might, perhaps, be given of that item; but the House would be curious to hear what were the circumstances under which the Postmaster General's patent was to be paid for out of the public taxes? He came next to the charge of £1,415 for erecting galleries in Hyde Park for the Volunteer Review of last year. He believed more ill-will than pleasure was created by these galleries. He was told by an hon. Gentleman next him that he could not obtain a ticket for the gallery, nor could any of his friends; and if it had come to this, that galleries were to be erected on public occasions for the friends of whoever might happen to be in power, he believed it would be a very strong argument in favour of a Reform of Parliament. To that Vote he objected altogether, and would certainly divide the House against it. He now came to the last item of £944 for the Commission appointed for promoting and encouraging the Fine Arts in connection with the rebuilding of the Houses of Parliament. The appointment of that Commission was a most unfortunate thing for the Fine Arts, as well as for the pockets of the people of the country. It was appointed in 1841, when the new Houses of Parliament were first begun, under the pretence of taking advantage of the opportunity to encourage the Fine Arts. The Commission originally consisted of twenty-one members, all gentlemen highly distinguished in society. No doubt they felt themselves very well employed while spending the public money in promoting the Fine Arts—with what effect let the House judge. Since the appointment of the Commission eleven of the members had died, and it at present consisted of fifteen; and—what the House should always avoid—they were gentlemen of great taste. Whenever they appointed a Commission of gentlemen of great taste they might depend the public purse was in great danger. In 1846 the Commission proposed that £4,000 a year should be spent in decorating the Houses of Parliament, and since that year £60,000 had actually been expended for that purpose. Was any hon. Member of the House not connected with the Fine Arts satisfied with the way in which that sum had been laid out? He would not make his quotation again, but if the Houses were ruins, and the New Zealander Lord Macaulay had depicted were sitting on a fragment of Westminster Bridge, if any of the frescoes remained, would he not think that they had been painted by Pagans? Not that there was any chance of their being in existence, for at the present moment they were falling from the walls. Cordelia was defaced, and Lear was almost invisible. Had not the £60,000 been grossly and wantonly wasted by this Commission? He had spoken of the frescoes only; but the Commission had been in the habit of laying out money for purposes for which it was not originally voted. Mr. Maclise, the celebrated artist, contracted to paint certain pictures, to be completed in ten years, for which he was to receive £10,000. In 1855 the House granted £1,500, on account, to Mr. Maclise. But Mr. Maclise had since repudiated his contract. What did the Commission do? The Kensington Museum was convenient; there were rising artists to be encouraged, and this £15,000 was employed for that purpose. Hon. Gentlemen had been in what was called the Painted Chamber. There was there a series of what had been called "splendid sign paintings." Twenty-eight Tudor portraits, furnished by the Kensington Museum at £70 a head, so that the money voted for Mr. Maclise was devoted to the encouragement of unknown artists, and twenty-eight, not paintings, but inferior copies of the most approved Wardour Street School, were purchased in order to encourage the rising artists of the Kensington Museum. It was a little too much for the Fine Arts Commission to take upon themselves in that way, and it was high time for Parliament to step in and put a veto upon such proceedings. Then, again, as to the frescoes, he could only say, although not a man having a taste in that House, that he thought they were disgusting exhibitions. They cost £600 each, and the only good the country would get for the money was that in five years they were all likely to fall off the walls. Who were the designers? Who had commanded them? That House had nothing to do with them, but the fifteen hon. Gentlemen had who met to spend the public money, though not to the public satisfaction. He was fortified in his opinion by the right hon. Gentleman whose vote perhaps he could not claim, but whose silence at least he should expect—the present Chancellor of the Exchequer. That right hon. Gentleman could defend and adorn any subject—he could even prop up Her Majesty's Ministers. He said, on August 3, 1860, "He did not hesitate to admit that the ornamentation of the Houses of Parliament had been in many instances enormously and ludicrously overdone." That was the Chancellor of the Exchequer's opinion of the Fine Arts Commission. The right hon. Gentleman was not only a man of real taste, but he had a sincere desire to save the public money, and it could only be by the pressure of gentlemen in his neighbourhood who had enormous taste that he could be brought to consent to so prodigal a waste of money. But there was not only a question of taste but one of historical judgment in respect of the statues about to be put up. He was sorry to make any charge—he made no inuendo—but he did not think the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works had acted with candour in the matter. Upon the same occasion when the right Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer denounced the Fine Arts Commission in August, 1860, there was a great debate as to the sum to be appropriated for the erection of statues. Originally in 1845 the Fine Arts Commission, with that prodigality that distinguished all gentlemen who were putting their hands into other people's pockets, and spending other people's money, proposed to have statues of British monarchs from Egbert to William IV. The House had then one of their fits of economy, and rather objected to have a series of statues from the renowned Egbert down to the equally renowned William IV. and it was agreed that there should be only four statues, one at each corner of the Royal Gallery. The right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works—if he would only save them from such works as these, had hardly acted with candour, his love of monarchy exceeded his admiration of that House. On August 3, 1860, there was an item of £1,600 for two British Sovereigns, and great contention arose as to who those Sovereigns should be. The hon. Member for Brighton was all for Oliver Cromwell.

[Mr. WHITE: Hear, hear!] The hon. Member for Dundalk would not hear of Oliver Cromwell. [Sir GEORGE BOWYER: Hear, hear!] The tide of opinion ran strongly, and the House, not feeling that confidence in the First Commissioner which they ought to have felt, the right hon. Gentleman withdrew the Vote, and in doing so said—"He did it with a view of considering whether some selection of Sovereigns might not be made that would be generally acceptable to the House." Of course it was expected then that they were going to have four respectable Sovereigns, at £800 each, and, therefore, he (Mr. Osborne) made no objection, relying upon the First Commissioner; but it now appeared, from the 12th Report of the Fine Arts Commission, signed by one Royal personage, one literary Peer, and one late Radical M.P.—the Prince Consort, Lord Stanhope, and Lord Llanover—one of the recent creations. They now recommended that Mr. William Theed be invited to undertake two of the marble statues to be placed in the Royal Gallery—those of William IV. and George IV. They were to be seven feet high upon proportionate pedestals. Mr. Thorneycroft was to be invited to undertake other two statues—those of Charles I. and James I. The money had been voted, and now the Committee found themselves in the same position as they were with respect to the Military College which they had been discussing that morning. They voted the money for the College, and the College would be erected; they had voted money for four statues, and these four statues of four distinguished monarchs would be undertaken at the expense of the nation. No doubt they would hear from the Treasury bench some talk about the necessity of promoting the fine arts; but in answer to that, by anticipation, he would refer to a previous Report of the Fine Arts Commission, in which it was stated that since the institution of the Commission the encouragement of art had been so much increased in this country by private orders that it was no longer an object to apply the public money for its promotion. He repeated that it was high time that Commission of gentlemen for spending other people's money should cease. He thought he had shown fair reason why that particular Vote of £994 should be refused, and if hon. Gentlemen could not agree with him in voting that £2,000 be deducted from the Estimate, he hoped they would join him in aiming a blow—for he avowed his object was to put an end to the Fine Arts Commission—in aiming a blow at this “profligate expenditure,” to use a celebrated phrase of the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He should move that the Vote be reduced by £2,000.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. COWPER said, that as he had been personally alluded to by the hon. Gentleman, he supposed he ought to say a few words in defence of his candour, even if he did not enter into the general question of his vote. His hon. Friend had been kind enough to remember what he (Mr. Cowper) had said during the last year, but he had not remembered what he had said in reference to these statues in the present year, when the Vote was passed. The estimate as framed in the previous Session appeared to pledge the House to a series of forty-two statues, from Egbert down to the last Sovereign who preceded her present Majesty. There was no such intention on the part of the Government, but as the form of the Estimate did appear to pledge the House he withdrew the Vote, stating that consideration would be given to the question whether a selection could not be made that would be acceptable to the House. When it became his duty to explain the Vote of this year, he gave his explanation in such a manner as, he thought, ought to have guarded him against any charge of want of candour. He had not trusted to his own memory, but referred to what he was reported to have said on that occasion. He was reported in The Times to have said that the Fine Arts Committee had been engaged for a long series of years in endeavouring to promote art in that building, and that they proposed that four out of the twelve statues in chronological series were to be placed one at each side of the principle doors of the Royal Gallery. It often happened to them in that House that they said too much, but he ought, perhaps, to regret that on the occasion to which he referred he had not said a little more. He ought, perhaps, to have explained at some what greater length the meaning which he had endeavoured to sketch out in those few words; but he had taken it for granted that hon. Members interested in the subject had read the Report of the Commission on the Fine Arts, which had been on the table for some time before the Vote came on. In the report of the Sub-committee, which was referred to in that of the whole Commission, it was proposed to divide the chronological series into three portions:—first, twelve statues in the Royal Gallery; and then a certain number in two others respectively. In St. Stephen's-hall were statues of men who had been distinguished in the House of Commons; and the Fine Arts Commission suggested that in the Royal Gallery and other parts of the approach through which the Sovereign passed there should be statues to illustrate the Monarchy and the history of the country. He thought that that view was not an unreasonable one on the part of the Commission. The Fine Arts Commission had been in existence for nearly twenty years, and it had produced twelve Reports. The Commission had been proceeded by a Committee of that House which sat in 1841, and which recommended that an encouragement should be afforded to the fine arts which could not be given by private persons. Private persons had not houses sufficiently large to have large pictures, and without large dimensions they could not have frescoes, or any historical art on a grand scale. It was thought that advantage should be taken of that building to encourage high art. He did not presume to put forward his opinion against that of any other Gentleman who thought himself more competent to form an opinion on the subject, but it was the opinion of very good judges that the proceedings of the Fine Arts Commission had done a great deal to encourage an important school of painting. [MR. B. OSBORNE: Oh, oh.] When the hon. Gentleman found fault with the decay of the frescoes—[MR. B. OSBORNE: I did find fault with that.]—he thought that his complaint was not well founded. With two exceptions the frescoes were in good preservation; and he hoped they would last 300 years. The hon. Gentleman might go over the good frescoes and rub them with a towel without doing them injury, or he might endeavour to get rid of them by scrubbing them with water and a brush. [AN HON. MEMBER: And soap.] No; without soap; but he would find that the operation would have no effect in removing them. It was in that building that the practice of painting frescoes was commenced in England. They had been painted in other buildings since; and there was a very fine painting of that kind in the hall of Lincoln's-inn. With regard to sculpture, there was a demand for statues in the streets of our great towns, and it was important to set forth good examples in the Houses of Parliament. Excellence of sculpture was more easily attained and developed in the representation of historical and Royal personages, than in the imitation of the costumes of the present day. The Royal Commission was appointed for the purpose of giving encouragement and support to the fine arts, and he believed it would be conceded that the internal decorations of the Houses of Parliament were a credit to the country and elicited the admiration of foreigners. [Mr. B. OSBORNE: Oh, oh!] His opinion was that, on the whole, they had reason to be proud of the manner in which the money had been expended in those decorations. He admitted that in the lavish carving of the exterior money had been wasted. The names of the members of the Fine Arts Commission were a guarantee for confidence in that body. These were men who might be well trusted with the selection of a few statues and paintings. For a long period of years a sum of £4,000 had been annually placed at the disposal of the Committee of Fine Arts, but that year, for the first time, a much less amount was demanded, and that sum was to be spent entirely on the four statues, no new pictures being contemplated at present. He repeated his belief that no one was to blame for the manner in which the money was expended. At the time the Vote passed, the Committee of Fine Arts had not come to any decision regarding the statues to be selected. They had received a Report from the sub-committee, but had arrived at no conclusion upon it; and it was after the Vote of the House that their decision was given.

MR. GREGORY observed, that he was bound to say that it would have been better had the right hon. Gentleman been either a great deal more laconic or a great deal more communicative. On three different occasions the right hon. Gentleman had addressed the House on the subject of those statues. Last year, when the question was fully discussed, there unquestionably prevailed in the House a feeling of opposition to the proposed series of thirty-eight statues of British monarchs in chronological order; the objection being taken wholly from an artistic point of view, and without the smallest disrespect to any of the former monarchs of England. The hon. Member for the Tower Hamlets on that occasion objected strongly to imaginative statues of Saxon monarchs, and laid great emphasis on the fact that one of them was an extremely immoral character. The result was that the right hon. Gentleman withdrew the Motion, stating in the most clear and unmistakable terms, as preserved in Hansard, that he did so "with a view of considering whether some selection of sovereigns could not be made which would be favourably accepted by the House of Commons." Now, he asked, what chance was the right hon. Gentleman giving the House of Commons of favourably accepting any selection of monarchs? No one had been more amused than himself at the good-humoured jest of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, a few nights before, who asked him whether he could wonder at the difficulty experienced in selecting sovereigns, when he himself had such trouble in finding Members to serve on the Galway Committee. But at that very time the selection had been made. The House was allowed to believe by the First Commissioner of Works at the time the Vote of £3,200 was agreed to, that the question of what four monarchs would be selected was still open to consideration. Certainly the impression left upon his mind was not that the monarchs chosen would be George IV., William IV., James I., and Charles I.; but that the choice lay between the Edwards and the Henries, or possibly Alfred the Great. Not to use an offensive word, he believed that in the proceedings of the Government on the question there had been a want of candour amounting to a suppressio veri. The Government knew perfectly well that four statues had been selected which would be unpalatable to the House of Commons, and that if a plain issue had been raised with regard to them their execution never would have been sanctioned. They shifted and they shuffled; and having last year withdrawn their scheme, with a view of considering whether some selection acceptable to the House of Commons could not be made, they now came forward and declared their intention of persisting in the chronological series of statues which was repudiated by the House of Commons last year. It would have been much better and more candid had the right hon. Gentleman, on their part, come forward to declare that a pressure which they could not resist had been brought to bear upon them; that they had changed their original intention, and called upon the House of Commons to support them in their altered views. There was some difficulty in discovering whether those marble statues were ordered with the object of doing honour to Royalty in England or of encouraging English art. If with the former intention, he certainly did not think honour had been done in the right place. If with the latter he believed the proposed method to be the very worst way of encouraging art which could be adopted. The old maxim of fiat experimentum in corpore vili was to be applied to the House of Commons, and artists were to try their 'prentice hands on statues to adorn its approaches.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he could not help feeling that his hon. Friend who had just sat down had been unjust towards his right hon. Friend the First Commissioner of Works in charging him with a want of candour. Several of those occupying seats upon the Ministerial bench had a distinct recollection of the facts as they really happened. Last year, when the Vote was proposed, the feeling of the Committee was very adverse to it. His right hon. Friend withdrew the Vote for the time, and undertook that the question should be thoroughly reconsidered. He took measures to secure that reconsideration, and, as they now knew from the Report of the Commission on Fine Arts, great difficulty was experienced in making any proposal upon the principle of selection. His right hon. Friend made up his mind that it was not expedient to proceed upon that principle, and came down to the House with a proposition founded upon that opinion, at which he had deliberately arrived in conjunction with his colleagues upon the Commission. It was not, however, only his hon. Friend who had changed his opinion. The opinion of the House had also undergone some change, because the Report of the Commissioners of Fine Arts was on the table; there was no suppression or concealment about the matter, and the proposal made was a proposal to take money for the erection of four statues out of a chronological series. A very animated speech made by the noble Lord the Member for Leicestershire turned upon the impossibility of acting upon the principle of selection, and although the hon. Member for Galway had not changed his opinion, but stood to his task, he was in the recollection of the Committee that the discussion which took place made the object of the Vote as clear as possible, and it was passed without any

call for a division. His hon. Friend the Member for Liskard had quoted an opinion of his, which was, perhaps, expressed in too strong terms—[Mr. BRYAL OSBORNE: Not at all.]—but, as far as he recollected, that opinion referred only to what appeared to him to be an enormous waste of pains, of money, and of ornament upon the exterior of the Houses, because, with regard to the interior decorations, although they might go to excess in quantity, yet he was bound to say that he did not think that anything more beautiful was to be found in any existing fabric. He entirely agreed with his hon. Friend that the sum charged for the expenses of the Fine Arts Commission ought to be submitted to the House by way of estimate, and undertook that in a future year that course should be adopted. As to Lord Brougham's patent, the Committee was, perhaps, not in full possession of the state of the case. His noble Friend, in advising Her Majesty upon the subject, thought fit to treat this as a patent granted for special services, and it was set forth in the patent that it was granted for Lord Brougham's "eminent public services, more especially in the diffusion of knowledge, the spread of education, and the abolition of slavery and the slave trade." No doubt it was the general rule, that when honours were conferred by the Crown the charges attendant upon the conferring of those honours should be borne by the parties who received them. That was a wise regulation if only for the reason that it tended to limit the range of solicitation for such honours. But there were precedents for the course pursued in the case. In 1846 Sir Henry Hardinge was made Viscount Hardinge, not for military but civil services, and in 1852 Lord Fitzroy Somerset was made Lord Raglan also for civil services, and in both these cases the charges were defrayed by the public. Again, in 1859, Lord Canning received promotion in the peerage for civil services, and Lord Elphinstone in the same year was made an English peer, and in these cases also the charges were borne by the public. But, with respect to the charges, it should be known that a considerable portion of them went back into the Exchequer. The charges on Lord Brougham's patent were, he believed, a little over £512, and of that £440 went back again into the Exchequer, leaving £147 to be paid by the public. In short, in various cases where peerages had been conferred in consideration of civil services, the practice obtained of defraying the expense out of the public purse.

SIR GEORGE BOWYER said, that the principle upon which the Fine Arts Commission was founded, that they could by spending the public money promote the fine arts or create great artists was entirely fallacious. That it was so was proved by the fact that although portrait painting was the branch of art which received most encouragement in England, we had now no portrait painter equal to Sir Joshua Reynolds or Sir Thomas Lawrence, and by the quality of the frescoes which had been painted on the walls of that building. The amount of money which had been paid for them was greater than that received by Michael Angelo or Raffaele, and yet look what things they were. It was said that they were coming off the walls, and he thought it would be a good thing if they did. With regard to some of them a basin of whitewash and a brush might be very beneficially employed. The selection of subjects for the paintings was singularly injudicious. One of the frescoes, entitled the "Funeral of Charles I.," represented a brutal insult offered by a Round-head soldier to the remains of that Sovereign. It was extremely offensive to his feelings as a Royalist and cavalier, and could not be agreeable even to a Republican. Again, there was a piece of sculpture in the room behind the throne in the House of Lords, representing the murder of David Rizzio. He was at a loss to conceive on what principle such a subject could have been selected. It was surely most inappropriate for commemoration. Then, as to the artistic part of the question, it was impossible to gather from the paintings in the House of Lords the subjects there portrayed; they were perfectly unintelligible. For instance, there was one which was said to represent the "Baptism of King Ethelred," in which a man was to be seen kneeling without any clothes on his body, and with a crown on his head. To all appearance he seemed prepared for a whipping rather than a baptism. The King could not have stripped for the purpose of immersion, for the font was also shown in the picture, and was so small that he could no more get into it than into a tea cup. Before they went on spending money on such paintings they ought to know more about them. He would recommend the Government to put a stop to an expenditure which produced results discreditable to the country, for they gave foreigners a very low idea of the standard of art in England. He hoped the noble Lord at the head of the Government would look to the matter. He placed great reliance on the noble Lord in matters of taste, and was sorry he was not present during the recent debate on the style of the Foreign Office, to show that there was at least one Italian question on which he agreed with the noble Lord.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH said, that a reference to Hansard would show that the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works had distinctly stated that the original intention of having a chronological series of Sovereigns had been abandoned, and that it was intended to have only four statues in the Royal Gallery. In his opinion there was no difficulty in making a selection of Sovereigns to be represented. If the choice lay with him he would name Alfred, Edward I., the greatest of the Plantagenets and the English justinian, Elizabeth, the greatest of the Tudors, and then, coming to the beginning of our constitutional history, William III. He pointed out that the sub-Committee of the Fine Arts Commission had not reconsidered the subject since the decision of the House last year, as their Report was dated June, 1860, while the Vote did not take place till August. He agreed with his hon. Friend as to the Brougham patent, which was a most unusual proceeding. It was a compliment not to Lord Brougham but to William Brougham. That gentleman was appointed a Master in Chancery solely on his brother's account, and when objection was raised on the ground that the office was to have been abolished, people were led to believe that he would not claim his pension. As to the galleries in Hyde Park at the Volunteer Review last year he objected altogether to the presence of either House of Parliament in its collective capacity at such spectacles.

MR. COLLINS said, that the next heir of Lord Brougham was a nephew, then in Australia. There had never been an instance of a patent in remainder where the next heir had been passed over.

MR. DANBY SEYMOUR asked whether the Government had abandoned their idea of raising statues of all the Sovereigns of England, and whether they had abandoned the chronological series?

MR. COWPER said, the House and the Government had been accustomed to leave the selection of statues to the Commissioners of Fine Arts. Last year it was stated to be the intention of the Commissioners to erect the statues of twelve Sovereigns immediately preceding her present Majesty. The four statues voted this year were not a selection of the Commissioners out of the twelve, but were an instalment of the twelve; and the instalment consisted of James I. and Charles I., and William IV. and George IV.

MR. GREGORY asked when had the House received an intimation of the change in the sentiments of the Government from the determination last year that there should be four statues, one in each corner of the Royal Gallery?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it was clear that if the speech to which reference had been made had been uttered by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, he could only have been expressing his individual opinion; and he could have had no communication with his colleagues on the Fine Art Commission.

MR. COWPER said, there had been an estimate last year for a chronological series of forty-two Sovereigns, but it had been afterwards resolved, in deference to what was believed to be the opinion of the House, that an estimate for four only should be asked for, and nothing had been said which would convey that four would be the entire number. He had done nothing to mislead the House. Last year he contemplated a selection; this year he did not; and he had a right to change his mind as he had done after deliberation, and after consultation with the Fine Art Commissioners.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished for some explanation of an item in the Vote of £7,000 to be paid to Pepple King of Bonny.

MR. PEEL said, that a person named "Pepple, ex-King of Bonny," set up a claim, arising out of certain proceedings of the British Government in regard to the slave trade. It appeared that the King was deposed by his subjects, but was taken under the protection of the British Consul, to whom the King's subjects were to pay a certain annual sum. The Consul, it seemed, sent the King to the Island of Ascension to keep him out of the way. There he remained for some years, and then came to this country, when he made large claims against the British Government. The matter was referred to arbitration, when "Pepple" set up a claim of £200,000.

Mr. Cowper

The Government then put a stop to the arbitration, but referred the matter to the Judge Advocate and the Attorney General, who recommended that £7,673 should be given to him as compensation for the annuity of which he had been deprived.

MR. WYLD inquired what progress had been made in the labours of the British and French Newfoundland Fishery Commission?

MR. PEEL thought that a Gentleman representing Newfoundland had been on the Commission, which, he believed, was now closed.

MR. DILLWYN said, he noticed with surprise a sum put down in connection with Her Majesty's licence to the Convocation of the clergy of the province of Canterbury to alter the 29th Canon, relating to godfathers and godmothers. He wanted to know whether Convocation could alter a canon without the sanction of Parliament?

SIR GEORGE LEWIS said, that Convocation had deliberated on the subject, but no decision had been come to, and as the Convocation had no funds it was thought proper that this expense, having reference to a matter of a public nature, should be paid out of the Civil Contingencies. Some canons, made by Convocation with consent of Parliament, could only be altered with the consent of Parliament; but others, made by Convocation with consent of the Crown, could be altered by the same authority as made them.

LORD HENRY LENNOX said, he wished to know upon what question the hon. Member (Mr. Bernal Osborne) intended to go to a division?

THE CHAIRMAN said, the Amendment was that the Vote be reduced by £2,000.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE said, he would propose his Amendment in another form. He should take the opinion of the Committee on the item of the expenses of Lord Brougham's patent, because he thought it was a mischievous principle to lay down that a Minister should himself make such a charge on the public. If he had come to the House first, and asked for their sanction, he (Mr. Bernal Osborne) would not have offered one word of objection. He also proposed to take the opinion of the Committee on the item for the Fine Arts Commission, especially after the explanation that had been given about the four Sovereigns, to which number he regretted that Pepple, King of Bonny, had not been added. He should move the reduction of the Vote by the latter item first, his object being to get rid of the Fine Arts Commission.

Motion and made, Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £24,050, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge of Civil Contingencies, to the 31st day of March, 1862."

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the item which his hon. and gallant Friend wished to have disallowed in the case of Lord Brougham's patent had already been expended, and consequently no reduction of the sum which the House was asked to vote for the Civil Contingencies for the next year would have any effect upon the amount expended under that head last year. That being so, and the item for the Fine Arts Commission appearing, as had been already stated by his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, in the shape of an Estimate, the proposed Amendment had, he contended, no application to the object sought to be attained.

MR. COLLINS suggested that the hon. and gallant Member for Liskeard should lump together the two items to which he was opposed, and take a division upon both at the same time.

MR. BERNAL OSBORNE expressed his readiness to withdraw his Amendment if the hon. Member would make a Motion in accordance with his own suggestion.

MR. AYRTON observed that it was not necessary the Amendment should be withdrawn in order that an hon. Member might move a larger reduction of the Vote. If such a Motion were made, it would be competent for the Chairman to put it at once.

THE CHAIRMAN said, the remark of the hon. Member would be correct if the question with reference to the smaller amount had not been actually put.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. COLLINS said, he would then move that the Vote be reduced by two items—namely, £944 4s. 8d. for the expenses of the Fine Arts Commission, and £512 16s. for Lord Brougham's patent, being in the whole £1,456.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON then took occasion to say that Lord Brougham had expressed a strong desire—a desire natural and honourable to him, that the title which had been conferred upon him as the result of his professional career should be continued after his death. Having taken into account the long-continued services of the noble Lord, he had felt no hesitation in advising Her Majesty to comply with the request, while the wish that the title should descend to his surviving brother seemed to be also a question which ought to be determined by the feelings of the person who made the application. Then arose the question of the fees to be paid, and he could not help being of opinion that when it was known that the new patent gave Lord Brougham no additional rank, and merely created an alteration of the remainder, the noble Lord ought not to be called upon to incur the necessary expenses for the purpose. Lord Brougham had, by the decree of Providence, no immediate descendant of his own, and the ground on which his application in favour of his brother had been acceded to was that he himself had in the course of a long life rendered, quite independently of political considerations, great and eminent services to his country, and that by assisting in the promotion of knowledge, by greatly contributing to the diffusion of education, and by the zealous and able manner in which he had advocated the freedom of the slave and the abolition of the slave trade, he had rendered conspicuous services not only to his country, but, it might be said, to the human race itself. That being so, it had appeared to him, and to his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the expenses of the patent in question should be defrayed by the public, and he could scarcely bring himself to think that the House of Commons, when it bore in mind the eminent career of Lord Brougham, the high position which he occupied, not simply in the estimation of his own fellow-countrymen, but in the eyes of Europe—in short, the world wide reputation which he enjoyed, would allow any remnant of party feeling to interfere with the giving its sanction to a Vote the rejection of which could not be otherwise than painful to the noble Lord whose name was connected with it.

COLONEL DICKSON said, he was astonished the noble Lord should insinuate that there was any objection to granting the sum in question on party grounds. He as well as the noble Lord was alive to the eminent services of Lord Brougham, but he could not, therefore, see why he should not oppose the grant of money for the making out of a patent of peerage for a gentleman who, through no merit of his own, was appointed to succeed to the noble

the selection of statues to the Commissioners of Fine Arts. Last year it was stated to be the intention of the Commissioners to erect the statues of twelve Sovereigns immediately preceding her present Majesty. The four statues voted this year were not a selection of the Commissioners out of the twelve, but were an instalment of the twelve; and the instalment consisted of James I. and Charles I., and William IV. and George IV.

MR. GREGORY asked when had the House received an intimation of the change in the sentiments of the Government from the determination last year that there should be four statues, one in each corner of the Royal Gallery?

LORD JOHN MANNERS said, it was clear that if the speech to which reference had been made had been uttered by the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works, he could only have been expressing his individual opinion; and he could have had no communication with his colleagues on the Fine Art Commission.

MR. COWPER said, there had been an estimate last year for a chronological series of forty-two Sovereigns, but it had been afterwards resolved, in deference to what was believed to be the opinion of the House, that an estimate for four only should be asked for, and nothing had been said which would convey that four would be the entire number. He had done nothing to mislead the House. Last year he contemplated a selection; this year he did not; and he had a right to change his mind as he had done after deliberation, and after consultation with the Fine Art Commissioners.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he wished for some explanation of an item in the Vote of £7,000 to be paid to Pepple King of Bonny.

MR. PEEL said, that a person named "Pepple, ex-King of Bonny," set up a claim, arising out of certain proceedings of the British Government in regard to the slave trade. It appeared that the King was deposed by his subjects, but was taken under the protection of the British Consul, to whom the King's subjects were to pay a certain annual sum. The Consul, it seemed, sent the King to the Island of Ascension to keep him out of the way. There he remained for some years, and then came to this country, when he made large claims against the British Government. The matter was referred to arbitration, when "Pepple" set up a claim of £200,000.

Mr. Cowper

The Government then put a stop to the arbitration, but referred the matter to the Judge Advocate and the Attorney General, who recommended that £7,673 should be given to him as compensation for the annuity of which he had been deprived.

if the schemes is carried out it will not only absorb the whole of the suitors' fund, as to our right to avail ourselves of which there is considerable doubt, but will also involve an expenditure on the part of the country of something like a million of money. In the course of yesterday evening notice was given in the House of Commons that the progress of that Bill would be resisted whenever it was brought forward, yet between two and three o'clock this morning the Bill was read a second time without a word being said, and a few minutes afterwards the House was counted out. If a Bill of this importance is to pass the other House on the 26th of July, between two and three o'clock in the morning, in the face of a threatened opposition, and if the Chief Commissioner of Works still clings to the hope of passing the Bill this Session, I must protest against that mode of getting a measure forward, and express a hope that the noble Earl (Earl Granville) will, on the part of the Government, take care that this Bill does not pass at a period when the attendance in both Houses is exceedingly thin, and after this evening is likely to be thinner. There is another Bill, of his intention to bring forward which on Monday next the Postmaster General has given notice, and which, although apparently of little consequence, is really a very important Bill. It professes to settle the rank and social status of the mayors of boroughs, and nothing can be more unobjectionable, though hardly anything can be more unimportant, than a measure of that kind; but under the plea of settling the status of mayors clauses are introduced which give power to the Secretary of State, on the application of any fifty individuals, absolutely and arbitrarily to alter the arrangement of wards in any borough, and to vary the number of the representatives of each; in point of fact, to completely alter an Act which was passed for the regulation of these matters only two years ago. I have no objection to settle the status of mayors, but I hope that the Government will not press so important an alteration as this. My reason for calling attention to this subject is that I am sure that this House suffers in public estimation very unjustly from the manner in which Bills are at this period of the Session hurried through it. Last night we had twenty-six Bills to dispose of; to-day there are twenty-three on the paper; and no one can think the manner in which some of them are disposed of—and I allude more particularly to the Committee on the Irremovable Poor Bill, a measure of very great importance—is at all creditable to this House. There is another danger to which we are exposed at this period of the Session. Bills are brought in which are called Continuance Bills, but in them are frequently introduced material alterations of the law, which pass both Houses without attention being paid to them. Last year about this time we were called upon, on the ground of urgency, to pass a Bill called the Gunpowder Bill, which was represented to be of great importance as providing for the secure storage of gunpowder. It was objected that it was a Bill which might have been brought forward at a much earlier period; but on the representation of the noble Earl opposite, your Lordships passed it in the month of August. I perceive that within the last few days a Bill has been introduced into the House of Commons for the purpose of amending that Bill, and it will be sent up to this House at about the same period of the year at which the original Bill arrived. Yet the errors of the original Bill must have been discovered long ago, and this amending measure might have been brought in much earlier in the Session. If I rightly understand the proceedings of the House of Commons the Secretary of State for India last night moved certain Resolutions, which are to be reported to-day, and upon which a Bill is to be founded authorizing the Indian Government to borrow £5,000,000 more money. That Bill has not yet been even introduced in the other House, and I leave your Lordships to judge when it is likely that it will reach this House. I wish to ask the noble Earl whether he is prepared to act in the spirit of the Resolution which my noble Friend, the Chairman of Committees, usually proposes, and whether the Government are prepared to give a pledge that during the short remainder of the Session Bills against which considerable objections are entertained, and Bills which are not of paramount and urgent importance, shall not be pressed on the attention of the House, which will probably consist of a very limited number of Peers? I wish further to ask the noble Earl whether he will communicate with his colleagues in reference to the business which stands on the books of the other House, so that he may be able to state what portion of the business before either of the Houses of Parliament it is the intention of the Government to proceed with, and that your Lordships may be able to ascertain what amount of business is likely to be carried on during the period when your Lordships can be in attendance? I do not think I am unreasonable in calling attention to the fact, that something like ninety Bills still remain to come before us at the end of July—but a week or ten days from the end of the Session; and in expressing my belief that the time has come when Her Majesty's Government may advantageously exercise a discretion in selecting those Bills which they deem most important to carry.

EARL GRANVILLE: My Lords, in answering the question of the noble Earl, I must give in some degree the same sort of unsatisfactory reply to similar questions, as far as I remember, ever since I sat in this House, and which I have been informed by the Marquess of Lansdowne and Lord Aberdeen was uniformly given during the whole of their experience. But I would ask your Lordships not to allow yourselves to be carried away by a mere enumeration of a number of Bills; because it is very evident that many of them are of no importance, being mere continuance Bills and the like; and, therefore, at whatever period of the Session they may be brought in, they do not require any great deliberation. The noble Earl alluded to several measures for effecting the consolidation of the law. There were particular circumstances connected with the Attorney Generalship which prevented those Bills from being brought forward as early as they would otherwise have been; but most of them having been under the consideration of this House last year, a great deal must, and I think may fairly, be taken upon trust. The particular day, therefore, on which they may be taken into consideration is immaterial. With regard to a most important and, I think, most useful Bill, which was considered in Committee last night—I mean that relating to the Irremovable Poor—I really do not know how Her Majesty's Government are to blame with regard to it. We think it an excellent Bill; we approve all its clauses. Five minutes before it came on in Committee there were nearly 100 Peers present. The noble Earl voted against the Bill without giving the slightest reason for his vote, and it was quite open for him or any other noble Lord to have questioned every one of the clauses and to have divided the House if he thought it desirable to do so. It was not for us to get up and raise objections to a Bill of which we approve; but I am quite sure that my noble Friend the Under Secretary, who had charge of the measure, would have been ready to reply to any questions or objections which the noble Earl or any one on the other side of the House might have thought proper to originate. The noble Earl has mentioned another Bill, of which I know nothing, with regard to giving precedence to mayors; but if the proper authorities have consented to the measure, I cannot see any objection to such a Bill. The noble Earl has mentioned one clause which, prima facie, deserves consideration; the Bill is at present fixed for Monday next, when, if it comes forward, and the noble Earl should urge satisfactory reasons, the House, no doubt, will not refuse to be guided by them. I really do not think it is too much to expect that Peers who are interested in particular Bills should be present when they come forward, and I am sure the majority of the Peers present could, if they wished, make it convenient to stay in town for the very limited interval during which the Session will continue. I will certainly make inquiry as to what Bills Her Majesty's Government may think it desirable to abandon as not being likely to pass this Session.

LORD REDESDALE protested against the conclusion at which the noble Earl (Earl Granville) had arrived with regard to the Irremovable Poor Bill. He had no objection to raise against the measure, but with regard to the manner in which it had been pressed he did not think the House had been fairly treated. It was read a second time on Tuesday, and the Committee was fixed for Thursday. On Thursday evening he left a letter at the noble Earl's house intimating his intention of proposing Amendments in Committee, and of asking the noble Earl on that account to postpone the Bill. He did make the request, and was at once refused. He did not anticipate that any high value would be placed upon his suggestions, but it was, nevertheless, the fact that he bestowed more attention upon the business of the House than almost any other Peer, and having been for twenty-five years chairman of a board of guardians, he naturally knew something of the subject. He gave reasons for the Amendments which he wished to propose, and stated some strong facts connected with the rates upon different kinds of property; but the noble Lord who had charge of the Bill did not condescend to give a single reply to his arguments or the slightest explanation of a satisfactory character. The Government had a majority in the House and forced on the measure. It was true that he might have compelled a division to be taken, but it was never his wish to adopt a vexatious proceeding or a course which was not likely to have any useful result. The responsibility of what had been done, therefore, rested upon the Government, and he was bound to say that if the legislation of their Lordships' House was to be either beneficial to the country or creditable to Parliament, the Government ought to abstain from throwing difficulties in the way of those who were disposed to take part in that legislation. He certainly did not think it desirable that any measures except those of importance should be read a second time after that evening; being within ten days of the close of the Session, the effect of introducing Amendments into any Bill would be either to defeat it altogether or to send it down to the Commons, where, in its altered shape, no consideration could be given to it. Had the Resolution which he usually proposed been adopted, it would have been impossible for Bills to be brought before them in such numbers at so late a period of the Session. At the particular request of the noble Earl opposite he had abstained from moving that Resolution this year, a Committee of the House of Commons, from whose deliberations some good result was hoped, being at the time investigating the subject. But, on the contrary, the business of that House was more behind now than it had ever been.

EARL GRANVILLE said, it was true the noble Lord had written to him on the subject of the Irremovable Poor Bill, but the letter did not reach him till some hours afterwards. But even if he had deliberated an entire day upon his request he did not see that he could come to any other conclusion. The noble Lord himself had originally fixed the Committee for Thursday, and his Amendments were directed not to the improvement of the machinery of the Bill but tended to subvert the principle, which had already been affirmed.

THE EARL OF HARDWICKE said, it was unjust to ask Members of their Lordships' House, which had been sitting from February, to debar themselves of that relaxation which the public generally were preparing to enjoy. Members of the Government, who were paid high salaries and obliged to stop in town, might find a difficulty in coming down to the House and disposing very pleasantly of the business; but their Lordships, generally, had no reason to complain of the alternative forced upon them, which was either to remain in town at considerable inconvenience, or, in the public sight, to incur the odium of neglecting their duties.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, noble Lords opposite were not justified in speaking as if the present was the only Government which was to blame for slackness in bringing business before the House. During the Government of the noble Earl opposite an important and cumbrous measure of some 200 clauses—the Local Government Bill—was carried through their Lordships' House within a few days of the close of the Session. On that Bill a series of Amendments were proposed, and he warned the noble Earl at the time that the subject was one which demanded careful consideration, and that the measure contained provisions which, if passed as they stood, would require amendment in future years. The noble Earl, however, said that great pains had been taken with the Bill in the other House, and that it was deemed of importance that it should not be delayed. He therefore withdrew his opposition; but his prediction had been fulfilled, for they had been amending the Bill from time to time up to the present moment, when another measure was before them to amend the clauses which were passed, contrary to his advice, in such haste. As to the Irremovable Poor Bill, it was introduced in February last, and was deferred in order that it might be referred to the boards of guardians throughout the country. The result of that reference had been about seventy answers in favour of the Bill and only some half-dozen against it. The Bill had been most carefully considered; the principles upon which it was based were simple and well understood by those who had studied the subject, and it consisted of only nine or ten clauses. It was perfectly obvious that the object of noble Lords opposite in urging the postponement of the Bill was simply to renew, in an indirect way, the attempt which they made directly, and in which they were defeated on the second reading, to throw out the Bill. He did not think that that was treating the Bill fairly. On the previous evening, when he had an Amendment to propose in the Universities Elections Bill, the noble Earl opposite deprecated it on the ground that the return of the measure to the Commons at that period of the Session would jeopardize its passing. But the alterations which were proposed to be made in the Irremovable Poor Bill would not merely endanger it, but would insure its defeat. He thought, therefore, that, under these circumstances, his noble Friend the President of the Council had no alternative but to refuse to postpone the Bill.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH observed that, since he had sat in the House, he had repeatedly heard complaints of the pressure of business at the close of the Session. He regretted to say, however, that the evil, instead of diminishing, was constantly increasing. It was no excuse for the present accumulation of arrears that matters were worse in a former Session. There were a number of important Bills affecting Scotland which their Lordships had not yet had an opportunity of considering, and which he thought it would be unjust and unreasonable to proceed with at that period of the Session.

LORD PORTMAN said, in his opinion the chief cause of the delay in public business was the increase of the talking powers of the other House. As long as the House of Commons chose to spend several months every year in mere debating, instead of in doing work, their Lordships must expect to have to sit perhaps through the whole of August in order to carry on the business of the country. However disagreeable it might be, he thought they were bound to sit on, and that they ought not for any pleasure of their own to go away till they had accomplished their task. He hoped their Lordships would teach the other House how real work might be done without unnecessary talking.

THE NEW ZEALAND DIFFICULTY.

LORD LYVEDEN rose to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he could state to the House what Instructions he had given to Sir George Grey respecting the settlement of the tribal rights of the Natives and the payment of the expenses of the war by the colony of New Zealand. On a former occasion a noble Friend of his (Earl Grey) had expressed an opinion that the only solution of the New Zealand question was the recall of the Governor and the suspension of the constitution. The noble Duke, the Secretary for the Colonies, had, however, anticipated the former step, while he very wisely declined to adopt the extreme measure of suspending the constitution for which there was not the slightest pretence. The recall of the Governor whenever anything went wrong in the colony was a somewhat inconvenient practice. It was quite true, however, that Governor Browne's term of service was nearly expired, so that he could not so much complain of the injustice, but it should be borne in mind that Sir George Grey would not return to the colony under the same favourable circumstances as when he quitted it. He left it in a period of prosperity, and would return to it at a time of convulsion and misfortune. He left it with great popularity; but his return at the present crisis would be apt to be misconstrued by, and to excite the suspicion of, both Natives and colonists; by the Natives who would consider it a triumph, by the colonists who might couple it with Earl Grey's proposition, and look upon it as a defeat. They heard again of war breaking out; but whether there was war or peace, some definite arrangement ought to be made with the colonists and the Natives upon two great questions—namely, the tribal rights of the Natives and the expense of military operations. All the convulsions in New Zealand had turned upon the question of tribal rights, and he did not think it was as difficult as was imagined for the noble Duke to define the tribal and individual rights of the Natives, which should be respected in the sale and purchase of lands; but whether the noble Duke could do so or not, it would be far better to acknowledge altogether the tribal rights of the Natives than to have these perpetual convulsions upon a question of so difficult and delicate a nature. The other and more important question was the defence of the colonies, and that was a question which must be considered everywhere. Responsible government having been laid down as the doctrine upon which the colonies were to be governed, they must abide by it in the small colonies, because they must abide by it in the large colonies, and they must abide by it in the large colonies because they would lose them if they did not. It was important, however, to know whether, responsible government being the rule, the mother country was to pay for the defence of the colonies. We were fortifying our own coast, and the people were preparing for what he trusted would prove an imaginary invasion. It was said that the spirit of modern warfare was to strike at the heart of the empire; but might not the limbs be attacked? And if they were attacked some definite rule should be laid down upon which they might claim assistance. If such a rule was necessary with regard to foreign invasion, it was much more necessary with regard to internal convulsions. In Australia the Anglo-Saxon race had swept away the Native tribes; but in New Zealand the Natives were active and ambitious, and quite capable of offering strong resistance to what they conceived to be injustice. The settlers who went out were men who looked to acquire land for profitable investment, and to remunerate them for exile and sacrifices. The only property of the Natives was the land, and their pride in its possession equal to the oldest feudal feelings elsewhere led to collisions with the settlers. As long as the mother country paid there would be no peace. According to the Report of the Colonial Military Expenses Committee the cost of New Zealand was £104,862. Next year the cost would be double, and it would be treble and quadruple unless the mother country came to the resolution that the colonists should defend themselves. The line beyond which no assistance would be given must be laid down, and it was only owing to the unwillingness of the Ministry to face the difficulty that it had not been laid down before. He thought it important before Parliament separated to call attention to the subject, and he hoped the noble Duke would state in reply whether any rule had been laid down as to the tribal rights, and whether Sir George Grey had been instructed that beyond a certain amount the Home Government would not be responsible for the cost of suppressing internal commotions in the colony. In what he had said he did not wish to disparage Sir George Grey, for whom he felt great admiration. Sir George Grey was originally appointed when he (Lord Lyveden) was Under Secretary of State for the Colonies with Lord John Russell in 1841, solely upon his merits, in consequence of an able book which he had written on Australia. He had been promoted by each successive Secretary for the Colonies, and he had received the approbation of every Minister under whom he had served. He believed that unless such instructions as he had indicated had been given to Sir George Grey, they would be hearing constantly of commotions in a colony which should of all others be happy and prosperous.

THE DUKE OF NEWCASTLE said, Sir George Grey would not assume the Government until the full period of his predecessor's service had expired; although it was quite true that his appointment had anticipated that event by a few months. He (the Duke of Newcastle) thought that the consequences of sending Sir George Grey to New Zealand would not be what the noble Lord anticipated. He did not believe that it could have the effect on the Native population which the noble Lord seemed to dread, and he was quite convinced it would not have the effect on the European settlers which the noble Lord seemed to expect. Why should the Natives apprehend that Sir George Grey was about to reverse the policy of his predecessor, when the Government which appointed Sir George Grey had expressed their opinion in favour of the government of Colonel Browne? And why should the English settlers dread that their interests would be neglected when they had nothing to complain of Sir George Grey's former government in that respect? Sir George Grey was sent out as the most likely man to restore confidence to the settlers and to the Natives, and to adopt such a policy as would prevent the recurrence of war. His noble Friend wished to know what instructions were given to Sir George Grey in reference to the tribal rights of the Natives, and thought it easy for a Secretary of State sitting in Downing Street to lay down distinct rules as to those rights, so as to guide the Governor in the exercise of his duties. He could only say that, whatever facilities the noble Lord might feel for such an operation, he could not profess to have them. When he saw men in the colony of such legal eminence and experience as Sir William Martin and Chief Justice Arney, differing in toto upon that question, he felt that he should be acting most unwisely, and doing anything but furthering the policy of the Government, if he endeavoured to settle difficult questions of law in England. These matters must be left to the judgment of men upon the spot, and all that the Colonial Secretary could do was to select the best instruments in his power for the purpose. These tribal rights were not the same in all parts of New Zealand, and the Natives themselves did not agree as to their extent. When, therefore, the noble Lord said it would be better to concede the whole, he forgot that by concession to one party they would be depriving another of privileges and advantages which they possessed. The whole question of tribal rights was most delicate, intricate, and difficult, and it should be recollected that Sir George Grey expressed an opinion, expressed by others before him, that it was most desirable some tribunal should be constituted on the spot which should decide upon them. He had stated before, and he repeated now, that the great obstacle to the constitution of such a tribunal had always been the indisposition of the Natives to submit their claims to such an arbitrement. There was a greater tendency now, perhaps, among the Natives to accept such a tribunal; but, at the same time, it was doubtful whether the Natives would greatly benefit by such an arrangement, because the power of the Crown, reserved by the Constitution, had always been exercised in their favour, and a tribunal bound to give its decisions according to dry law could not make that convenient concession to the prejudice of the Crown which the Crown itself had been in the habit of doing. However, he read in the last despatches of Colonel Gore Browne, that, in anticipation of a greater readiness on the part of the Natives, he had consulted the Judges of the colony, in order to see if some plan could not be devised for the establishment of such a tribunal. The noble Lord asked what instructions had been given to Sir George Grey. He (the Duke of Newcastle) had sent instructions to him on the 5th of June, and again on the 26th of the same month on these questions, but more especially bearing on the Native Council Bill, which had been passed by the local Legislature, and had not received the sanction of the Crown. His noble Friend would see that in the peculiar position in which Sir George Grey was placed it was most desirable that he should not give full details of those instructions. When Sir George Grey was appointed on the 5th of June he was at the Cape of Good Hope. He received instructions to proceed to New Zealand with the greatest possible despatch, and would, no doubt, leave the Cape and proceed to New Zealand as quickly as possible. If he were now to state what were the instructions which he had sent out to Sir George Grey, the report of this statement would reach New Zealand before Sir George Grey, and that would obviously be placing him in a very unfair position. At the same time, he did not disguise the fact that, though he had given Sir George Grey general instructions, he had not given him any specific instructions. He had expressed opinions, but subject entirely to Sir George Grey's discretion in the application of them. In appointing a man like Sir George Grey it was not fair to him to hamper him with definite instructions, seeing that the circumstances under which they were given might have changed entirely before the time came to put them into action. He had, therefore, left a larger discretion to Sir George Grey than he should have left to any other Governor under different circumstances. As to the expenses of the war, he had stated previous to the breaking out of the war that he had come to an arrangement with the Legislature that the colony of New Zealand should pay £5 per head for every soldier retained by the Imperial Government in the colony, and that the colony should also pay the expenses of the Militia and Volunteer force. The Colonial Government had also borrowed money from the commissariat chest without any arrangement for repayment, and he had told the Governor that all payment for the local forces must be defrayed by the colony itself, and if money were advanced for the war, it must be under a guarantee that it would be repaid. He had received a despatch from the colony, stating that that arrangement had been agreed to. He could not disguise from the House his belief that the expenses of a war conducted as this had been must be paid in a large proportion by the mother country; but he had every reason to believe that the expenses of this war would be borne in a larger proportion by the colony than had been the case in any previous war of the kind. He could not agree with his noble Friend that it would be possible for the Secretary of State to lay down some definite rule as to the proportion of military expenditure which should be borne by the colonies in time of peace. The circumstances of the colonies differed very much, some required a larger military expenditure, others a smaller; some were rich, and others comparatively poor, and there was this further difficulty, that having given self-government to most of our colonies, the arrangements would have to be made in conjunction with the Legislatures. The only way in which any definite rule could be laid down would be by saying to a colony, "You must either pay for these troops or we will withdraw them," and he had not made up his mind that such a course would be prudent or advisable with regard to our great colonies. He had not seen the Report of the Committee of the House of Commons, but, considering the difficulty of laying down any definite rule, he was not surprised to hear that they had left the matter very much where they had found it. He did not mean to say that considerable reductions might not be made in our colonial military expenditure, but if our colonial empire was worth preserving we must not act rashly, nor without full consideration of the local circumstances of each colony.

BANKRUPTCY AND INSOLVENCY BILL.

COMMONS' REASONS CONSIDERED.

Commons' Reasons for disagreeing to certain of the Amendments made by the Lords considered (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: I rise, my Lords, in the hope I shall be able to show good reasons why your Lordships should concur in the course the House of Commons has adopted with regard to the Bankruptcy and Insolvency Bill. Your Lordships are aware that the House of Commons has attached great value to this measure; and, with some few and inconsiderable exceptions, it has disagreed to the alterations made in it by this House. Your Lordships made very great and extensive changes in this measure, and I have no doubt that powerful reasons can be given in support of those alterations. But I deeply regret that we are not aware of those reasons. In the House of Commons this measure was debated in the face of the public, that watched the course of the debate from day to day; it took great interest in the proceedings of the Committee, and those who took part in the argument received from time to time from the public out of doors very valuable suggestions with regard to the alterations made; the House of Commons sent this Bill up to your Lordships as the fruit of that full discussion. And I regret deeply, though I do not presume to censure, the course your Lordships thought proper to take with regard to it. You took this Bill upstairs into a Select Committee, and for reasons we know not you altered almost entirely its character and effect. I repeat again, I know not why or wherefore these alterations were made; and the course your Lordships adopted has excited surprise as well as regret, because in the House of Commons the support given to the Bill was almost unanimous. From the Gentlemen who sit on what is called the Opposition side of the House I received the most generous and sincere support. In fact, if I wanted to carry any portion of the Bill that had excited discussion I was almost sure to receive the support of those Gentlemen who generally act with the noble Earl who may be called the head of Her Majesty's Opposition. But I was very much surprised by the difference between the opinions of those Members of the House of Commons and those who lead the Opposition in this House. And, it will be admitted, there was reason for this surprise, because I never heard that great party charged with want of unity in its course of action. How was it that the Bill received the cordial support of the Conservatives in the House of Commons, and rejection and condemnation from the Conservatives in the House of Lords? When it was sent down again to the House of Commons it was most desirable that the course to be adopted should be one altogether free from party influence. The alterations were debated on their own merits, and the result has been that upon the first series of Amendments—those relating to the constitution of the Court—a large majority uninfluenced by party motives has altogether departed from the views taken by this House. In reconsidering the question, I will venture to hope that your Lordships will bring to the discussion minds uninfluenced by anything but a wish to secure a proper administration of justice. I should be sorry if a question so great and so important as the administration of justice should be influenced by political feelings. If your Lordships believe that the administration of justice does not require this measure, you ought to reject it; but if you determine to reject it merely because you are bidden to do so; if you are gathered together at a season of the year when it is not usual to see so large a number of Peers on the Opposition benches to pronounce judgment on a measure that has never been debated in this House, then I should come to the conclusion that your Lordships have decided on other grounds than regard for the administration of justice. My Lords, I have observed with some pain the altered tone and language of some Members of the House of Commons with regard to this measure—of some who formerly acted with me with the utmost cordiality. I have found with pain that some of those who agreed with me have been obliged to adopt language which, while it shows there is no alteration in their real opinions, proves that something has led them to abandon the sentiments they previously professed. Let me give an example. I was encouraged by the support of such men as the Members for the University of Cambridge, and the Solicitor General to the late Government. ["Oh, oh!"] Surely, my Lords, there is no impropriety in speaking of what has taken place in the discussions on this subject. Those right hon. Gentlemen admitted the absolute necessity of this measure. And let me also remind your Lordships that I was indebted for the idea of appointing a Chief Judge of the Court to the Attorney General of the late Government. The Chief Judgeship is an idea not of the present Government, but of the past. It was the law officers of the Administration of the noble Earl who first introduced this as a necessary measure, though I am afraid the noble Earl is likely to be insensible to the paternity. But I was advert- ing to the change of language on this ques- tion in the House of Commons. Those who formerly concurred with the measure now say they think it better to wait till the next Session, and try the Bill in its present form. Well now, my Lords, I am about to ask your Lordships to pass on with me to the consideration of those topics which have been relied on in the discus- sion of this measure. Of course, I am un- aware of what took place in the Select Committee of your Lordships' House; but I will advert to the principal grounds on which your Lordships' objections are un- derstood to have been based, and I ask your indulgence while I do so, as this is the first time that those points have been dis- cussed in this House. First, I must ob- serve that, in the short public discussions which took place when the Bill was before your Lordships, the proposal to appoint a Chief Judge was designated by one or per- haps more of your Lordships as "a job." If it is a job it is one to be imputed to me alone. I arrived at the conclusion to which my noble and learned Friend to whom I have already adverted had previously come as to the necessity of having a head to this tribunal. Her Majesty's Government adopted my suggestion on the subject; but I must entirely disclaim having been influenced in that conclusion by any other consideration whatever than that such a head was absolutely necessary for the proper administration of the law. It is un- doubtedly true—and I will confess it to the noble Earl—that I did meditate a little bit of political delinquency against him, because, my Lords, you are aware that the administration of justice in Bankruptcy had been always united to the administra- tion of justice in Chancery; and, there- fore, if the Government had to make a selection for this office there was a proba- bility of their being obliged to go to the ranks of the supporters of the noble Earl. It was thus brought to my mind that I was labouring for the benefit of the noble Earl, though probably I should be com- pelled to deprive him of one of his poli- tical supporters. This proposition of the Bill has been objected to on the ground that it entailed an unnecessary expense. I could, my Lords, go into details, and show you that this measure will result in a saving to the public; but I do not think that the question of expense is one on which any solid argument can be founded, and I shall, therefore, pass from this pre- liminary consideration — only observing that the five Commissioners of Bankrupts who receive salaries amounting to £10,000 a year, that there are Commissioners of the Insolvent Courts, and official assignees, the whole of whom will be either at once or gradually abolished; and that the sav- ing in official salaries will be £12,000 or £15,000 a year, while the whole charge thrown upon the Consolidated Fund will be a single £5,000 a year. I shall, with your Lordships' permission, make a short statement with reference to the present system, and then explain to you why this change has been introduced—why some change is necessary—and what are the means by which we propose to effect the desirable alterations. My Lords, from a very early period the complaint respecting the Bankruptcy Court has been one direct- ed against the mode of administering jus- tice, and not against the rules themselves. The rules of administration are exceedingly simple; but the mode of administering justice has always been found most diffi- cult, or, at all events, has been constantly subject to much complaint. I think the great difficulty in the administration of justice in Bankruptcy hitherto has been the complete confusion between the admi- nistrative and the judicial duties. They have been confounded; there has been no provision for their distinction and separation; and the result has been that the judicial part has been performed in an unsatisfactory manner, and that the administrative part has been also performed with a less amount of prudence and skill than ordinary commercial intelligence, if applied to the subject, would secure. From the earliest times to about thirty years ago the administration of the Bankruptcy law throughout the country was carried on by seventy Commissioners, who were ordinarily called "the Lord Chancellor's Septuagint." It had been found utterly impossible to submit that system to any effective control, and it was broken up by my noble and learned Friend Lord Brougham in 1831. Changes have been made since then, and under the existing system there are several Commissioners, but they are without any controlling head. Each exercises a separate and independent jurisdiction and pronounces his own orders, and each comprehends in himself administrative and judicial functions. The result is this—that if you go into the Court of a Commissioner you will perhaps find a meeting of creditors going on, and at the same time the Commissioner is transacting something approaching to judicial business. There is no effective control over the Commissioner—no controlling power to which an appeal may be made speedily and economically for the purpose of setting at rest the numerous questions that will arise in so large a field as the administration of Bankruptcy and Insolvency. That is one of the evils which suggested the necessity of efficiently controlling all those tribunals till it was possible to substitute for them a uniform administration of justice in one single Judge, who should combine dignity, rank, and that satisfaction which the Judges of England give to the people when justice is meted out by persons filling high stations. That is one of the first evils which it is desirable to suppress by the appointment of this Judge, whose functions are intended to be of a threefold character. First, he is to superintend all the administrative part of the business; and then he is to exercise a jurisdiction of a double character—partly original and partly appellate. In the superintendence of the administrative business questions constantly arise—with regard to the collection and distribution of the property of bankrupts—on which a speedy and satisfactory decision is highly desirable. What we desire is to unite simplicity and uniformity. Questions arising in all parts of the country will be brought before the Judge without any of the forms usually required in courts of justice; and at an expense of a few shillings an immediate decision will be had on the question which the parties may wish to have determined. All who are conversant with the mode in which the great mass of the ordinary business is transacted, both in the courts of law and equity, are aware that it is performed by a Judge in chambers. It is done most competently, most efficiently, and most cheaply. But it can easily be believed that in the whole of England, throughout an area where so many bankruptcies and insolvencies occur, cases will perpetually arise which cannot be satisfactorily settled by a single Commissioner—who, by the way, is hardly ever at his office, except on state occasions. But this will be settled by establishing a tribunal in London to which there will be constant reference; and this tribunal is only to be attained by the appointment of a Judge with rank and duties such as are described in the provisions of this Bill. One of the great evils incident to our administration of the law of bankruptcy has been that the Court was always one of limited jurisdiction, exercising power only among the creditors themselves. Its jurisdiction was such that it could not avail itself of the ordinary appliances of justice. For example, a Bankruptcy Court or a Bankruptcy Judge had no power of acting against any person who was a stranger to the suit. He had no power of trying a question by means of a jury, nor had he any power of administering justice upon any of the principles or rights of a court of equity. This was a great evil which manifested itself in this way. Questions continually arose which the Judge found himself unable to determine; to-day he was obliged to send parties to a court of law, and to-morrow to a court of equity. Suitors, or rather creditors in bankruptcy, being brought within a limited forum, were compelled to have recourse to other tribunals to obtain that justice and determination which the Bankruptcy Court itself was not competent to give. In the preparation of this Bill I accordingly directed my attention to rendering the Court of Bankruptcy self-sufficient. I armed it with all the powers exercised either by courts of law or equity; and those who come into it for relief will no longer be danced about and sent at one time to one side of Westminster Hall, and at another to a different side of Westminster Hall; but the Court itself, possessing all the requisite powers, will be enabled to administer justice finally, fully, and without seeking the aid of any ancillary tribunal. But this could not be accomplished without putting at the head of the Court a Judge equal in rank, dignity, and standing, in experience and education, to any of the Judges of the courts of law or equity; and that is another great object which I desire to accomplish by this Bill; for your Lordships are all sufficiently versed in the state of the law to know that we in England suffer under evils which have grown up from the fact that a great portion of justice is administered by one tribunal, and another equal or larger portion of justice is administered by another; the two tribunals being frequently antagonistic and opposed to each other—so that, in point of fact, justice is constantly elaborated by a system of counter processes. This anomalous state of the law would speedily bring it into discredit if it were not that in this country the manner in which justice is administered is so satisfactory that it atones for a great part of the evils of the system. These are the evils and these the mischievous operations which I desire to remedy by this Bill; but it is impossible that I can remove them unless I put at the head of the new jurisdiction a Judge equal to its conduct in every particular. I would fain hope that on fuller acquaintance with the provisions of this Bill your Lordships will support them, because I feel assured that if you had known and understood them you never would have been parties to depriving England of the benefit that would result from the establishment, for the first time in this country, of an all-sufficient tribunal that would be able to administer justice in all its branches, and would set the example of a Court competent to discharge its duty without dancing the suitor to and fro to enable him to get a fragment of justice in one place and another fragment elsewhere. We come, in the next place, to the appellate jurisdiction of the Court. Remember that you have scattered over the country a great variety of local tribunals and local Judges, charged with the duty of administering this law of bankruptcy each within a limited area. Is it not desirable to establish with regard to them the efficient superintendence of a central authority, which by its rightful exercise of power, shall secure uniformity of principle, unity in the administration of justice, and consistency and care in every part of the system? And that is the function with which the Judge will be invested in his character of an appellate tribunal. Your Lordships, perhaps, will pardon me if I transgress the ordinary rules in referring to proceedings in Committee, but I have been informed that the Judge was then regarded merely in his character of an appellate Judge. The Committee was told—no doubt by very great authority—that the existing tribunals sufficed abundantly for all the exigencies of appeal, and that a Judge invested with such functions would be a perfect superfluity. If that was the ground on which the Committee proceeded, I am not surprised at their Report; but I am greatly surprised that even an ordinary perusal of this Bill should not have conveyed to the least technically-informed mind on the Committee conclusions utterly at variance with the limited view taken of the functions of the Judge. But I am not afraid of perilling this measure by putting it again on the question of the necessity of a Judge of appeal. This Bill, for the first time, throws down the wall of partition that has grown up or been established either by accident or by design, or by that which has originated so much in our jurisprudence, per incuriam, between the administration of the law of bankruptcy for the trader and of insolvency for the non-trader. I stay not to explain the reasons why that partition should no longer exist—you have determined both in this and the other House of Parliament that it shall not do so. But what is the consequence? You add to the Court of Bankruptcy more than double its antecedent jurisdiction. For years past the jurisdiction of the Court of Bankruptcy has not very much exceeded 1,000 commissions or fiats annually. The petitions in the Insolvent Debtors' Court amount to considerably more than 2,000 per annum. Therefore, in considering the exigencies for an appellate tribunal, and the duties which will belong to it, it would be the most idle thing in the world to proceed, as I am told, with great respect, the Committee of the House did, upon the statement of what the number of appeals in bankruptcy has hitherto been. But it does not stop here. The practical operation of the evil administration of the law of bankruptcy, the result of the cambrona system which was established originally, afterwards reproduced in 1831, and again reproduced with slight alterations in 1848, has been to drive the Queen's subjects out of her courts and to compel the people of this country to abandon the legal highway of public justice, and to seek relief in by-roads of administration by which they may get that which they cannot obtain in the courts of the Sovereign. And the practical result has been that, by reason of your having an unsatisfactory law of bankruptcy, the private administrations of insolvent estates have multiplied to such an extent that they now exceed in number by more than ten times the ordinary commissions of bankruptcy. While for many years the commissions of bankruptcy—I use the old phrase—have scarcely exceeded in number 1,000 or 1,100 per annum, the number of compositions with creditors, assignments for the benefit of creditors, and inspectorship deeds has averaged annually between 10,000 and 11,000. Can anything be a more complete proof of the unsatisfactory administration of the bankrupt law than the fact that people prefer private arrangement to public administration? Because these private arrangements are carried on at great disadvantage. In the present state of the law if any question arose under one of these deeds, there is no relief for the party except by a suit in Chancery; and although I am bound to say that relief is now obtained in that Court at a much less expense than formerly, yet a suit for the benefit of a number of persons interested in a trust deed is still a proceeding attended with much delay and necessarily with much expense. Yet, notwithstanding all these evils, the country has for years preferred this imperfect justice to that which was obtainable in the Queen's Court of Bankruptcy. One of the objects of this Bill is to distribute to the country the stream of law and equity in bankruptcy in the same manner in which they obtain it from the other Courts in Westminster Hall; and accordingly it compels all persons interested under these trust deeds to resort to the Court of Bankruptcy, and it gives them power to go to the Chief Judge with the same facility and readiness—and even with more than the same facility and readiness—with which an individual would go to his solicitor or his counsel, and to have determined promptly and economically any question which may arise in the administration of property under these deeds. Now, every noble Lord will at once observe that after enlarging the jurisdiction of this Court, first, by pouring into it all the business now done by the Insolvent Debtors' Court, and then adding to it all the enormous mass of property rights, trusts, and engagements which are dealt with in the 10,000 or 11,000 trust deeds which are annually manufactured, you will, in point of fact, have a Court crammed with business, instead of, as now, one which is deserted and neglected, and which is visited only by those who are compelled to resort to it to expose some fraud or to overcome some difficulty in the administration of an estate. How does this bear upon the appellate jurisdiction? In this way:—First of all the Judge will be the first person consulted to solve all questions which arise under these trustees, and in the next all such questions, when decided elsewhere, will, if necessary, come before him in his appellate capacity. Is it possible for any noble Lord to doubt the necessity of having such a head, or will it be possible any longer to listen to the suggestion which has been made that the present appellate tribunal in bankruptcy is perfectly equal to all that will be required? I think I have shown to all who have listened to me that it would be most fallacious to derive arguments from the business now transacted by the Court of Bankruptcy, and to apply them to the extended area which will belong to the tribunal constituted by this Bill. It has been repeatedly mentioned that some persons who are engaged in trade in different places have expressed an opinion that the present tribunal of appeal in bankruptcy is equal to the exigencies of the case; and in a petition signed by certain merchants of Manchester I find it is said—

“That your petitioners are of opinion that the appointment of a Chief Judge would be a useless expenditure of public money. The Lords Justices discharge their duties in a satisfactory manner, and have ample time at their disposal.”

Yet the very gentlemen who signed that document presented an earlier petition, in which they said—

“With a view to the amendment of the Bankruptcy Law your petitioners consider that the strength and character of the Courts ought to be improved, and that uniformity in the administration of the law ought to be secured.”

How are you to improve the standing of the Judge, except as this Bill proposes? How are you to secure uniformity in the administration of justice except by establishing a culminating point to which all these petty tribunals may at once yield? I listen to the opinion of mercantile men with great respect and attention when it is expressed with reference to evils of which they are sensible, or to matters connected with the more ready collection, management, and conversion of estates; but matters of legislation and of the administration of justice belong to legislators and not to merchants; they belong to men who have spent their lives in courts of justice and in the examination of their procedure—and I cannot for a moment imagine that the opinions of commercial men upon questions of that nature will have the weight with your Lordships which would deservedly attach to them upon matters within their experience and the extent of their proper observations. These are the principal objects which it is proposed to effect by the Bill with regard to the enlargement of the jurisdiction of the Court; but in the enumeration of the objects of the Bill I have omitted one of the most important. There is nothing which has for a long period of time caused greater reproach to the administration of the bankrupt law, or more injuriously affected the commercial interests of the kingdom, than the manner in which a bankrupt's conduct as a trader has been examined and the principles which have been applied to his discharge from his liabilities. I am sorry to say that there have been exhibited in England during the last few years instances of looseness of commercial morality which it has been painful to witness, and which have been most injurious to the credit of the community. A great number of these have been brought to light through the instrumentality of the Courts of Bankruptcy, but I am sorry to say that the Courts of Bankruptcy as at present constituted have differed from each other in a most wonderful manner as to the punishment which ought to be applied to this delinquency when discovered. Some years ago your Lordships attended to this subject, and those who framed the Bill which then became law, thought that they had made a useful discovery in classifying bankrupt debtors, and dividing them according to their certificates into three classes. A certificate of the first-class evidences that the bankruptcy was due to unforeseen circumstances alone. The second class includes those cases in which bankruptcy has been caused partly by unforeseen accidents and partly by improvidence; and the third class those in which bankruptcy has been entirely owing to the bankrupt's own want of providence and improper conduct of his business. Now, my Lords, I would wish, with all humility, to impress on your mind that it is very little matter what rules you lay down, unless you provide corresponding machinery that shall insure the efficient administration of those rules according to the spirit in which they have been conceived. I would recall to your memory the old saw which asserts as a general principle that "whate'er is best administered is best." The application of the rules as to classification has been left to a number of Commissioners, who differ so greatly in the estimation of commercial delinquency that where one would award a first-class certificate another would refuse a certificate altogether. Upon an analysis which I presented to the other House it was shown that in 100 cases one Commissioner had given 13 first-class certificates, where another had given 50 or 60. The consequence is that the classification in bankruptcy has been frittered away in its application until it has become useless and absurd. I desire to restore its efficacy by establishing one head and one hand to administer the rules, and to give uniformity and consistency to their application. Accordingly this Bill proposes that in all cases of disputed discharge, which form the great proportion of the cases of appeal, the Chief Judge should be immediately resorted to, and should determine the extent to which the bankrupt is entitled to a discharge, and the measure of delinquency which is to be stamped upon him. Moreover, there is, as your Lordships are aware, a different rule with regard to future property in cases of insolvency and of bankruptcy. When a man is discharged in the Insolvent Debtors' Court his future property is left liable to his creditors, while in the Bankruptcy Court, as a general rule, a bankrupt's future property is not exposed to the same liability. In throwing down that distinction it appeared right to the House of Commons, and your Lordships have concurred, to give to the tribunal that granted the discharge the power of determining, where the circumstances required it, that the future property of the bankrupt, although discharged, should still be liable. That is a very grave discretionary power, and ought only to be intrusted to a Judge of high position and authority. That is one of the points on which I am sanguine enough to hope that the provisions of the Bill will be a great improvement of the present law. But that hope is completely strangled and destroyed by your refusal to acknowledge the hand by which alone these benefits can be secured. We have been told, apparently on authority, that the tribunal of the Lords Justices is adequate to all exigencies of the appellate jurisdiction. I venture to say that there are no Judges who are more fully or more advantageously employed at this moment than the Lords Justices; and it is impossible, without materially interfering with their utility, to add anything to the burdens which they already have to bear. The extent of the appellate tribunal in this House compels the Lord Chancellor to be here about five days in every week, except when Parliament is not sitting, and during that period it is of course impossible for him to attend in the Court of Chancery. A great part of the administration of the appellate tribunal in Chancery consequently devolves on the Lords Justices. A great addition of business also has lately fallen on the Privy Council. The Lords Justices sit in the Privy Council a great number of days in the year, and I feel assured that the business of that Court will go on increasing, and that the demands which will be made in that respect on the Lords Justices will thus be yearly augmented. Those who profess that the Lords Justices are sufficient for the work must know perfectly well that they will be sufficient only till next March or April, when perhaps they hope to see a change of circumstances which may alter their view. I maintain that the Lords Justices have not time, or anything like time, to discharge the appellate jurisdiction constituted by this Bill. There may be some few cases in which appeals will still go from the Chief Judge to the Lords Justices, but the control and superintendence of the subordinate officers and the great mass of the appellate business will be borne by the former. I hope, if this Bill passes, that the public administration of the business of the Bankruptcy Court will be placed on the same footing as the administration of probate and divorce, which is now discharged by a single Judge, with the aid of registrars throughout the country; it is a tribunal which works with the utmost effect and simplicity, and the cost of the Court, I am happy to say, is not a fifteenth or sixteenth part of the old testamentary jurisdiction. It is my hope that to introduce a similar simplicity of jurisdiction into bankruptcy; and accordingly power is taken in the Bill not to fill up the vacancies which may occur among the Commissioners of Bankrupts; and there are many other topics, my Lords, to which I would willingly refer, but I must not trespass too long upon your kind and patient attention. I venture to think that no one will read this Bill and observe its working without concurring with me in acknowledging the necessity of the appointment of a Chief Judge. Therefore, in an earnest desire to promote the sacred interests of truth and justice, I humbly request you to agree with the House of Commons in their rejection of your Amendments, as far as they relate to the appointment of a Chief Judge. I believe that by so doing you will most effectually promote the great cause of reform in the administration of justice in this country. The noble and learned Lord then moved, not to insist on the Amendments made by this House relating to the Office, Powers, and Duties of the Chief Judge of the Court of Bankruptcy, to which the Commons have disagreed.

LORD CRANWORTH said, there was one part of the able speech of his noble and learned Friend in which he fully concurred, and that was the part in which his noble and learned Friend expressed his regret that this was the first time the question had been discussed in their Lordships' House; but he could not agree that this circumstance was attributable to those who considered the creation of a Chief Judge unnecessary. When the Bill was read a second time, he gave his late lamented Friend who then occupied the Woolsack distinct warning that he considered the appointment of a Chief Judge unnecessary and mischievous, and that he should oppose that part of the Bill. The noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chancellor) regretted that the discussion on this measure should have taken place in what he called a Secret Committee. It was in a Select Committee, which in that sense was a Secret Committee. But why was the Bill sent to a Select Committee? He (Lord Cranworth) pointed out to his late lamented Friend so many objections on points not, perhaps separately of great importance, but absolutely necessary to be corrected, that it was impossible to deal with them in a Committee of the Whole House, and his late noble Friend con-occurred in its being referred to a Select Committee, but expressly stated that it should be open to any Member to oppose any alterations when the Bill came to be discussed in Committee of the Whole House. When the Bill was before their Lordships again, he expected to hear from his late noble and lamented Friend the reasons upon which the proposal to appoint a Chief Judge was made; but they only heard him say that he was satisfied that without a Chief Judge the Bill could not work. Whose fault, then, was it that they were now driven to discuss the propriety of their most important feature of the Bill in the most inconvenient mode of objecting to Amendments by the other House? Certainly it was not the fault of those who raised objections to the proposal, but of those who never condescended to give the reasons which induced them to propose it at a more legitimate stage of the Bill. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack had stated a great number of abstract propositions from which no one dissented. No one doubted that it was important that justice should be uniformly administered, or that Parliament would not grudge the cost of a Chief Judge. But what he complained of was that his noble and learned Friend had given the go-by to the real question, which was whether the enactments of the Bill pointed out any necessity for the officer whom it proposed to appoint. No one could come to a correct conclusion who did not bear in mind what the duties administered in bankruptcy were, and how this Bill proposed to deal with them? What did the statement that a man had become bankrupt mean? That a person was in debt, and that he had committed an overt act of insolvency. Those points established the law took possession of his property, and distributed it rateably among his creditors. In order to make a man bankrupt it must be proved that the person making him a bankrupt was a creditor, and that he had committed an act of bankruptcy. It was a simple proceeding, and the machinery by which it was now effected consisted of five Commissioners in London and seven or eight in the most populous places in the country. If the person against whom proceedings were taken disputed the adjudication, the matter was investigated; but in a very large proportion of cases he was adjudged bankrupt. Generally the proceedings were of a merely formal character; and indeed that was the view of the noble and learned Lord who anticipated that the greater part of the future proceedings in bankruptcy would be taken before the registrars. All his property then became vested in a public officer; and then came the tug of war. The claims of persons to be creditors were investigated in undisputed cases before the registrar, and in disputed cases before the Commissioner. The question whether a man was a creditor or not did not depend on any peculiar law connected with bankruptcy, but on the ordinary law of the land. The list of creditors having been settled, the property of the bankrupt was got in, and distribution was made rateably among his creditors. Those were the simple functions which the Commissioners had to discharge, and to state gravely that the gentlemen who at present held those appointments were incapable of performing such duties seemed to him to be drawing upon the credulity of their Lordships to an extent hardly conceivable. He need not name the present Commissioners, but among them he could point out men who for integrity, honour, and knowledge of law stood as high in the estimation of the profession as any functionary that could be selected. Lord Brougham, in 1831, constituted a Chief Judge and three puisne Judges as a Court of Appeal from the decisions of the Commissioners. His noble and learned Friend had been sneered at for having created a tribunal which was unnecessary, but he thought his noble and learned Friend was at that time well justified in supposing that a great deal of business would come to the Court of Review. The appeals in bankruptcy used to be from the old Commissioners to the Lord Chancellor, and in Lord Eldon's day a large portion of the time of the Lord Chancellor was occupied with bankruptcy questions. But by a superior class of Commissioners being appointed, and by amendments in the law, which took away four-fifths of the subject matter of litigation, the Court of Review had really nothing to do. The consequence was that the Court fell to the ground, and in 1847 the whole business was transferred to one of the Vice-Chancellors, and in 1851 to the Lords Justices, and from that time to the present that system prevailed. The complaint which he had originally made when the Bill was introduced was that it did not at the outset define the jurisdiction of the Chief Judge. His jurisdiction had to be picked out from the various clauses of the Bill. It was very easy to state generalities and truisms about Courts of Appeal and the necessity of keeping Judges in uniformity; but what the House wished to have explained to it was what the Judge had to do, and how the duties placed upon him would carry out those generalities. There was an old adage—“Dolus latet in generalibus,” and without accusing his noble and learned Friend of being dolus, he did accuse him of having misled their Lordships in his zeal for the Bill by not condescending to particulars. He had looked through the Bill carefully several times with a view of ascertaining what the jurisdiction of the Chief Judge was. With regard, first, to his original jurisdiction, Clause 18 gave him power to review bills of costs; Clause 43 gave him power to regulate certain payments made for coals, stationery, &c.; and Clause 52 transferred to him certain powers to make general orders and regulations. By Clause 60 he was enabled, along with the Commissioner, to assign uncontested business to the administration of the Registrars; and Clause 61 gave the parties in those uncontested proceedings liberty to take his opinion on any point which might arise in the course of them. Clause 63 gave him power to order any person who might refuse to answer before the Registrar to pay the costs; and Clause 64 enabled the parties to any proceeding by agreement to take his opinion at any stage by submitting a special case. With regard to Clauses 67 and 68 persons who were actuated by a feeling of hostility towards the Bill might almost say that they had been introduced for the purpose of making it appear to the public that something had been done, when, in fact, nothing was done. They gave power to the Chief Judge to try issues by a jury; but he was perfectly certain that such a power never would be used. When the Court of Review was established he remembered Sir George Rose saying that the power of trying by jury never would be used, for there were no questions which required to be solved by a jury. In order that there might be no doubt on the point, he (Lord Cranworth) had written to Mr. Erskine to ask him what number of issues had been tried by a jury during the seven he years had presided in the Court, and his answer was that he believed that three had been tried, or set down for trial, but only one had ended in a verdict. Passing on to Clause 99 it merely gave authority to transfer certain cases from the Chief Judge to other courts. Clause 112 referred to the provisions that enabled pauper invents to be adjudicated bankrupts. Clause 142 was more important; it provided, in case of any dispute between the creditor and assignee, or creditors and a trustee, that the question in dispute might be referred to the Chief Judge. A similar power now exists of referring to a Commissioner. But, in fact, there had been very few such references, as such questions did not arise. The 164th Clause gave the Chief Judge the power of refusing or suspending orders of discharge, or in other words of giving or refusing the certificate. But that was not a new proposition, there was a similar provision in the 229th section of the old Bankruptcy Act, though he admitted that this clause went further in this respect than the old Act, and was so far an improvement. That was a new jurisdiction and an important one; but it was for their Lordships to say whether it was important enough to render the appointment of a Chief Judge necessary. In the country this jurisdiction was entrusted to the Commissioners alone. Were they such superior men that the same functions could not be given to the London Commissioners? Even by this Bill this power in many cases was given to the Judges of the County Courts. Could it, then, be said that this function rendered a Chief Judge necessary? No doubt it was proper that this power should be entrusted to the Chief Judge, supposing it to be conceded that a Chief Judge was necessary. But nothing appeared in the Bill which showed it to be necessary that a high legal functionary ranking with the Judges of the land should be appointed to perform the functions he had pointed out, and which were at present executed by functionaries of a lower rank. Besides, he would appeal to his noble and learned Friends to say whether anything was said in the Committee of these different functions that were to render a Chief Judge necessary. All that was said was that he would be more accessible as a Judge of Appeal than the Lords Justices.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR explained that there would still remain many cases that would go to the Chief Judge.

LORD CRANWORTH said, that was the way in which they had been misled. They had been led to suppose that nothing would go to the Chief Judge but appeals from the Commissioners. Where was the clause which took away the power of appealing from the Commissioners to the Lords Justices? Noble Lords who were on the Committee would correct him if he was wrong in stating that the question had been put several times, and that the answer had been that there was no intention to take that appeal away. The jurisdiction of the Lords Justices in those cases was now existing, and could not be taken away without express words. It had, however, been urged that the Chief Judge would be more accessible—that appeals would be brought before him readily and cheaply. He would take the liberty of pointing out to their Lordships that appeals now came before the Lords Justices by “motion, petition, or special cause,” and those were the very words introduced into this Bill in reference to appeals to the Chief Judge. How, then, was it proposed to make appeals come before the Chief Judge more readily and in a cheaper manner than they now did before the Lords Justices? Surely it could not be intended to frame a different scale of fees for the Chief Judge’s Court of Appeal to induce suitors to give it the preference. Many persons, however, I believe most, would prefer to have the decision of the Lords Justices to that of the Chief Judge, and they would still have the power of carrying their cases before them. He did not doubt that appeals might be heard more rapidly by the Chief Judge, for he feared that that learned functionary would have nothing to do. If their Lordships were anxious to constitute a functionary who should have nothing to do but hear imaginary appeals there might be a very good reason for appointing this Chief Judge. A Return presented to their Lordships showed that in a space of between thirteen and fourteen years, since 1847, the Lords Justices had heard bankruptcy appeals on 215 days, or about fifteen days in each year. But their Lordships must not imagine that the whole of those fifteen days were spent in the discharge of that duty. It often happened that two or three of those appeals were put at the head of the paper, and that, when they were disposed of, the Lords Justices proceeded to other business. But, even supposing that the whole fifteen days were spent in hearing these appeals, surely they would not want another Judge for that. His noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack said that the Lords Justices were fully occupied. He admitted it; but they got through the whole of their business —including the bankruptcy appeals—within the year. He now submitted to their Lordships that a constitutional question of the gravest importance was raised by the 23rd Clause, and the interpretation which his noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack put on that clause. If the object of that clause was to give power to the Government, having regard to the state of business in the Court, not to fill up vacancies, it was a very proper one; but if it was meant that, not having regard to the state of business, the Government should have the power of not filling up the vacancies, with the view of creating another form of tribunal—namely, a Chief Judge without Commissioners—then he said that the power was not one which it was proper to vest in any authority save the Legislature. On the present occasion he was only taking the course which he had intimated to his noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor that he would follow in respect to this Bill. He believed that the appointment of the Chief Judge was not necessary; and that not being necessary it was objectionable and mischievous. He could assure his noble and learned Friend that his only object was to act in this matter according to his honest convictions, and in every law reform his noble and learned Friend might rest assured that he would find no more cordial supporter than himself.

LORD CHELMSFORD: My Lords, no one can for a moment question the motive which has actuated my noble and learned Friend in the admirable speech which he has just delivered; and, my Lords, I feel gratified that my noble and learned Friend has pursued the course which he has, because, I think, it furnishes a most complete refutation to the insinuation of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, that the opposition to this Bill was on political grounds. My noble and learned Friend has also endeavoured to insinuate that even the Committee which decided this question was improperly biassed in the division to which they came, and he has stigmatized the Committee by calling it a “Secret Committee,” with very considerable emphasis. Now, my Lords, I must say for that Committee that, though the majority of the noble Lords who composed it were supporters of the Government, I believe there was not a Member of it who did not try to perform his duty faithfully, and make the Bill as perfect and complete as it could be made, and who did not give his undivided attention to this important subject. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack has desired particularly to know what were the grounds which influenced the Select Committee in coming to the conclusion against the establishment of a Chief Judge. I think the unanswerable speech of my noble and learned Friend who has just spoken will gratify his curiosity. My noble and learned Friend, by his dissection of all the clauses of the Bill, has so completely exposed the groundlessness of the principle on which it is alleged the Chief Judge ought to be established, that I do not wonder that no noble Lord who disagrees with him has risen to reply to his argument, but that they have rather chosen to have the answer—if answer there can be given—to my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack. My noble and learned Friend, in a tone which we have been unaccustomed to hear, insinuated that in consequence of the decision of the Select Committee, the votes in the other House have been influenced, and that Members of that House who had given their support to him have been induced to change their opinions; and my noble and learned Friend, complimenting those who had supported him generally, stated that the suggestion of the Chief Judge came from an hon. and learned Member who was Attorney General under the late Government. I do not think my noble Friend (the Earl of Derby) or any one of his Government is answerable for the opinions entertained on the subject of bankruptcy by my hon. and learned Friend Sir FitzRoy Kelly. The Government of my noble Friend brought in a Bill in the year 1859; but that Bill makes no provision for a Chief Judge, nor for any alteration in the existing establishment. My noble and learned Friend has addressed your Lordships with considerable ingenuity and ability. He naturally feels great solicitude for his own offspring, for it has been the result of long and painful labour. My noble and learned Friend will see nothing but symmetry in its limbs, and is displeased if anybody can discover anything like deformity or irregularity in them. But, as he has laid his offspring at the door of the public, we must be excused if we examine it a little before we determine whether it is worth taking up and adopting. The question you are called on to determine is, not whether the present system ought to be abolished, and in its place a high Court established, with a

Lord Chelmsford

Judge exercising important judicial functions, and with subordinate functionaries, to whom administrative duties alone are to be given. That was partially, at least, the scheme of my noble and learned Friend during the last Session of Parliament, because he then introduced a Bill into the House of Commons by which he proposed to get rid of the London Commissioners altogether, and to establish in their place a Chief Judge. But the question is this—are you of opinion that, retaining the present system, you should superadd a Judge of high rank and with large salary, to perform duties which, I will satisfy your Lordships, are now adequately and efficiently performed by those to whom they are intrusted? In looking at these subjects a very narrow view is often taken. We are apt to look at things round us, and to forget those which are far off. We turn our attention exclusively to the London district, and we omit from our recollection the fact that there are such places as Manchester, Birmingham, Liverpool, and other great commercial towns, where trade is carried on as extensively, where bankruptcies are as numerous, and where the estates to be distributed are as large as in the Metropolis. I am very much disposed to agree with my noble and learned Friend that matters in bankruptcy are not of such importance as to require the intervention of a functionary of this description, and that proceedings in that Court ought not to be so dignified. I stated on a former occasion that of the bankruptcies which take place annually 85 per cent are estates under £1,000, and the great majority are estates of less than £300. The duties of this great Judge, therefore, will be confined, in the first place, to 15 per cent of the bankruptcies in the metropolitan district only—for the cases throughout the country will derive no benefit from the “dignity” of the Judge, on which the Mercantile Law Amendment Society lay such stress. The other functionaries in different parts of England must shine with their own dim light, for they will not have the slightest lustre reflected upon them from the rays of the dignity of the metropolitan Court. Both my noble and learned Friend and the House of Commons in the Reasons which they give for adhering to their own opinion say that it is most desirable to establish consistency and uniformity of decision. To accomplish so desirable an end there is no necessary sacrifice which ought to be refused.

It could be accomplished in one of two ways—either by vesting the jurisdiction in a single person, or by an appellate tribunal checking and controlling the proceedings of a multiplicity of Judges. From the Reasons assigned by the House of Commons any one not informed on the subject would believe that this was the first time that a court of appeal had been suggested. But it is stated that there is already a most admirable court of appeal, which performs its duties most satisfactorily and efficiently. It is impossible to praise too highly the character and ability of the Lords Justices, who practically form the court of appeal, whose powers it is proposed to transfer to the new Judge. My noble and learned Friend says they are overburdened with work, and that they will be unable to perform, not merely their new, but their present duties. With regard to their attendance at the Privy Council my noble and learned Friend knows that the time which they devote to that part of their business is the very time at which the Court of Chancery is not sitting. Nor is he more correct in saying that they have no time to give to the duties of a court of appeal in Bankruptcy. I take last year as an illustration, and I find that the forty-two cases which constituted the whole of the business in that Court were settled in the course of fifteen days. It has been said that there is delay; but, in my opinion, it is merely imaginary. No delay was ever complained of—ever suggested—till it became necessary to establish some ground for transferring their jurisdiction to the new functionary. If any delay has taken place it has been, I believe, on the part of the suitor, and not of the Judge. Whether it be a petition, motion, or special case, if it is put down on Monday or Tuesday, it will be heard on the Friday following. Another ground on which the change is advocated is the costliness of appeal. My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General stated that it would be impossible any appeal could take place from the Lords Justices at a cost of less than £60. That amount rather startled me; but I should like to know how it will be in the slightest degree diminished by any of the provisions of this Bill. Nay, it appears to me extremely probable that the expense will be very considerably increased. There may be an appeal to the Chief Judge, and there may also be an appeal from his ruling to the court of appeal in Chancery, providing the Judge gives permission for that appeal to take place. I do not know who is the Great Unknown on this occasion. From something which fell from my noble and learned Friend I am led to suppose that he has desired not to commit the Government to a hasty choice; but that he has some one in his mind whom he appeared to be considering in the course of his speech. But for a considerable time the Chief Judge, whoever he may be, will not be likely to have the experience of the present London Commissioners, and if he has the becoming diffidence which I expect he will have, and the feeling which every Judge ought to have, that in doubtful cases his decision should not be final, he will not, when reversing the decisions of the Commissioners, refuse the parties permission to appeal; and thus, instead of diminishing the cost of appeals, you will probably double it, because in many cases there will be a double appeal. My noble and learned Friend admits that the existing business is not sufficient to justify the appointment of a Chief Judge; but he says that insolvency and bankruptcy are to be united, and that there will be such an influx of business arising from that union that it will be quite impossible for the Lords Justices to get rid of it. I believe that that supposition is as imaginary as many others with which he has favoured your Lordships. The insolvent business is, as regards value, generally of a very insignificant character. Very few insolvencies would bear the expense of an appeal, and we who have had experience in courts of justice know that there is very little encouragement to enter an appeal when there are no funds to maintain it. But let us suppose—and it is a good deal to suppose—that this union of the two kinds of business will double the number of appeals; that, instead of there being forty-two appeals in a year, there will be eighty-four, and instead of fifteen days being required for disposing of them thirty will be needed—is any case made out for appointing a new Judge to discharge these duties? My noble and learned Friend felt this difficulty, and he, therefore, cast about to see how he could find some original jurisdiction to be exercised by him. I remember that when we were in Committee my noble and learned Friend opposite (Lord Cranworth) asked the late Lord Chancellor to define what would be the duties of the Chief Judge. The noble and learned Lord did not give any satisfactory explanation; but, quoting the words of my noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack, he said that the Judge was the keystone of the arch; upon which I ventured to say to some one near me that £5,000 a year was a great deal to pay for a metaphor. Let us come now to this general jurisdiction. My noble and learned Friend opposite has so completely anatomized the provisions of the Bill upon this subject that it is unnecessary for me to go through the different clauses. I may state generally that the only exclusive original jurisdiction which the Chief Judge is to exercise is that with respect to opposed discharges of bankrupts, and the reason given for confiding to him this jurisdiction is that it is desirable to obtain uniformity of decision. It is said that there is great contradiction in the opinions of the Commissioners, and it is for the sake of getting rid of their contradictory decisions that the Chief Judge is to be invested with this original jurisdiction. There is a great deal of misapprehension, not to say misrepresentation, with regard to the contrariety of the decisions of the Commissioners. There is no conflict whatever in their decisions founded on the Bankruptcy law—the contrariety has arisen only in the decisions upon applications for certificates. There are three classes of certificates, and the class of certificate which a bankrupt receives depends upon the view which the Commissioner takes of his conduct. There is no settled or fixed principle involved in that. One Commissioner may take a sterner and another a more lenient view of the conduct of a bankrupt, and no principle is violated. But, with regard to all the great principles of law which enter into questions of bankruptcy, such as those relating to reputed ownership, fraudulent preferences, and so on, there have been no contradictory decisions. But how will the appointment of a Chief Judge get rid of contradiction in the measure of commercial morality in various cases? The 164th section of this Bill points out so clearly that he who runs may read what are the grounds upon which the Commissioner or Judge is to proceed with regard to granting, suspending, or refusing orders of discharge; and it is impossible that there can be any mistake except with regard to the facts which constitute the particular courses of conduct which are pointed out by the section. The clause enacts that the Judge shall give the order unless he finds that the bankrupt has been living extravagantly; incurring debts without a prospect of paying them; falsifying books or things of that kind. Is not that as much as can be provided for uniformity, and how can the Judge fix any uniform settled principles on which the orders shall proceed?—because every case must turn upon its own facts. Why are not the Commissioners, who are men of the greatest experience, competent to be intrusted with the performance of these simple duties? So much for the uniformity which is to be obtained within the metropolitan district by the appointment of the Chief Judge. But how is uniformity to be secured with regard to the decisions of the nine country Commissioners, and the sixty County Court Judges? Is it not trifling with the House to pretend that this is the ground on which you will establish a new Judge with this high salary? As to the power to be given to the new Judge to try issues of fact, my noble and learned Friend opposite has pointed out very justly that a question of fact is not likely to arise within his jurisdiction once in ten years. The questions which occur in bankruptcy are generally between persons over whom the Court has no jurisdiction—such questions, I mean, as fraudulent references, disputed ownership, and so on, which must be decided, as at present, by the courts of law. In fact, this is only another of the points on which a great parade has been made of the duties to be performed by the new Judge in order to justify his appointment and make people believe it is absolutely necessary. My noble and learned Friend on the Woolsack spoke of the enormous influx of deeds of arrangement to be expected under the Bill; but I think his argument in that respect was somewhat inconsistent. He pointed to the frequency of deeds of arrangement as a proof that the present Court of Bankruptcy is unpopular; and yet he inserts clauses in the Bill for the express purpose of inviting creditors and bankrupts to effect deeds of arrangement. My own opinion is that these clauses are the most valuable in the Bill, for I am satisfied that such deeds are the very best mode which can be resorted to for the purpose of arranging the affairs of a bankrupt in the first instance. I would have your Lordships observe, also, that it is only deeds of arrangement within the metropolitan district which will fall within the province of the Chief Judge, for the Commissioners are to exercise the same authority in the country. Again, the circumstance that the new Judge is to sit in chambers has been made a great deal of without much reason. I very much doubt whether it will prove so satisfactory an arrangement as has been represented. The Commissioners are joined with the Chief Judge in these sittings, and I should suppose would be able to dispose of the business without him. There are many other points upon which I would like to touch, but the clock warns me not to exhaust your Lordships' patience. I have endeavoured to distinguish as far as I could the appellate and the original jurisdiction of the Chief Judge. I have shown in regard to the first that there is no necessity for the creation of a new Judge to discharge the duties, as they are most efficiently and satisfactorily performed by the present court of appeal, and as there is not the slightest chance of any increase of business arising which the Lords Justices could not overtake. I have also shown that the original jurisdiction is nothing but a pretence for making a new appointment; that the business can be done perfectly well by the five Commissioners; and that the idea of procuring by those means greater uniformity of decision than at present is a delusion. I hope, therefore, your Lordships will adhere to the Amendments which you have introduced on the subject—and which were agreed to in the Select Committee without a division—and spare the public purse the expense of this most unnecessary appointment.

LORD WENSLEYDALE said, that he entirely concurred in the views that had been expressed by his noble and learned Friend. The law of bankruptcy required no great amount of legal learning, and he really did not see, therefore, what necessity there was for a Judge of the rank and with the salary proposed by the Bill as it originally stood. This particular question had been very carefully considered by the Committee, which was composed of noble Lords of all shades of politics, who were animated, in his opinion, by only one desire, namely, to pass a measure which should lead to the proper administration of justice in regard to bankruptcy. That Committee had thought fit to make this Amendment, and he had heard nothing which tended in any degree to shake his opinion that the decision of the Committee was a sound one. He was surprised that, after what had passed in Committee, his noble and learned Friend should persist in opposing the Amendments which had been made in the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR, in reply, said, the kind attention which your Lordships gave me at the outset would be most ungratefully repaid if I were to trespass on you long in reply, and yet I must beg your attention for a few moments. I have listened with great attention and with all the respect which is due to the two noble and learned Lords who spoke after me. I regret deeply that I was unable to hear one word of my noble and learned Friend who spoke last. I say so not for the purpose of exciting a laugh, but to express my sincere regret that I am not able to advert to his observations. But I am indebted to the two noble and learned Lords who spoke before him for a great discovery—namely, how your Lordships' Select Committee arrived at their conclusion; for now I see perfectly that, if they had no further information before them as to the contents of the Bill than the knowledge of the subject, and of the subject of bankruptcy generally, which has been exhibited by my two noble and learned Friends, I have no right to be at all surprised at that conclusion; and when I consider the irresistible effect of the witticisms with which their lucubrations ended, I may assume that in the Committee soluntur tabula risu, and so the Chief Judge was dismissed. I beg your Lordships to follow me one moment while I justify the observation, which if I had time I would redeem to the letter, that from beginning to end not one word is correct of all you have heard from these two noble and learned Lords. First, I will take the last observation of the noble and learned Lord who spoke last but one. He talked of deeds of arrangement as if it were desired that they should be excluded by this Bill.

LORD CHELMSFORD: I said, on the contrary, that you encourage them by the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: They are encouraged by this Bill, and so the noble and learned Lord said; but he seemed to think that because you encouraged them they would not supply material for the occupation of the Chief Judge. Now, they will supply most abundant material, and they will supply it in this way—that all questions arising under them will have to be disposed of by the Chief Judge, and if one question for judicial decision arises in twenty deeds, with 10,500 deeds there must be several hundred questions to come annually before the Chief Judge. Then, in the next place, my noble and learned Friend and his coadjutors were very eloquent on the subject of the costs of appeal. My noble and learned Friend on my right thought he had discovered a very great failure in the Bill in its leaving the possibility of appeals to the Lords Justices, and he told us that he asked in Committee how that was met, but got no answer. I am very sorry that my noble and learned Friend should not have read the Bill, as it might have superseded the necessity of asking the question. If my noble and learned Friend had only condescended to inform himself how the appeal court was vested in the Lords Justices—how it was originally created by the Consolidation Act, and transferred to the Lords Justices—and if he had looked at the schedule and observed that the clause in the Consolidation Act was repealed, he need never have asked with wondering anxiety to find an answer to the objection that appeals to the Lords Justices were continued. The sections of the Act giving the right of appeal, which was ultimately transferred to the Lords Justices, are repealed by the Bill.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: That only shows my noble and learned Friend's want of apprehension. The Act to which he has alluded is an Act transferring an existing jurisdiction; the Act which is repealed is the Act which created the jurisdiction so transferred, and if the jurisdiction which is transferred is repealed, nothing is left upon which the transfer can operate. My noble and learned Friend talked a great deal about the costs of appeal, and wondered how the Bill would effectuate any diminution of that expense. Does the noble and learned Lord know what constitute the principal costs of appeal? I apprehend not. But I will tell him. The great cost of appeals is produced in this way—that before the Lords Justices new evidence is received. Parties come before the Lords Justices with a mass of new affidavits; these affidavits create new issues; and in that way the cost of appeals is indefinitely augmented. If he had condescended first to read the Bill he would have found a section which enacts specifically that on the hearing of appeals before the Chief Judge no new matter shall be received without leave of the Chief Judge; and if he had looked into the evidence given before the Commission which sat in 1854, he would have found the evidence of two of the most extensive practitioners in bankruptcy, and whose names may be seen every day in the newspaper. Those two gentlemen, whose names are Mr. Lawrance and Mr. Linklater, came in pointing out the evils of the present system, and they state that the present form of appeal to the Lords Justices amounts to a denial of justice. Had he not better have been a little more informed upon the subject before he ventured on these criticisms? This only shows an utter want of understanding the subject; and this is the way your Lordships are brought here. ["Order, order!"] I do not know why exception should be taken to that statement. Do not noble Lords attend here out of anxiety on the subject? You do, and therefore I am quite sure you will give me your ears, and decide not on any antecedent instructions, but according to what in your consciences you believe the interests of justice require. I will turn again to what is much more acceptable—the exposure of the errors which I find have been made. The expenses of the appeals, according to the evidence which I have quoted to you, are so great as to amount, in fact, to a denial of justice, but I have struck at the root of the evil by laying down as a principle that no new evidence shall be received, and I have so regulated the appeal that I expect that the expenses of the appeal will not amount to more than one-tenth of what they are at present. My noble and learned Friend who spoke last but one (Lord Chelmsford) said that I had represented the Lords Justices as not having time for their present work. But I said no such thing. What I said was that they would not have time for the additional work which would be cast upon them by the augmentation of the business of the Bankruptcy Court which would be produced by this Bill. My noble and learned Friend, who spoke immediately after me (Lord Cranworth), went through the Bill, picking out here and there various administrative functions of the Chief Judge, which he seemed to wish to represent to be those for which alone the Chief Judge had been created: but it is quite evident that when the jurisdiction of the Court is enlarged as I have described, the functions of the Judge will also be enlarged to the same extent. The whole Court, in fact, emanates from him, and it is he who regulates all its proceedings. My noble and learned Friend spoke of the absurdity of trying questions of fact in the Bankruptcy Court, and referred to former experience; but he forgets that at that time of day the jurisdiction of the Court was limited. Observe how this appeal to the Chief Judge will work. An estate is brought into the Court, creditors come in and assert that the bankrupt is indebted to them; then questions arise as to the extent of the debt, the constitution of the debt, and the present liability—all these are points which at present are decided by the Commissioners, because the bankrupt will not incur the expense of an appeal, but which the Chief Judge under this Bill will at once decide.

THE EARL OF DERBY: In London only.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: Yes, and in the country, too. If I had only had half an hour's conversation with the noble Earl over the Table of that Select Committee, I will lay my life that I could have converted him to my opinion. I will pay that tribute to the noble Earl's legal knowledge, to his apprehension, and to his candour. Suppose, now, that a creditor has a claim against a debtor of £500 or £600; the dividend, say, is not more than 4s. or 5s. in the pound, which brings the sum he has to receive to some £150 or £160. Suppose his claim is rejected by the Commissioner. The expenses of an appeal are about £60 aside, according to the evidence of the gentleman I mentioned before, and a creditor, therefore, will naturally think it a very unwise thing to buy a ticket in the lottery of litigation at the certain expense of £60. Though there may be a mistake made by the Commissioner, it cannot be set right without the creditors having to pay the expenses. Quicquid delirunt reges—the Commissioner being the reges here—plectuntur Achivi—the suitors are mulcted. But under this Bill if a Commissioner—in the country say—rejects a proof, the creditor may send his affidavit up to London by the same night's post, and a few shillings will probably suffice to set right the error committed by the Court below. Have my two noble and learned Friends ever attended the proceedings in bankruptcy? I will just give your Lordships another instance of the inconsiderate manner in which the Select Committee dealt with this Bill. There was a provision in this Bill originally that the Court below should employ a shorthand writer. Without a shorthand

Court in London or the country, the examination is taken down, question and answer, by the clerk; and not only is the process of examination dragged out to an indefinite extent, but nothing like cross-examination is possible. Whenever your Lordships sit here judicially, you employ a shorthand writer; but though the practice is recommended by your usage the Select Committee struck the clause out of the Bill. I am obliged to speak strongly on these points, because I have a very strong opinion in regard to them. I have no object to serve in the establishment of this Chief Judge—indeed, what object should I have? My noble and learned Friend said that I had occupied myself with generalities. What I endeavoured to do was to give your Lordships accurately the facts and statistics on which my conclusions were founded. My noble and learned Friend who spoke second in this debate seemed to be under a very erroneous impression as to the amount of duty which would have to be performed by the Chief Judge. Surely he cannot be aware of the number of suits in Chancery arising out of bankruptcy cases; nor that one of the two Commissioners of the Insolvent Debtors' Court, which is to be swept away by this Bill, sat for 150 days in a single year, while the other Commissioner sat for a very considerable number of days to despatch a large amount of business. I shall not trespass further on your Lordships' attention, but leave the matter entirely in your hands. The first question which I think it will be expedient to put to your Lordships for your decision, if it meets with your approbation, will be whether you will insist on your Amendments relating to the office, duties, and power of the Chief Judge. I believe that will be the most convenient form of putting the question, because it will comprehend a whole class of Amendments in one Vote.

LORD CRANWORTH: My Lords, before the Question is put I claim the indulgence of your Lordships while I briefly explain. The noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has brought against me what, as affecting one who has occupied the position now filled by the noble and learned Lord, was certainly a grave charge—namely, that I had attempted to mislead your Lordships on the important question, whether there did or did not exist an appeal to the Lords Justices. The noble and learned Lord referred to the exact-ments originally creating the appellate jurisdiction, and also to those which transferred that jurisdiction to the Lords Justices, and he then stated, as a proposition of law, that inasmuch as the clauses in the first Act were repealed by the schedule to the present Bill the jurisdiction vested in the Lords Justices by the subsequent Act was also repealed. If that had been the state of the law I should have incorrectly represented the result. In this House we are always in the habit of looking to the occupant of the Wool-sack as pre-eminently the authority to declare to us what the law is. Now, I say that that would not in point of law have been the effect, even if the clauses in the original Act had been repealed. But, as a matter of fact, neither the clauses in the original Act nor those in the subsequent Act are touched by the schedule. I must, therefore, venture, in answer to the reproof which the noble and learned Lord, in not very courteous language addressed to me, to say that he was neither correct in his law, nor accurate in his facts.

Their Lordships' Amendments relating to the Chief Judge were, therefore, adhered to.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, the next class of Amendments referred to the official assignees and the creditors' assignees. With the permission of their Lordships, he would, without detaining them with any further argument, put the next Motion in a similar form to the last.

Then it was moved not to insist on the Amendments relating to Office and Duties of the Official and Creditors' Assignees, to which the Commons have disagreed.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, it was not his intention to divide their Lordships on this point. It was one of eminent importance to the commercial community; but one on which opinion was more divided than any other. Some desired that the official assignee should have absolute con-control over the administration of the bankrupt's estate; others that the creditors' assignee should be allowed a very considerable authority over it. The official assignees were first appointed by the Bill of Lord Brougham in 1831; and when originally appointed they were officers of great importance. He believed that for many years their time was principally occupied in making creditors' assignees refund the money they had received. He believed that the official assignee would have been popular had it not been that they were paid by a percentage on the value of the estates, and this, of course, was a heavy charge on the assets. The consequence was a desire to give the creditors' assignees increased powers. He had given much consideration to this matter; and he had come to the conclusion that it was desirable, as much as possible, to facilitate arrangements out of Court. That was done by this Bill. But when parties were brought into the Bankrupt Court he thought it necessary there should be some controlling authority. There was a strong opinion in the mercantile world in favour of the creditors' assignee; and the Bill was originally framed according to that view. At present when a person was declared bankrupt, the whole of the estate vested in the official assignee, who at once commenced the collection of the assets. That duty, he believed, the official assignees had discharged most faithfully. But by the Bill it was proposed to take away a considerable part of the duty they had to perform, and to give the creditors' assignees more power than they possessed at present. The mode resorted to was this—when a creditors' assignee was appointed the estate originally vested in the official assignee became vested in the creditors' and the official assignee jointly. It was now proposed that the estate vested in the official assignee at the time of the declaration of bankruptcy, when the creditors' assignee is appointed shall become vested in the creditors' assignee solely. There would be considerable inconvenience in this bandying about of the bankrupt estate, and some of the clauses, he thought, could not possibly work. As to the provision that the creditors' assignee, when appointed, should "forthwith" make a return of the debts and assets of the estate, to make a balance-sheet of a large concern might require weeks, or even months; and to enable the assignee to begin to collect the debts at the same time it would be necessary to have two sets of books, one for the creditors, the other for the official assignee. This was impossible. He thought the official assignee should be the principal administrator of the bankrupt's estate; but opinion was divided on the point, and he did not think the question was so completely settled as to justify them in resisting the desire of the House of Commons by insisting on their own Amendments.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he thought their Lordships would agree with him that the most prudent course in reference to a Bill relating to the interests of the public, would be to leave the question to the decision of the trading community itself. The official assignee was introduced into the administration of the bankrupt law in order to secure the proper realization and distribution of the assets. That remedy, however, went beyond what was necessary. The proper function of the official assignee, in his opinion, was to act as an auditor and check on the creditors' assignee's accounts. As to the appellate jurisdiction, by the 75th Clause it was provided that if no appeal were presented within twenty-eight days from the date of the decision of the Court, such decision or order should be considered to be final; but the clause regarding appeal depended upon the enactment in Clause 244, which declared that all Acts, or parts of Acts, inconsistent with the above provision should be repealed.

LORD CRANWORTH: I am at issue with my noble and learned Friend, and say that the existing appeal is not repealed by those clauses.

On Question, Whether to insist?

Resolved in the Negative.

LORD CHELMSFORD said, that the 118th Clause of the original Bill gave a discretion to a majority of the creditors as to whether anything or nothing should be allowed to the bankrupt out of his estate until he passed his last examination. This power their Lordships had amended, giving this power to the Court. The Commons, however, had rejected their Lordships' Amendment. He thought it would be unfair to leave the bankrupt so completely at the mercy of his creditors, who might be influenced by angry feelings towards him, to deprive him of the smallest means of support.

EARL GRANVILLE said, the property belonged to the creditors, and not to the bankrupt. It was, therefore, only fair that they should have the option in this matter.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought that this matter were better left to the creditors.

Then it was moved not to insist on the remaining Amendments to which the Commons have disagreed.

LORD KINGSDOWN said, there was one Amendment on which he thought their Lordships should insist. One of the effects of this Bill was to abolish the distinction which had hitherto existed between traders and non-traders. He did not want to go into a discussion on the propriety of establishing such a principle as that, but he wished to direct their Lordships' attention to what might occur if the clause stood as it had left the Commons. In abolishing this distinction their Lordships had introduced a qualification which he thought a very just one. Immediately on the declaration of bankruptcy, the whole estate of the bankrupt was to be sold. Their Lordships' Amendment provided that the reversionary interests of the son of a tenant for life should not be sold without the consent of the Judge. It was evident that the greatest hardship would be worked by a strict application of the rule. The value of such a reversion had been valued by actuaries at no more than two and a half years' purchase.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, these interests were at present saleable in the Insolvent Court. But he was willing to agree, if it would meet the objection of his noble and learned Friend, that the sale of the reversionary interest ought not to take place without the consent of the Judge.

THE EARL OF DERBY saw no objection to the proposed modification, but doubted whether it was competent to their Lordships to amend a clause which they had already sent down to the House of Commons, and which was objected to by them.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought that the provisions of the Bill would be found to be sufficient as they stood.

LORD WENSLEYDALE objected to the clause permitting the employment of a shorthand writer.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR thought that the employment of a shorthand writer would in many cases be found both convenient and economical. Shorthand writers were employed when their Lordships were sitting on judicial business, and without their assistance cross-examination would be difficult—almost impossible.

On Question, Whether to insist? Resolved in the Negative.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR informed their Lordships that the Bill had come from the House of Commons with some additional Amendments which had been made by that House. Those Amendments were all of them, he thought, either verbal or in harmony with the Amendments which had been made by their Lordships.

Then it was moved to agree to the additional Amendments made by the Commons.

Motion agreed to.

THE EARL OF DERBY believed that, according to the forms of the House, it was necessary that a Committee should be appointed to prepare a statement of the Reasons why their Lordships insisted on their Amendments, and moved accordingly.

Motion agreed to.

Committee appointed to prepare Reasons to be offered to the Commons for the Lords insisting on certain of their Amendments to the said Bill to which the Commons disagree; the Committee to meet on Monday next, at half-past Four o'clock.

PAROCHIAL AND BURGH SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order of the Day for the House to be put into a Committee, read.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL begged to repeat what he stated on the last occasion, that the Bill was a compromise, and if either of the two Amendments which had been suggested were agreed to, he should feel himself compelled to abandon it altogether. The salaries of schoolmasters in Scotland were notoriously insufficient, and there was no provision for their retirement. There was a nominal discipline, but the powers of the authorities were practically nugatory. On the whole he admitted that the education of the country had been tolerably satisfactory; but it was impossible to shut one's eyes to the changed circumstances of the times. The amount of religious division had unhappily become such that it was impossible to procure the assent of the other House to the alterations which were required, unless the schools gave up something of their exclusive character. The compromise which had been agreed upon was to abolish the exclusive test, but to retain a declaration which was in conformity with the opinions of all the Presbyterian bodies in Scotland. His noble Friend (the Earl of Minto) said that this was only giving up one test for the sake of substituting another. Formerly, the test consisted in signing the Confession of Faith, which contained articles on the subject of civil government; whereas the Shorter Catechism which was to be substituted for it was a purely religious document. His noble Friend seemed to argue that if they had a test at all, the more absurd it was made the better, and on that ground he preferred the old test to the new one. Perhaps that was the meaning of his noble Friend; but he felt certain that their Lordships would prefer a test that was as moderate and reasonable as possible. What was now proposed was merely that the schoolmaster should sign a declaration that he was willing to give moral and religious education in conformity with the Shorter Catechism, a document which was received by almost every ecclesiastical body in Scotland except the Roman Catholics and the Episcopalians. The measure was generally approved by the heritors, on whom the increased taxation would fall. It must be recollected that an extensive system of schools in connection with the Privy Council had sprung up; and as these were in many cases better than the national schools, they were running them very hard, and, in some cases, beating them on their own ground; but he appealed to their Lordships to pass a Bill which would tend to put a stop to a rivalry so wasteful and so absurd.

Moved, That the House do now resolve itself into a Committee on the said Bill.

LORD KINNAIRD should like to know how the compromise referred to by the noble Duke had been brought about. The truth was, Members of the other House had been threatened with a more stringent measure unless they agreed to the present. He denied also the noble Duke's assertion that the heritors were in favour of the measure. It was said that the House of Commons would not agree to any Bill which did not destroy the Church of Scotland. But they had never been tried. His own opinion was that the present Government with the aid of the party opposite could carry a very different measure. He (Lord Kinnaird) was not a member of the Church of Scotland, but of the Church of England; and he thought that members of the latter body ought not to stand by and see an attempt like the present made upon a sister Establishment.

THE EARL OF MINTO moved an Amendment, to leave out from ("the") to the end of the Motion, and insert ("shorter catechism, referred to in the Bill, be laid upon the Table of the House.")

EARL GRANVILLE hoped the Amendment would not be pressed, as it might endanger the progress of the measure.

On Question, Resolved in the Negative.

Then the Original Motion was agreed to. House in Committee accordingly.

Clauses 1 to 11 agreed to.

Clause 12 (Parochial Schoolmasters not to be required to sign Confessions of Faith or Formula, but to make a Declaration and to undertake to conform to the Shorter Catechism),

THE EARL OF MINTO moved to omit the new Declaration.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL opposed the Amendment; and, after some discussion, Amendment negatived.

On Question, Whether the said Clause shall stand Part of the Bill? Their Lordships divided:—Contents 37; Not-Contents 28: Majority 9.

Resolved in the Affirmative.

Report of the Amendments to be received on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter past

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Friday, July 26, 1861.

MINUTES.] NEW WRIT ISSUED.—For Tamworth, v. the Right hon. Sir Robert Peel, baronet, Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland.

PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Metropolitan Police District Receiver; East India Loan (No. 2).

3° Lace Factories; Inland Revenue; Stamp Duties on Probates, &c.; Public Works (Ireland).

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

Order for Committee (Supply) read.

House in Committee.

Mr. MASSEY in the Chair.

(In the Committee.)

(1.) £669,956, to complete the sum for the Packet Service.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, the Vote was certainly less than it was on the preceding year, but still it was an enormous tax on the people of the country, and he wished to know whether there was any prospect of it being reduced. The traffic between England and America had increased so largely that he believed companies would be willing to carry the mails without any subsidy, and he wished to know what the Government intended to do to give effect to the recommendations of the Committee who had sat on this subject.

MR. PEEL said, the Vote was less this year than last, on account of the contributions which had been received from the colonies. Part of the expense of the conveyance of the mails from Ceylon to Sydney was to be contributed by the colonies; and the colony of Mauritius had decided to bear the whole of the expense for carrying the mails from Suez to Mauritius. No doubt the recommendations of the Committee were entitled to the best consideration of the Government. But the sum then asked for was in respect of contracts concluded with companies. As they terminated, arrangements would be made for giving effect to the Report of the Committee.

MR. W. WILLIAMS reminded the House that the American Government had their mails carried by private packets without any expense. He wished to know what had become of the Estimate for the Galway contract.

MR. PEEL said, the arrangement made by the American Government was that the packets carrying the American mails should receive the postage due upon those mails. The Galway contract having been terminated by the Postmaster General, no provision for that contract was any longer called for, but, should it be decided to re-establish a postal service between the west coast of Ireland and America, it would be for the Government to propose a Vote for that purpose.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he did not understand that the Galway contract was at an end. His hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. Gregory) was about to put a question on the subject of intercourse between Ireland and America that evening, to which he hoped the noble Viscount the Prime Minister would give a favourable answer.

MR. PEEL said, that he did not mean to say that a new service might not be established.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £1,000,000, China War.

Sir Henry Willoughby

MR. PEEL said, that the Vote was a Vote of Credit for necessary expenses connected with the China War. The Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated to the House that he would propose this Vote, and they would recollect that provision was made for it in the service of the year, which provision had received the sanction of the House. There had been in all three Votes of Credit for the China War, the first of £850,000 in 1859-60, the second of £3,350,000 for 1860-1, and the present Vote. With respect to the Vote of 1859-60, half a million was for the army, and a quarter of a million for the navy; but it was found that the ordinary provision made for the navy was sufficient for all naval purposes, and so the quarter of a million remained in the Exchequer. The army expenditure had exceeded the grants for the year, and, therefore, a further sum of £105,000 was issued, leaving therefore the available surplus on the Vote of a quarter of a million. With regard to the Vote last year half a million was issued to the navy and £350,000 to the army, and there had been a further issue for commissariat services in China of £1,083,000, and to the Indian Government of £1,146,000. The balance in the Exchequer, however, could only be used for expenses incurred during the year for which it was voted. The sum of £1,000,000 was, therefore, asked to meet the expenditure of the forces in China for the present year. Extra allowances were required for the European troops, and, as it was doubtful how long they might require to remain there the present Vote became necessary. The claims from the Indian Government amounted to £1,327,000 up to the 1st of May last, and they had issued to that Government on account a sum of £114,000 out of the Vote of Credit under consideration, leaving a balance due to that Government of £170,000. In case it should prove possible to return the Native troops to India, the extra allowances to European troops would cease, and the necessity for the extra expenditure would be superseded. At the same time, it was necessary to make this provision; which, however, by no means indicated that an extra expenditure to that amount would be incurred.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he felt some doubts as to whether the £1,000,000 which the Committee were asked to vote on account of the China War, was the last call that would be made upon them. He did not clearly understand from the right hon.

Gentleman what was the balance in hand on the Vote of Credit. Out of the early Vote of Credit taken for the China War payments were made for stores which were sent out to China as far back as 1848, and he should like to have explained upon what principle any portion of a Vote of Credit taken for the China War could be applied to the payment of stores sent out previous to the war. Nearly six millions of money had been taken in the shape of Votes and Credit for the China War, in addition to the ordinary expenses paid out of the money taken for the ordinary army and naval services. Could the right hon. Gentleman give the Committee an assurance that the £1,000,000 he now asked for would cover the entire expenditure on account of China? Until the accounts were squared and the final payments were made they could not be satisfied. He should like to know whether the expense incurred for the transport of troops to China by the Indian Government had been sent into the Treasury or not. He was informed that a single item of expense amounted to nearly £350,000 for conveying troops from India to China. He would also express a hope that better arrangements would be made with regard to our accounts with India, otherwise British finance would fall into the utmost disorder. For seven years there had been a sort of running account with India, and no one knew what would be the end of it. He was afraid they were going on very much in the dark in this matter. As long as there were old and unadjusted accounts for years they could have no notion in that House how the British finances really stood. As long as those accounts were outstanding it was ridiculous to talk of a surplus, or raise questions respecting the repeal of taxes.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must admit that the China war had been a very costly War; but, on the other hand, the sufficiency of the provision had brought the war to the more speedy termination. There was a balance in hand from the late Votes of Credit to the extent of £750,000; but he doubted whether that sum could be spent in operations undertaken after the Vote itself was granted, and hence the present application for the present sum. As to the charge for transport, it might be true that such a charge had been sent home to the Indian Office, but it did not follow that we had that sum to pay. As one instance of the vagueness of the Indian Estimates, he might mention that the Indian Government had sent home charges for operations which had already been settled at home by the Admiralty through a different channel. The charges for China during the present year would be chiefly under two heads—for the charge for transport and the charge for extra pay and allowances to the troops, which must be paid to the whole army as long as any portion of the Indian army remained there. He hoped, however, that would not be long if the instructions sent from home were strictly followed out. He did not think that the state of our account with India was likely to prove very formidable to British finance. He knew that two or three months ago the balance was rather in favour of England; if any charge had taken place since, it was amply covered by the Vote before the Committee. He could not say that this was the whole of the accounts that had come from China, but he did not anticipate any further large sum to be asked from that source.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Am I to understand that we are to save £750,000 out of the last Vote of Credit for 1860-1?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, a great many troops have left China. If they left before the 30th of April the expense of their transport would fall on the £750,000 standing from last year. If they left after that date the expense would fall on the million now granted.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: But the expense will not fall upon both years. If it is taken from the sum of £750,000, then the Vote for this year will be retained?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Certainly. The expense cannot fall on the Vote of both years.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he thought the explanation was satisfactory as far as it went.

COLONEL SYKES said, if they declined to interfere as they were doing in China, between the two parties in that country, there would not be any necessity to keep so many troops in China—which was a great charge on the British taxpayers.

MR. GREGSON asked in what position the claims of the merchants in China stood, and what portion of the Vote the Government intended to appropriate to that purpose? Or were other arrangements in view for an immediate or speedy settlement of these claims?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that no part of the Vote could be applied to the payment of the claims of the merchants. He had received the papers respecting those claims, and as soon as the pressure of business would permit, he hoped to be able, with his noble Friend the Foreign Secretary, to look into these claims. The subject was a very important one, and one in which the Government should do all they could to meet the reasonable demands of the merchants, consistently with the fair claims of the public.

SIR LAWRENCE PALK asked whether the million then asked for was in addition to the balance on the former Votes of £750,000?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was difficult in military operations to apportion the sums voted in different years very accurately. If the balance of the Vote of Credit of £750,000 for last year was not expended, the sum would lapse entirely, and remain only in figures. But to meet all contingencies that might arise a million was asked for the year 1861-2.

Vote agreed to.

(3.) £53,430 15s. 10d., War with Russia (Excess of Expenditure).

MR. PEEL explained that the Vote was asked on account of part of a sum of £115,000, arising out of claims and counter claims between the French and English Governments. The amount had been included in a Vote of Credit granted in 1858-9, but that Vote of Credit was surrendered, and the Vote was now necessary, in order that the sum might be transferred to the charge against the Vote of Credit. It involved a reduction of the excess of expenditure for the Russian War. He believed this would be the last of the Votes for the Russian War.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to ask, whether the right hon. Gentleman was quite sure that the Vote would cover the whole outstanding amount for the Russian War?

MR. PEEL: Yes.

Vote agreed to.

(4.) £17,933 11s. 10d., Revenue Departments (Excess of Expenditure).

MR. PEEL said, the sum was asked for the payment of those pensions which had been granted in consequence of the reduction of the establishments. There had been a saving on the effective establishment of £78,000, which had been returned to the Exchequer.

Mr. Gregson

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that he believed the Chancellor of the Exchequer in his financial statement had anticipated a saving in these departments of £150,000. It seemed that the whole saving was only £78,000. He wished to know if that £17,983 was to be deducted from the £78,000.

MR. PEEL said, that the saving of £78,000 only represented that which had taken place in the year after the changes were made. There was no doubt the saving in the end would be as large as had been anticipated.

Vote agreed to.

(5.) £1,000, Poonah Observatory.

MR. AUGUSTUS SMITH asked, why the sum asked for was not charged to the Revenues of India?

MR. PEEL said, the Vote was in consequence of a liberal offer made by a scientific gentleman at Madras to erect a telescope at Poonah, and make observations free of charge, if the Government would send out the instrument.

MR. HENLEY said, he hoped the Vote would not be considered as laying the foundation for further such charges, either at Poonah or anywhere else.

Vote agreed to.

(6.) £60,692, New Westminster Bridge.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he hoped some explanation would be given of this Vote by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Commissioner of Works. There had been great mismanagement in the arrangements for constructing Westminster Bridge, and much time and money had been mispent. Mr. Page told them that the work would be completed for £206,000. He wished to know why they were now called upon to pay the sum of £60,000?

MR. COWPER said, the expense and loss of time incurred in the construction of Westminster Bridge were, to a considerable extent, to be traced to the fact that the bridge had been the subject of three Committees of the House of Commons. If there was any opprobrium connected with the construction of the bridge it was to be attributed not solely to the Office of Works, but must be shared by a Select Committee of that House. He believed that if the bridge had been left to the sole responsibility of the Office of Works, it would have been completed long ago, and within the sum originally stated. When the bankruptcy of the contractor caused a suspension of operations, a question as to the soundness of the plan of the foundations was referred to a Committee which reported in favour of a new mode of construction, superseding the use of coffer dams. In 1857 another Committee was appointed, and it was to that Committee he attributed the want of control on the part of the Office of Works over the expenditure and construction of the bridge. That Committee recommended that the works should be proceeded with by day work as recommended by Mr. Page and under his superintendence. The consequence was that the chief part of the works were being constructed without a contract. He knew of no security for the completion of a great work for an agreed sum, except a contract in gross. But in this instance the engineer was substituted for a contractor, and there was little control of the works at the bridge. The estimate made by Mr. Page was made in 1858, and the explanation of the additional Vote asked for was that the removal of the old bridge cost more than Mr. Page anticipated. It was a very difficult and complicated work to remove piers under water, and it was not easy to foresee the exact expense. Then the very mode of construction, which was so ingenious in its conception, led to an increase in the expenditure. A great deal of the expense had been caused by keeping open the old bridge during the construction of the first part of the new. A portion of the money voted would be met by credits from the old bridge, for it was anticipated that about £23,000 would be realized by the sale of stone, plant, &c. He must say that the only two works in which a great excess of expenditure had occurred were the Westminster Bridge and the Houses of Parliament; and those were the very works in which the Office of Works had not been entrusted with the entire management, but where a great deal of the details had been carried out by direction of Committees of that House.

MR. HENLEY said, the right hon. Gentleman had, no doubt unintentionally, entirely misrepresented the facts of the case with reference to Westminster Bridge. The right hon. Gentleman had mixed up the consideration of two things totally distinct from each other—the building of the new Houses of Parliament and Westminster Bridge. The two things were as different as chalk from cheese. The right hon. Gentleman laid down the broad proposition that all the mischief connected with the erection of Westminster Bridge had been caused by a Committee of that House, and not by the Office of Works. It was when Sir William Molesworth was at the Board of Works that the works at the bridge commenced. The new principle of bridge-building was provided for in the first instance in a contract entered into by the Office of Works, and the right hon. Gentleman had no right to allege that the House of Commons had anything to do with it. On the failure of the contractor the Commissioner of Works came to the House and asked for a Committee to relieve himself of the responsibility of making the changes which he wished to introduce. That could not with any fairness be called an interference of the House of Commons. He (Mr. Henley) was chairman of that Committee, and they had before them all the engineering talent and experience of the day. The Office of Works had already decided that half the bridge was to be built at one time, and the other half at another; but the Commissioner of Works had doubted if the old system of coffer dams should not be resorted to. The Committee recommended that the bridge should be proceeded with on the system then in operation, and it was then open to the Commissioner to enter into a contract if he so chose. On that point the Committee gave no opinion. In the following year another Committee was appointed. It was then decided that that half of the bridge which had been already begun should be completed under the engineer's direction, and not by contract. There was nothing, however, to prevent the Board of Works from contracting for the other half, and the blame, therefore, rested upon that department. As to the new principle upon which the bridge was constructed, there had, so far, been no symptom of giving way. He admitted that it was a great experiment to build a bridge over such a river without coffer dams, to build it in halves and then bring those two halves together; but if such works could be carried on they would be completed at an infinitely less expense than under the old system. Though there was an excess of £60,000, he believed that the bridge, when completed, would compare advantageously as to cost with Waterloo Bridge and similar structures.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY explained that the way in which Lord Llanover intended to carry out the building of the second part of the bridge was by calling regularly for the accounts from Mr. Page, and ex-

SIR JAMES GRAHAM asked whether, in the absence of a contract, Mr. Page was to be paid by commission, and if so, whether he was to have a percentage upon the excess expenditure of £60,000?

MR. COWPER said, that Mr. Page was paid by commission. The Board of Works, however, maintained that that commission was to be upon the estimate, and not upon the excess; while Mr. Page contended that he was entitled to a percentage on the £60,000. The point was not yet decided. On the general question he must not be understood as wishing to blame the House of Commons, but he still thought that the injudicious principle of employing the engineer without a contractor to construct the bridge originated with the Committee. It was true that their recommendations applied only to the first half, but he assumed that his noble Friend (Lord Llanover) who was then Commissioner, and was a member of the Committee, was influenced by the opinion of the Committee to entrust Mr. Page with the construction of the second half without the limit to expenditure which a lump contract alone could give. He thought also that he was justified in his reference to the Houses of Parliament, because it resembled the case of the bridge in this respect, that both works were executed without having a contract in gross.

MR. HENLEY said, the Office of Works ought to have ascertained, when the first half of the bridge was completed, whether Mr. Page had kept within the proportion of the Estimate; if not, the office ought to have insisted on a contract.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he had never felt any doubt that they would get into a financial mess in the matter. He did not wonder at the difficulty of meeting with a new contractor after the failure of the first one, on account of the half-finished state of the works. There was a very good estate belonging to Westminster Bridge of the annual value of upwards of £7,000, and worth a capital sum of £171,000. The original estimate of Mr. Mare was £206,248. Mr. Page thought it would be completed for £316,000, and there had been an excess of £60,000. Would £377,828 conclude the matter? The principle of recompensing Mr. Page by a commission was a most vicious one, and was the old case of Sir Charles Barry over again.

Sir John Shelley

SIR MORTON PETO said, he could understand why when the contract for the first part failed it should be finished without a contract, but a grievous mistake was made when it was determined to complete the second part of the bridge by day work, for that was what it ought to be called. The proper course would have been to have instructed Mr. Page to obtain contracts from houses of solidity, to get him to report upon those contracts, and if Mr. Page would have undertaken to complete the bridge at a less cost it would be for the Chief Commissioner to say whether he would have accepted Mr. Page's offer. The Chief Commissioner could not say that the £60,000 asked for would be the last sum that would be required, nor did he (Sir Morton Peto) believe that Mr. Page himself had any conception of it. He did not throw any blame on Mr. Page; his character stood high, and his works were all favourably executed, and he believed the bridge would be after all more cheaply finished than other bridges of similar extent. But the fault, if fault there were, lay with the Office of Works, and the right hon. Gentleman must not throw it on the House.

MR. T. J. MILLER remarked that some of the hon. Gentlemen who had spoken were members of the Committee, and it was to them a matter of notoriety that a portion of the bridge was to be erected without a contract; and it would be more just to the Commissioner of Works if they had gone to the House and given warning before the harm was done, instead of complaining of it on the present occasion. He wanted to know whether anything was likely to be recovered from the sureties of Messrs. Mare. As to the bridge itself, he believed it would be the finest ever erected. They were indebted to the Committees that had been so much blamed for obtaining a bridge double the width of the other bridges on the Thames, and at two-thirds of the ordinary expense of stone bridges.

MR. COWPER said, it had been found impossible to recover any money from the assignees of Mr. Mare. As to the future expense he could only say that the estimate before the Committee was the estimate prepared by Mr. Page. Application had been made to a great contractor to contract for the completion of the remaining half of the bridge; but he had very fairly stated that in the present advanced stage of the work it would be cheaper to finish the work as it had been begun.

MR. SPOONER remarked that the right hon. Gentleman had mistaken the question addressed to him by the hon. Member (Mr. Miller). That hon. Member did not speak of the assignees of the original contractor but of his sureties, and he (Mr. Spooner) now begged to ask if any amount had been recovered from the sureties of the original contractor. He (Mr. Spooner) also wished to know if anything was left of the Westminster Bridge Estate?

MR. COWPER said, he meant to say that it was found impossible to recover from the sureties as well as from the assignees the money they were entitled to demand. The estate was valued at £111,000. It consisted of the north side of Bridge Street, and other houses. The site would much increase in value when the houses on the south side were removed, and if not required for public buildings it would be disposed of by the Government when it reached its full value.

MR. VANCE said, he did not grudge the expenditure on Westminster Bridge, which was a great metropolitan improvement; but he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the people of Dublin had suffered for a long time from the want of a new bridge, in place of that which was called after an ancestor of the present Lord Lieutenant.

Vote agreed to.

SUPPLY—NAVY ESTIMATES.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £250,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the expense of Building Iron Ships by Contract, and of the Plating and Engines for five Wooden Ships, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1862."

LORD CLARENCE PAGET: I am anxious to afford the Committee some explanation of the Vote which I have now to propose of £250,000 in addition to the ordinary Estimates. It will be remembered that we have had various discussions respecting this most important subject. Since we framed our Estimates of iron-cased ships in December last other nations have very largely added to their iron-clad navy. It was consequently my duty in May last to state that the Government had resolved upon building five more wooden iron-cased ships in our dockyards; but that that of itself could entail no increase on the ordinary Estimates of the year beyond expense of plating and partly providing engines for these wooden ships, but that it would probably be necessary that still further exertion should be made in order to keep pace with foreign Powers. Sir, this Estimate has reference to three distinct items. First, it is proposed to commence the construction of more iron-cased ships by contract. That item amounts to £120,000. The second item is for the plating required for the five wooden ships which I have already mentioned; and, thirdly, we ask for an additional sum towards the expenses of engines for those wooden ships. As to the proposed iron-cased ships, I trust that the intention of the Government to ask for an additional grant for this purpose will create no alarm, because we merely propose now to do, under the sanction of Parliament, that which we have actually been doing during the last three years in the recess without the sanction of Parliament. The Committee will remember that the late Government proposed to build two iron-cased ships of the Warrior class. One of those ships was ordered by them just before they left office, and the other by the present Government. In the autumn of that year (1859) we learnt that other nations were making great progress in the construction of these ships, and the Admiralty thought it their duty, without waiting for the sanction of Parliament, to ask the consent of the Treasury to the immediate commencement of two more iron-cased ships. That made two of the Warrior class in course of construction and two of the Defence class, the latter being of considerably smaller dimensions. These four vessels are now nearly ready, and we trust that the Warrior will be at sea in a very short period. In the course of the next autumn, 1860, the Government again received communications as to the progress made by foreign nations, and thought it was incumbent on them a second time, without Parliamentary sanction, to commence the construction of two more of these vessels, larger than the Defence, but smaller than the Warrior. These vessels will be ready in the course of the next year, and make six in progress. During the present year the Government have commenced the construction of a ship of the Warrior class at Chatham, making the seventh iron-cased ship, and in May last I also announced to the House, as I have just stated, that it was the intention of the Government to make use of the wooden frames of line-of-battle ships under construction which would enable us to construct five wooden iron-cased ships in the dockyards. That makes a total of twelve which are now in course of construction in the dockyards, or being built by contract. My right hon. Friend opposite (Sir John Pakington) about the latter end of May, called attention to the great increase which was taking place in the construction of iron-cased ships by France, and quoted statements made by a gallant Admiral, who had visited the French dockyards, and had reported that ten new iron-cased ships were being built over and above those already completed. In answer to my right hon. Friend, I stated that the Government were perfectly aware of what was going on not only in France, but in various Continental dockyards, and were carrying out a series of experiments under the control of a Committee, composed of very able men, with a view to ascertain what is the best form of construction. I, also, stated that as soon as we had arrived at some sort of conclusion the Government would, if necessary, state what they thought was requisite for the public service. These experiments have made very considerable progress, and, though I am unable to state that any definite conclusions are arrived at as to the nature, the thickness, and the exact style of casing, we have, nevertheless, decided, first, that it is advisable to have very large ships, carrying great weight; secondly, that under these circumstances it is desirable that those ships should be built of iron; and, thirdly, that, as we have very great facilities in the merchant yards throughout this country these ships should be built by contract. I am, therefore, going to invite the Committee to place confidence in the Government, and authorize us to commence the construction of a certain number of these vessels by contract during the recess when we have prepared the drawings, and have come to a definite conclusion as to size, armament, and various other particulars. The item of £120,000 will enable us either to commence six ships, and thus provide for one-tenth of the cost of six ships, or, if it is thought more advisable, to make greater progress with a fewer number, in which case we shall have provided during the present year one-fifth of the cost of three ships. What I ask the Committee is, to leave it to the discretion of the Government either to commence the whole number of six ships and proceed at a very slow rate, or commence the construction of a smaller number, making greater progress with them. The course which may be taken by the Government will depend upon a variety of circumstances, and I am prepared at the present moment to say which plan would be the more advisable. Of course, much must depend upon the progress which other nations are making in building iron-cased ships. I have before me a list which I can read to the Committee if they wish, showing the number of iron-cased ships building by Continental nations, and that number is increasing very rapidly. It is the duty of the Government of this country that we should keep pace with such efforts, and, therefore, the proposal I have to make is that we should be empowered to commence by contract during the present autumn not more than six of these ships, leaving us either to make a greater progress with a smaller number, or to proceed very slowly with the whole six. Supposing we commence the whole six, we should then have under construction eighteen iron-cased ships; and these vessels, as far as we are at present advised, will be certainly not less in tonnage and armament than the Warrior class. A good deal must depend upon the trials which will be made of that vessel. I need not say that great care will be taken by the Admiralty to watch the performance of the Warrior, and I have great confidence that she will turn out a very fine and formidable vessel. I have stated what is the proposed expenditure during the present year, and I will now state what will be the ultimate expenditure upon all iron-cased ships. The Committee will then see that, however necessary they may be, these vessels are very costly. If the Government are empowered to commence six more iron-cased ships, you will have, of course, a further expenditure to complete them during future years. This expenditure may be spread over several years, and, indeed, it is only proposed to make such progress during the present year as will enable the Government to profit by the result of the experiments which are going on daily at Shoeburyness, and to modify, if necessary, the present system of iron-casing whether by a smaller backing of wood and thicker plates or by doing away with wooden backing altogether and devoting the weight to iron-casing, or to take advantage of these experiments in other ways. Our progress with these vessels during the present year will not be so great but that we shall be able to introduce any modifications which may be thought desirable after the experiments are concluded. Including the sum which is required this year, and including also the plating for the five wooden ships, and a sum which will about complete the expense of engines for the wooden ships, the total cost of these vessels will be £2,340,810, leaving to be provided during future years the sum of £2,090,810 as near as we can at present calculate. We have taken a large sum as the Committee is aware in the present year's Estimates for the other iron-cased ships, and over and above that outlay there will be required for those ships in future years the sum of £114,441, so that the whole cost to the country for iron-cased vessels, beyond the present year's Estimates, may be estimated at £2,455,251. That includes the casing of the wooden ships which are building in the dockyards, but exclusive of the workmanship on the iron ship Achilles, which is building at Chatham dockyard; and, supposing the Committee assent to the present proposal, this is the sum for which they will render the country liable in future years. Before sitting down I cannot help saying a few words respecting the alarm which may be created among the mercantile community in consequence of the additional force which we are about to create. It is no use denying that the whole world is commencing the construction of these ships. Every maritime nation has completely given up the thought of building wooden line-of-battle ships, and, I think, therefore, that the proposal which I have just submitted to the Committee is not of a nature to excite alarm throughout the country, but rather to engender a proper confidence, that we are determined to maintain our maritime position in its integrity.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought that the discussion ought not to go on. The notice of Supply was only given at two o'clock that morning, and there was not the least intimation in the paper that the sum of £250,000 would involve so large an ultimate expenditure as £2,500,000. So important a Vote ought not to be proposed in so thin a House, and he would, therefore, suggest its postponement till the evening sitting.

LORD HARRY VANE said, he quite agreed that the House could not have anticipated the precise proposition that had been made; but at the same time no great delay should be interposed at that period of the Session. He admitted, however, that it was desirable to postpone until the evening the consideration of the Vote. He thought that the noble Lord had rather exaggerated the possibility of alarm among the mercantile classes from the proposal which he had just made. On the contrary, the proposal would rather appease than excite alarm. The public well knew what was going on in different parts of the world, and especially in a neighbouring country. It would be ridiculous affectation on the part of the House to ignore that, and they would be neglecting their duty if they did not make provision for such a state of things. He thought it absolutely necessary to confide certain powers to the Executive in such cases, but doubted whether what was proposed ought not to be finished out of hand as soon as possible instead of delaying for so long a period that reconstruction of the navy which was so imperatively required.

SIR MORTON PETO said, he regretted that a proposal of such importance should have been left to so late a period of the Session. The Committee would remember the earnest endeavours made by his hon. Friend (Mr. Lindsay) to prevent further expenditure in the construction of wooden ships, and it was satisfactory to find the noble Lord admitting now that the navy must be reconstructed as an iron navy. He could assure the noble Lord that there would be no alarm among mercantile men at the proposition, but only a feeling of deep regret that the French Government had been allowed to take so far-seeing and practical a view as to the necessity for iron-cased ships, while Her Majesty's Government had fallen so far behind. It had been stated, without contradiction, that since 1858 the French Government had not spent a shilling on a wooden vessel, whereas this country had spent £3,000,000 or £4,000,000. Surely we had gained the same experience as the French Government during the Crimean War, and must have known that wooden ships attacked with the new projectiles would be on fire in a few minutes. For his own part he confessed that, instead of regarding the Emperor of the French as one who was plotting against the peace of Europe, he only looked upon him as the chief of a great nation, who, to secure the efficiency of his navy, was taking a course which our own Government ought to have pursued from the beginning. If Her Majesty's Government had only since 1858 quietly studied this subject, and done that which science and practical experience showed to be necessary, there would have been none of these continuous alarms as to what was being done in France. He repeated that there was nothing alarming in the noble Lord's statement, but it reflected great discredit on the Government that at that late period of the Session, when but comparatively few hon. Members were in London, such a statement should be made. The wisest thing which could be done was that the noble Lord, putting aside all the arts of diplomacy and Foreign Office traditions, should during the recess go to France, and endeavour to come to a clear and distinct understanding with the French Government as to the relative forces of the two countries. He could not understand why there should be any greater difficulty in coming to such an understanding than there was in coming to an agreement with respect to the commercial treaty. On the one hand, the Government were endeavouring to encourage commercial intercourse with France, and yet they neglected precautions by which alone the intercourse could be preserved. From what he knew of the character of the French Emperor and the French people, he believed that so far as they were concerned no difficulty would be experienced in arriving at a satisfactory understanding. He denied that the French Government had in their naval preparations done anything which ought to excite the alarm of this country. They had only fulfilled their duty in acting upon the experience acquired in 1858, and upon their conviction that the fleet of the future must be a fleet of iron. The House of Commons would not refuse any request which our own Government declared to be necessary; but as men of business they hoped that during the recess some means would be taken for preventing all uncertainty and alarm, and for putting an end to the game of "beggar my neighbour." A constant intercourse during the last fourteen or fifteen years with French people of all classes led him to know their feelings, and he believed them to be most anxious to cultivate friendly relations with this country. The friendly speeches at the Mansion House the other day had been responded to most heartily across the Channel, and he had received many letters from French correspondents in this sense. The provincial press of France was full of good feeling, and reproduced at length the speeches of the hon. Members for Rochdale and Birmingham. That good feeling ought to be reciprocated in this country, and the best way of reciprocating it was by the endeavour to promote such an understanding as he had mentioned.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: I must join in the appeals which have been made to the noble Lord not to press this Vote at morning sitting. It has been said that we need not look for a fuller attendance in the House; but at least we may anticipate another state of the Treasury bench. At present the Government is represented by the noble Lord the Secretary to the Admiralty, the Junior Lord of the Admiralty (Mr. Whitbread), and the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Peel). Now, I think such a question ought not to be debated in the absence of the confidential advisers of the Crown. It is impossible to exaggerate the importance of the question under discussion, and I think it especially necessary that the Chancellor of the Exchequer should be present. If I rightly understand the noble Lord, this is to be treated as an extraordinary Vote beyond the ordinary Estimates of the year. A sum of nearly £2,500,000 of capital is expected to be expended on these ships. Now, is this to be included in time of peace in the ordinary Estimates of the year, or is it to be treated as a capital sum beyond the ordinary Estimates? Again, as the noble Lord has deprecated alarm, I cannot help saying that, to use an expression current on the Stock Exchange, the alarm has been already discounted. Whatever alarm has been created resulted from the speech of the noble Lord the Foreign Secretary, when the question of Sardinia was brought forward. It is impossible to separate this question from that of our relations with France and with other countries, and, to use the mildest phrase, I think it altogether unseemly that the Committee should be called upon to pass such a Vote when not one of the confidential advisers of Her Majesty is present, and I am bound to say that the House could not have been aware, until it heard the statement of the noble Lord, that the sum of £250,000, which is now asked for, is only the commencement of an expenditure of £2,500,000 beyond the ordinary expenses for the year. For the sake of decency in our proceedings, I entreat the noble Lord not to press the Vote.

LORD CLARENCE PAGET had no objection to defer the consideration of this Vote till the evening sitting. But he besought the Committee not to run away with the idea that he was suddenly commencing as it were, by stealth, a vast expenditure

[SIR JAMES GRAHAM: £2,500,000.] He had frankly stated the ultimate cost of his proposal, and as long as he held his present office he would never bring forward an estimate without giving to the House a clear explanation, as far as he was enabled to judge, of what would be the ultimate expense to which would pledge itself, supposing that it should agree to the estimate. He, therefore, thought he was rather hardly dealt with when it was said he had taken the Committee by surprise, or had not given fair notice. He could only say that notice was on the paper for two days.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that between 1859–60 and 1860–1 inclusive, the House had voted £1,500,000 for iron-cased ships, and that amount, added to the sum now proposed, would make £4,000,000. He hoped the noble Lord would state on a future occasion how that sum had been expended.

MR. LINDSAY said, that no sufficient reason had been given for the construction of these six vessels, and the only result would be that France would build six more. Then, the chances were that next Session the House would be told that, France having added six ships to her navy, Her Majesty's Government had, during the recess, ordered the construction of twelve additional vessels. Where was that to end? He admitted that the country ought not to be behind France in her naval force, and that if she had twenty we should have thirty such ships; but from what had come under his observation when in France, he believed that the Government of the Emperor was willing to enter into some such arrangement as that indicated by the hon. Baronet the Member for Finsbury (Sir Morton Peto) respecting the relative amount of the forces of the two countries, and if difficulties existed as to any such arrangement, he was afraid that they originated at home.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: Sir, the question before the Committee is rather what we are now to do than where this is to end. The hon. Gentleman says that our naval strength ought to exceed that of France. I was glad to hear such an admission from him, and I hope he will act in that spirit. Sir, I agree in the necessity of postponing the Vote until the House assembles in the evening, but, although the noble Lord's statement has been a surprise to me, I have listened to it with the greatest satisfaction and the warmest approbation, for in submitting this proposal the Government are doing no more than their duty. It is said that ten ships are in progress in France. That statement creates an erroneous impression as to what is going on across the Channel. There is no doubt that at this moment sixteen iron-cased vessels are in progress in France. Moreover, there is no doubt that the French Government are not building them so slowly as my noble Friend seems to contemplate. On the contrary, for some reason or other, the French Government are pressing on the construction of these ships so rapidly as to excite public attention in France, as well as some alarm. I will not enter now into the reasons; I will only dwell on the fact. Meanwhile, what is the position of this country? Until to-day, to set against those sixteen ships, nearly half of which are launched, we only knew that the Government intended to build twelve, of which only seven have been as yet commenced. The Government now propose to build six more, the general result being that when these are begun—and it is doubtful whether that will happen in the present autumn, and whether six or three will be commenced—we shall then only have a prospect of possessing two more of these armour-plated ships than are now actually in progress in France. Under these circumstances I must express my earnest hope that this Vote may not be postponed with any idea of rejecting the proposals made by the Government. These six new ships are to be of the Warrior class, and the right hon. Gentleman (Sir James Graham) seems startled by an ultimate expenditure of £2,500,000. But the cost of the Warrior and Black Prince are well known to the Committee. Multiply that cost by six, and you will have very nearly the amount stated by my noble Friend. I think, therefore, that he deserves credit for his perfect candour to-day. I was struck by the hope expressed by the hon. Members for Finsbury and Sunderland, that we should check this expenditure by entering into some arrangement with France respecting the amount of naval force which the two countries are to maintain. I cannot hear these observations without expressing my strong opinion that any such arrangement is absolutely impossible. In itself, no doubt, it is very specious and plausible, but my firm belief is that if you wanted to lay the foundation of future misunderstandings and quarrels with France you could not adopt a surer course than by entering into such negotiations, and by attempting, as between two powerful nations naturally jealous of each other's influence and power, and in some measure rivals in the exercise of that power, to define in a treaty what should be the number of ships or the relative armaments which they should maintain. Looking to the empire we have to defend, I feel that no such arrangement would be for the interests of England, and that it would be equally dangerous to the future friendship between the two nations. I must also dissent from the opinion expressed that the English Navy hereafter must be an iron navy. That opinion has been frequently expressed in the course of these discussions, and there is a strong tendency in the House to jump to the conclusion—and, as I think, the erroneous conclusion—that, because we have found it necessary to embark in a large expenditure in armour-plated ships, there is necessarily an end to the utility of our wooden vessels. I entertain no such opinion. Considering the extent of our empire, I believe that none of us will live to see the day when our wooden navy will not be most valuable and important to us in all parts of the world, though with a view to possible contingencies in Europe we now find it necessary to embark in this outlay upon an iron navy.

MR. H. A. BRUCE asked, whether in the sum of £2,500,000 was included the cost of completing the five vessels, as well as the construction of the six proposed to be built?

LORD CLARENCE PAGET said, that the total expenditure, as he had stated, would be £2,500,000, which would include the plating required for the wooden ships, the total expenditure of the six iron-cased vessels proposed to be constructed, and, likewise, the completion of the vessels of that class at present building, with their engines, and also the engines for the wooden ships. The new ships would carry ninety guns each, with a tonnage of about 5,000 tons.

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to disclaim all intention of opposing the Vote, and at the same time to admit the propriety and candour with which it had been submitted to the Committee by the noble Lord. As regarded the conduct of France, the Emperor always appeared to have acted very candidly, and to have said, "I have nothing to do with you; you may do what you like; but I shall maintain an efficient navy, and that is the best way of preserving peace between the two countries."

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

House resumed.

Resolutions to be reported To-morrow.

Committee to sit again this day, at Six of the clock.

APPOINTMENT OF INDIAN OFFICERS. QUESTION.

COLONEL SYKES said, he wished to ask the Secretary of State for India, Whether the appointment of Colonel Mollan, C.B., of the 75th Foot, to the command of the 101st Fusiliers (late Bengal 1st Fusiliers), to the prejudice of the claims of local Field Officers of the Bengal Army, has his approval; whether the following appointments in Bengal General Orders of the 20th of May last has his sanction: Brevet Major Gordon, of Her Majesty's 46th Foot, to command the 33d Regiment Native Infantry; Lieutenant Geddes, Her Majesty's 27th Foot, to be Adjutant of the 14th Regiment Native Infantry; Lieutenant A. B. Morgan, Her Majesty's 19th Foot, to be Adjutant of the 42d Regiment Native Infantry; whether those Officers have passed the prescribed tests as Interpreters; whether they are to be seconded in their respective Regiments; and whether those Officers are permanently attached to the Staff Corps?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he had received no account of any one of those appointments, and, therefore, he was not able either to sanction or disapprove of them.

CASE OF THOMAS CARTER.—QUESTION.

MR. HARVEY LEWIS said, he would beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Thomas Carter, who was on Monday, the 15th day of July, brought before Thomas Thorpe Fowke and Le Marchant Thomas, Esqs., at the Ryde Police Court, charged with being a vagrant and sleeping in the open air at Oakfield, and who was committed by those Magistrates to Winchester Gaol for three weeks, and ordered to be kept to hard labour for that period; and, if so, whether he has given, or intends to give, orders for his immediate release.

SIR GEORGE LEWIS: Sir, I do not at this moment hold the seals of the Home Department. I did at the time when a letter was written calling for a report of this case. That letter was written several days ago, and no answer has been received from the magistrates. A letter has been written to-day again calling attention to the subject.

SUPPLY.

On Motion that the House go into Committee of Supply,

SLAVE TRADE.—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. BUXTON said, he rose to call the attention of the Government to the great increase of the Cuban Slave Trade, and the importance of supplementing the exertions of the squadron on the African coast by additional measures for the suppression of that trade. At that period of the Session, and in the then state of the public business, he would not detain the House for many minutes. He was very anxious, however, to submit two or three suggestions to the Government which he believed would be efficacious, if carried out, in greatly diminishing, if not overthrowing, the slave trade. It was no longer matter of question that Africa would afford a boundless amount of cotton if only the slave trade could be put down, so as to enable agriculture and commerce to thrive. Even, therefore, if no higher motives came in, he should feel justified in reverting to that painful subject before the Session closed. The recent accounts of the slave trade were terrible. Too ample proof was afforded by the blue books of the extraordinary activity with which the slave trade was being pushed forward. That lamentable state of things might fill them with discouragement and almost with despair, but the legitimate inference would be that they should reconsider the system on which they were acting, and see whether some further measures could not be adopted which would render their exertions more effectual. The fact was that since the American Government had refused to acknowledge the right of visit the British naval force had been rendered, he would not say useless, because he believed that fourteen slave ships had been captured during the past year, but far less potent than it used to be. He was anxious, therefore, to call the attention of the Government to two or three supplementary measures, which would, he thought, be of great value. One of these was suggested last year by the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs himself, though he believed it had not been acted on. It was that an attempt should be made to supplant the slave trade in Cuba by the introduction, under the most stringent precautions, of a free immigration from China and India. That would require the greatest possible care, and it might be thought that experience as to the abominable traffic in Chinese with Cuba ought at once to condemn the suggestion. But the truth was that recently Her Majesty's Government had made great and, he believed, successful exertions to put a stop to the cruelty with which that coolie immigration had formerly been attended. Our authorities in China, in conjunction with the Chinese authorities, had placed the emigration under strict regulations, and it also appeared that in Cuba the Chinese had asserted their independence, and had enforced considerate treatment for themselves. He trusted that the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) would direct Mr. Crauford, the British Commissioner at Havannah, to make strict inquiries on that point, and if it could be shown that humane treatment and fair wages could effectually be secured for Indian and Chinese emigrants, then, by encouraging such an immigration, they would supplant, not only the slave trade, but in the long run slavery itself in the Island of Cuba. Next, he would urge on the Government that, instead of trusting only to cruisers on the sea, they should take steps to break up the slave trade on the African coast itself. He believed that would do even more than the squadron to harass and injure the slave traders, and it could not bring England into collision with any European Government. Now, by the kind of protectorate which England had established along the Gold Coast, and at Accra, and at Lagos, the slave trade had actually been extinguished along what formerly was its very mart and emporium, and which used in fact to be called the Slave Coast. But there was one exception. At Whydah, a port belonging to that execrable ruffian the King of Dahomey, the slave trade was still most prosperous. By the last accounts several slavers with large cargoes had sailed from Whydah. He could not see why they should not use violent measures to put a stop to it at that point. No courtesy surely need be observed with the King of Dahomey. Well, then, going further south, Portugal possessed great dominions along both the west and east coasts of Africa. Her western coast was formerly rife with the slave trade. When Mr. Gabriel, the English Commissioner at Loanda, first went there he saw eighteen slave vessels in one harbour. Since that the slave trade along the whole of the Portuguese West Coast had been utterly extinguished, and the result had been a great development of commerce, to the value, taking exports and imports together, of half a million a year. How had that come about? In great measure owing to the fact that England had had Consuls and Commissioners on that coast who had brought the influence of England to bear on the Portuguese authorities. Meanwhile, however, on the East Coast no such improvement had taken place. The last blue book showed an immense amount of slave trade from Mozambique and the adjoining districts. Now, surely, it would be only common sense for England to do her very utmost to induce Portugal to put the slave trade down on the East as well as on the West Coast, and nothing in his opinion would do so much towards that end as the appointment of an able and energetic man to the post of Consul at Mozambique. It might be said that no able and energetic man would go there, but a gentleman who stood very high in the opinion of the Government was willing to take the post. There were, he owned, some objections. The climate was unhealthy; the place was detestable. There was also the expense. That, however, would be small, and nothing in proportion to the interests involved. Again, it had been urged that Dr. Livingstone had recently been appointed Consul at Zambesi, but Zambesi was very far to the south, and Dr. Livingstone was always up the country exploring. The main objection, however, made by the Government was this, that a consul would be of no use without a large number of cruisers; but two or three ships of war were always kept on that coast. He thought their being few was an additional reason for giving them as much assistance and information as possible. Were the whole coast watched by cruisers it would be less necessary to have a consul on shore to find out all that was going forward, and the points from which it was likely that slaves would be embarked. The objections, then, were not strong ones. The inducements were very strong. The fact was that the Portuguese Government was well disposed on the subject. It was fain to stop the slave trade, but was too feeble to enforce its views on that far distant coast, where many of their own authorities had excellent reasons for cherishing

the slave trade. Nothing, then, would so much tend to enable the Government of Portugal to carry out their views as the fact that England had a Commissioner there to watch with a keen eye all that went on, and report the proceedings of the slave traders and the action taken by the local authorities. In fact this would be the means of bringing the powerful influence of England to bear, and of pouring light on those dark places of the earth, rendering it infinitely more difficult for these cruelties to go on there. A consul had originally been appointed at Mozambique after full inquiry by Mr. Hume's Committee in 1853, and experience seemed to him (Mr. Buxton) to have shown the value of having such a representative of England on that coast. In urging the reappointment of a consul on the Government he was expressing the views entertained by Lord Brougham, by the Bishop of Oxford, the Anti-Slavery Society, the African Aid Society, and, in fact, nearly every one acquainted with the question of the slave trade. More than this, the same point had been strongly urged by the Economist newspaper, and by others who looked on the matter from a mercantile point of view. There seemed real grounds for believing that English influences exerted on that coast might do much to suppress the slave trade and open a large commerce. He was glad to think that the noble Lord the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs was sure to give the question a candid and careful study, as no man had shown more persevering energy in promoting as far as he possibly could the abolition of the slave trade.

MR. CAVE: — Mr. Speaker, I could have wished that the hon. Member for Maidstone (Mr. Buxton) had been able to bring this question before the House on the day for which he first gave notice, as we might then have had the valuable assistance of the noble Lord the Secretary for Foreign Affairs in discussing it; and I feel bound to take this opportunity of expressing my acknowledgment of the ready attention the noble Lord always gave to the representations I have felt it my duty to make from time to time on this subject. Late, however, as it is in the Session, I cannot think the moment an inopportune one, because the whole question has been advanced, during the last few days, by the publication of a very remarkable and important document. I allude to a letter from the French Emperor to his Minister of Marine, giving notice of the ratification of a treaty with Her Majesty, of which we have as yet heard nothing, but which will, I hope, late as it is, be laid upon the Table of the House before we separate at the conclusion of the Session. As far as we are able to conjecture, from the terms of the letter, this treaty extends and makes permanent the Convention of last year, under the provisions of which the Emperor, who considers the supplying his colonies with labour an Imperial question, is empowered, in return for abandoning the so-called African emigration, to compete in the labour market of Calcutta, backed by all the resources of France, with our colonists, who have only their own private and most scanty means to rely upon; and with such vigour have these resources been applied, that I have just learned that no less than twenty-seven ships have sailed from Calcutta with coolies for the French colony of Réunion, while only twenty-two have gone to the whole British West Indies collectively. I will not trouble the House again with my objections to the principle of this measure: I have already fully stated them, and they have since been strengthened by the occurrence of one of the evils I anticipated. We find in a recent minute of the Governor of Mauritius complaints that a large number of coolies had been shipped by French agents in Calcutta for Réunion, under the pretext of taking them to Mauritius.

I cannot help thinking, however, that the letter itself is highly unsatisfactory. The Emperor has some doubts about the African emigration. He thinks it may possibly be open to abuse; he therefore determines to put an end to it. But when? Immediately? No, at the close of another year. It may, indeed, be said that it would be impossible to terminate these arrangements at once; and this argument would be very forcible, were it not for a letter which I have here from the same Imperial writer to his cousin, Prince Napoleon, dated as long ago as 1858, couched in similar terms, breathing the same doubts, and expressing the same determinations: and so general was the belief in England, at that time, that the Emperor had become convinced of what all the world know long before, that this immigration was the slave trade in disguise, and was resolved immediately to put an end to it, that an hon. Member, now a Member of the other House of Parliament (Lord Stratheden), proposed a Resolution in 1859, conveying the thanks of the House to the Emperor for his zeal and sincerity—a Motion which was seconded by my hon. Friend who has revived this subject to-night, but which, from some information of an opposite tendency which I had received, I felt bound to oppose.

Has it taken His Imperial Majesty all this time to make up his mind? or is it not rather to the opposition of Portugal that we owe the discontinuance of this French slave trade on the east coast of Africa, if it be indeed discontinued? Perhaps a consul at Mozambique might tell us a different tale. However this may be, we were certainly led to expect, and we had a good right to expect, that the moment French recruiting agents were allowed to set foot in British India they would cease to be employed on every part of the African continent. But it appears that a much harder bargain was driven by the Emperor: that the Convention under which the Queen's subjects are now, as we learn, being carried in such large numbers to Réunion, was to be paid for by abandoning the slave trade on the east coast alone; and that this wider and more advantageous treaty was necessary to induce its cessation on the west coast also. But the fact is we give up everything and get nothing. The Emperor knows that the African immigration is the slave trade, and cannot be defended. He knows this, or he would not go all the way to India for a more distant, a more expensive, and less efficient class of labourers. If it be the slave trade, France is already bound by treaties as solemn as any new ones can be made, to have nothing to do with it. So we are paying her extra for abstaining from doing what she is already pledged not to do.

But, leaving this retrospect, I should like to say a word as to the future. As far as we can judge, France is to have the benefit, up to July 1862, of both Indian and African immigration, and we see that she is making the most of her time in both. I presume we shall find that either of the contracting parties can put an end to the treaty by giving due notice. Supposing France gives this notice at the end of the year, she will be in statu quo as regards Africa, and be richer by some thousands of the Queen's subjects from Bengal. Again, there is an important exception in the terms of the treaty, as stated in the letter. France is still to be allowed to draw emigrants from her own possessions on the African coast. Now, any really free emigration from these places is out of the question, and, without imputing any intended breach of faith, I will show how liable this provision is to abuse, by a single illustration.

It is perfectly well known that for several years the Natives of the British Province of Madras were smuggled to Réunion through the French territory of Pondicherry. Between 30,000 and 40,000 Indians are computed to have been so carried off. I need scarcely point out how easy it would be for an unlimited African slave trade through a French possession to flourish; either with the connivance or without the knowledge of French authorities. The French possessions fringe the African coast for hundreds of miles, and are bounded by great slave-trading nations in the interior. We have seen already that a consul at Réunion is to be added to our list for the purpose of watching the operations of the treaty in that island; a far greater number of consuls than even the hon. Member proposes will be necessary on the African coast to guard against the possible abuse of it there.

Before sitting down I may, perhaps, be allowed to express a hope that when Her Majesty's Government were making these great concessions to France they at least stipulated in return for some modification of the French law relating to right of search, which interposes so many obstacles to the success of our African squadron. Hard language has frequently been used in this House in regard to the conduct of Spain, but Spain scarcely receives a single slave who is not carried under the flag of one or other of two great maritime nations. That the banner of America has long been deeply disgraced in this way is a matter of world-wide notoriety, but that of France is not unstained.

A naval officer commanding one of our cruisers on that station wrote to me a short time ago thus—

“The French flag, I am sorry to say, is becoming a cloak for slavery, through immunity as to the right of search. A French ship escaped on the south-west coast last November. She had a legal clearance for China for coolies.”

Somewhat significant this, especially as fetters form part of the equipment of free emigrants, according to French notions.

“But had her papers been ever so irregular she was French and could not be detained; so our cruiser let her go, and she took 700 slaves.”

Mr. Cave

Now, Sir, if France and England really co-operate in earnest, America cannot long hold out, especially if her vessels are to sail henceforward under a divided flag. Now is the time to strike; and if, when this treaty is laid upon the table, I find that France has made some concession in this direction, even to the extent only of placing French Commissioners on board English cruisers to overhaul French slaves, I shall see some light under the cloud. If not, I shall be compelled to adhere to the belief, which is shared by many Members on both sides of the House, and it is said even by some of Her Majesty's Government, that this treaty, while creating new evils of a grave and painful nature, does practically little to obviate those which already exist, and against which it is ostensibly directed.

MR. H. BERKELEY said, that from letters which he had received on the subject he could corroborate the statement made as to the great increase of the slave trade on the East Coast of Africa. He was also in a position to state that the Portuguese authorities were most anxious that there should be an English consul at Mozambique, in the hope that a change for the better in that respect might be effected.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, that if he rightly understood the hon. Gentleman who had brought forward the question he was of opinion that the slave trade had not of late been vigorously prosecuted upon the Mozambique coast. But, if that were the impression of the hon. Gentleman, he (Sir John Pakington) had reason to believe that the hon. Gentleman was entirely mistaken upon that point. He had lately been informed by naval officers from the coast of Africa, that the slave trade so far from having decreased on the Mozambique coast, now flourished there in the utmost vigour.

MR. BUXTON: It was on the west coast I said it had decreased.

MR. DODSON said, he thought it would be well to defer creating any consular establishment on the East Coast of Africa until the report of Dr. Livingstone had been received on the result of his expedition up the Ruvuma. The presence of a consul at Mozambique was rendered the less necessary by the fact that the Governor General of the district entertained the most honest intentions to suppress the slave trade. The trade, moreover, was not carried on to such an extent at Mozambique as at other points of the East Coast of Africa.

The Portuguese Governor of Mozambique was exceedingly desirous of putting down the abominable traffic, and the fact was the more creditable to him because he was placed in a position of great temptation to connive at the evil. He did all he could to suppress it, but, in fact, he was powerless, on account of the extent of coast to be guarded, and the few and wretched means at his disposal. His soldiers were most of them twice convicted criminals, and he had only one brig and one gunboat, and that was useless. It was true he had a militia to assist him, but their value might be guessed from the fact that the officers only received £4 a year. They did not want a consul to keep an eye on the Governor General. If anything was to be done at all, they must have five or six cruisers permanently stationed on the coast. But his own opinion was that Cuba was the point which ought to be watched. It was notorious that there was a joint-stock company in Havannah for carrying on the slave trade, and that slavers were fitted out in that and other ports under the very nose of the authorities. The law and the church were always ready to connive at the importation of negroes, and the Captain General, though he had the power, wanted the will to put a stop to the slave trade. By stationing an efficient force of gunboats off the coast of Cuba they might, to some extent, check the importation of slaves, and it was also the duty of the Government to make the strongest representations to the Spanish Government with the view of inducing them to put in execution existing treaties. He repeated he could not approve the reappointment of a consul at Mozambique at that moment; they ought to wait to see whether Dr. Livingstone might not succeed in establishing a legitimate trade with the interior, which would supersede the slave trade.

MR. GREGORY said, he thought that was a peculiarly suitable time for calling attention to the subject. He was glad that the Emperor of the French had at last determined to put a stop to that branch of the slave trade between Réunion and the coast of Africa. It appeared to him that the Emperor, having adopted that course, might be induced to join with us in taking more vigorous measures for the suppression of the slave trade between the coast of Africa and Cuba. Persons were generally but little tolerant of those bad practices which they had relinquished themselves. The disruption of the American Republic was another circumstance which gave him hopes that they might at length be able to aim an effective blow at the slave trade. It was notorious that the real traffickers in the flesh and blood of their fellow men were citizens of the Northern States. It was in Yankee ships, floated by Yankee capital, commanded by Yankee skippers, sailing forth on their abominable errand, with the connivance of bribed Yankee authorities, that this work of the devil was carried on. Lord Lyons writing to Lord John Russell in September, 1860, stated that within the previous eighteen months eighty-five vessels had sailed from American ports to be employed in the slave trade. The captures made by the American squadron itself off the African coast from September, 1859, to October, 1860, consisted of ten vessels, seven of which were from New York. Of forty-four slavers which arrived at a certain part of the African coast within a limited period, thirty-one were American vessels. It was not surprising, under these circumstances, that Lord John Russell should have written in strong terms of the prostitution of the American flag. The noble Lord had conducted his correspondence with the American Government in a spirit which entitled him to the highest commendation from every person to whom humanity was dear. The reply of General Cass was couched in a style of flippant impertinence; but the rejoinder of the noble Lord—that as long as it was clear that the American flag was prostituted to the purposes of the slave trade—as long as that accursed traffic was mainly maintained by American citizens he would not cease to remonstrate with the American Government and people on the subject—was worthy of the Foreign Secretary of England. The United States were no longer hampered by what were called Southern prejudices. Now was the time to test the truth of all the statements they had made that Southern prejudices had prevented a really vigorous opposition to the slave trade, and to see whether, when an appeal was made to the United States authorities, we might not be able to obtain from them that real hearty co-operation which would enable us eventually to put down this traffic. The difficulty hitherto experienced, as every one knew, was the almost impossibility of stopping, detaining, or visiting American vessels. Every proposal we had made to the United States with that view had been rejected. Joint cruising and every other expedient had been invariably rejected. In former days, no doubt, these proposals had been rejected, not from any inherent difficulty in the proposals themselves, but because there was a feeling in America that it would be against American interests, he might say, to attempt to employ vigorous means in the stopping of the trade. At one time it was perfectly notorious that the acquisition of Cuba was the question not of years but of months, in the opinion of the American people. That dream had now faded completely away. It was then a great object to obtain Cuba well stocked with negroes. It was no longer an object that it should be so. On the contrary, if the slave trade were not revived—and he would not enter into the question of the real bond fides of the Southern States upon that point; he simply believed they did not intend anything of the kind—and if Louisiana had to contend against Cuba, it was the greatest object to Louisiana and the South that the importation of negroes into Cuba should not continue. That negro labour in Cuba should be dear was a primary object to the Southern States. He believed, therefore, they ought now to have both the North and South of America perfectly concordant in their views to put down the slave trade. He did most sincerely trust that Her Majesty's Government would now have to deal with a different set of statesmen at Washington, and that they would again appeal to them in the cause of humanity to join with England in vigorous action to put down this trade; for he was perfectly confident that it did rest with the hearty determination of the American authorities to prevent these slave vessels sailing from their ports, when they had sailed, to give every facility for their capture, so that they might eventually hope for the suppression of that detestable and atrocious traffic.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought the only conceivable objection that could be urged to the reappointment of a consul at Mozambique was the salary he must receive; but when he considered the success which had attended the presence of a consul on the West Coast, and the large sum they spent in cruisers, he was inclined to believe that small outlay might result in a great saving; so that the appointment might be justified on the mere grounds of economy. He agreed that that was a peculiarly fitting time when an effort should be made to obtain the co-operation
